"Spammers are creative and industrious," said Michael Davis, a lawyer with the Federal Trade Commission (FTC), which is responsible for enforcing the act. "Because of their dedication and their technological sophistication, they have found ways to stay oftentimes one step ahead of law enforcement."

Under the Can-Spam Act, marketers are allowed to send unsolicited commercial e-mails as long as they include a truthful subject line and routing information; an opt-out mechanism; a notice that labels the e-mail as an advertisement; and a valid postal address.

"Legitimate businesses overwhelmingly comply with it," said Stephanie Hendricks, spokeswoman for the Direct Marketing Association. "Obviously, folks are still seeing a lot of spam, but it's not coming from legitimate companies."

That's the problem, according to Mr. Chasin.

"The spammers that were sending spam before the law was passed were not obeying the laws then, and they're certainly not obeying the laws now," he said. "When the legislation was adopted, it gave the amateur spammers a decision: Do they want to get out, or do they want to become criminals?"

The challenge of enforcement does not stem from a lack of teeth. Can-Spam allows the FTC to seek civil penalties of up to $11,000 per violation, plus further fines for spammers who unlawfully "harvest" or extract e-mail addresses from Web sites or Web services. The law also gives the Justice Department authority to seek criminal punishment for violators who falsify header information or hijack a computer to send e-mail without a user's consent.

So far, the FTC has filed 26 lawsuits for violations of the act, Mr. Davis said. In those cases, federal courts have awarded civil penalties totaling more than $10 million.

Spam isn't just irking consumers; it's harming the reputations of legitimate businesses, said David Daniels, a vice president and research director with JupiterResearch of New York.

"Forty-three percent of consumers have told us that when they sign up for permission-based e-mail from their bank or retailer, they believe that doing that leads to more spam," Mr. Daniels said. "That is not the case. When you sign up for an e-mail offer at a reputable retailer or financial services institution, they're certainly not going to be sharing that information with another party."

Contrary to the assumption of many home computer users, spammers typically extract addresses using a "botnet," or program that takes over computers and uses their stored e-mail addresses to spread spam throughout the Web. Botnets can link thousands of computers without owners' knowledge.

Spammers have learned to avoid common e-mail filters, purposefully misspelling words like "Viagra" or embedding messages in graphics rather than plain text, Mr. Chasin said. They also cut and paste random, unrelated text to throw off filter keyword searches.

Mr. Davis said the FTC uses a variety of tracking techniques to trace e-mails forwarded by consumers and identified as spam. While it's hard enough to track the messages, he said, the problem is exacerbated when the spam's origin is traced overseas. In that case, federal courts can award penalties, but collecting the fines can prove a challenge unless the spammer has assets in the U.S. Enforcement of the laws often depends on the relationship between the U.S. and the country in which the spam originated.

The five biggest violators, according to British nonprofit Spamhaus, are the U.S., China, Japan, Russia and South Korea.

While a comprehensive solution may be elusive, spam analysts cite the need for greater international cooperation to crack down on spammers.

In addition, there are steps that Internet service providers (ISPs) and consumers can take to ensure they are not propagating spam networks, Mr. Chasin said. Consumers should not open unknown attachments and should constantly update their Web security software to avoid having their computers hijacked, he said. ISPs should quarantine infected computers until they are fixed, he added.

Until then, "I'm afraid we're only going to see spam continue to rise," he said.

Other Shoe Has Dropped Government Lends Its Ears To Cellphones (AJC)

By Bob Barr

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, December 6, 2006

In the 1960s-era TV show "Get Smart," whenever the protagonist — secret agent Maxwell Smart — required an absolutely secure environment to discuss a top secret project with his boss, he would ask that the "Cone of Silence," a huge Plexiglas dome, be lowered to shield their conversation from prying ears.

The Cone of Silence was obviously and amusingly ineffective, of course, but even had it served its purpose, in today's high-tech world, the KGB or whatever hostile agency Agent Smart might be trying to evade would be able to pick up whatever conversations they wished simply by using the very cellphone in Smart's shoe.

Modern cellphones are nothing more than miniature computers with small but sensitive microphones attached. Law enforcement agencies are discovering the significant benefit of drawing on that powerful combination of technology, by increasingly seeking court permission to use cellphones in the hands of suspects as surreptitious listening devices. Unfortunately for anyone who happens to be nearby, cellphones thus utilized as listening devices will pick up their conversations as well.

This latest example of electronic snooping should draw attention to the need for comprehensive national legislation to more clearly define the privacy rights of American citizens. Thus far, Congress has shown itself completely uninterested in addressing such fundamental civil liberty issues, much to the delight of the administration of George W. Bush, which continues to push the envelope of electronic snooping as far as possible.

In the most recent case, a federal judge in New York authorized the FBI to use cellphones belonging to alleged Genovese crime family members to listen to and record conversations in the vicinity of the phones. The government was not limited to conversations involving the tapped phone or the person using it. Unlike court orders applying to such surveillance in years past, the government is now seeking — and courts apparently are granting — orders allowing the feds to use cellphones belonging to or merely carried by suspects, to record conversations even if the phones are not being used or even turned on. A cellphone thus utilized will pick up whatever conversations take place anywhere in the vicinity.

If a suspect against whom the government has obtained such a "roving wiretap" order is seated in a restaurant with their cellphone in their pocket, and you and your girlfriend happen to be seated at a table nearby, your conversations — which you intend to be and which you have every expectation will be free from government eavesdropping — might be picked up and recorded.

I first became aware that the federal government wanted to outfit regular phones — so-called "land lines" — with devices that could be activated remotely by government investigators to allow agents to hear whatever was being spoken into or near the receiver, about 10 years ago, shortly after I was elected to Congress.

At the time, the Justice Department was trying to require telecommunications companies to incorporate technology in their phones to enable the government to engage in such surreptitious listening. The law the government was trying to use to do this was passed in the early 1990s and called the Communications Assistance to Law Enforcement Act.

We stopped the government from such heavy-handed and privacy-invasive directives at the time, but in the post-Sept. 11 world, with a Congress almost completely submissive to executive branch entreaties to increase its powers to invade citizens' privacy, such efforts appear now to be quaintly outdated.

In fact, the technology as described by reading between the lines of the court order in New York appears to be precisely what the government sought a decade ago for land lines. While the New York case is one that many might find compelling to justify such expansive government surveillance, law-abiding citizens should nevertheless demand that Congress act now to get a handle on the extent of the coerced technology that appears to have made this surveillance possible.

We should also force Congress to place limits on the extent such technology might be employed in circumstances where private and lawful conversations might be picked up. In the absence of such limits, it is only a matter of time, for example, before the government starts asking courts to allow it to surreptitiously take photographs with cellphones thus equipped. Perhaps it already has.

Can You Hear Me Now? (ABC)

By Vic Walter And Krista Kjellman Report:

ABC News' The Blotter, December 6, 2006

Cell phone users, beware. The FBI can listen to everything you say, even when the cell phone is turned off.

A recent court ruling in a case against the Genovese crime family revealed that the FBI has the ability from a remote location to activate a cell phone and turn its microphone into a listening device that transmits to an FBI listening post, a method known as a "roving bug." Experts say the only way to defeat it is to remove the cell phone battery.

"The FBI can access cell phones and modify them remotely without ever having to physically handle them," James Atkinson, a counterintelligence security consultant, told ABC News. "Any recently manufactured cell phone has a built-in tracking device, which can allow eavesdroppers to pinpoint someone's location to within just a few feet," he added.

According to the recent court ruling by U.S. District Court Judge Lewis Kaplan, "The device functioned whether the phone was powered on or off, intercepting conversations within its range wherever it happened to be."

The court ruling denied motions by 10 defendants to suppress the conversations obtained by "roving bugs" on the phones of John Ardito, a high-ranking member of the family, and Peter Peluso, an attorney and close associate of Ardito, who later cooperated with the government. The "roving bugs" were approved by a judge after the more conventional bugs planted at specified locations were discovered by members of the crime family, who then started to conduct their business dealings in several additional locations, including more restaurants, cars, a doctor's office and public streets.

"The courts have given law enforcement a blank check for surveillance," Richard Rehbock, attorney for defendant John Ardito, told ABC News.

Judge Kaplan's ruling said otherwise. "While a mobile device makes interception easier and less costly to accomplish than a stationary one, this does not mean that it implicated new or different privacy concerns." He continued, "It simply dispenses with the need for repeated installations and surreptitious entries into buildings. It does not invade zones of privacy that the government could not reach by more conventional means."

But Rehbock disagrees. "Big Brother is upon us...1984 happened a long time ago," he said, referring to the George Orwell futuristic novel "1984," which described a society whose members were closely watched by those in power and was published in 1949.

The FBI maintains the methods used in its investigation of the Genovese family are within the law. "The FBI does not discuss sensitive surveillance techniques other than to emphasize that any electronic surveillance is done pursuant to a court order and ongoing judicial scrutiny," Agent Jim Margolin told ABC News.

"Cell phone users, beware. The FBI can listen to everything you say, even when the cell phone is turned off."

This is the worst kind of sensational journalism, implying that the FBI is listening into everybody's cell phone calls. Only in the last sentence do you let the reader know that the FBI "maintains" it strictly observes the law and only engages in surveillance after obtaining a warrant from a judge(requiring evidence of probable cause that a crime has been committed and this person committed it). Why not just say "Homeowners Beware-The FBI can come in your house and search all your belongings!!!!"

Posted by: Chase | Dec 5, 2006 4:05:53 PM

What a fantastic thing to know the government can do. Actually, I've heard about this before, from people I know who work for different federal agencies who've said when they do anything personal, they always leave their phone at home because someone could listen in (even with it off). I thought it was just talk, but here's the proof.

The potential for abuse or misuse of this is staggering. Which says nothing of what could happen if a band of geeks in a basement decipher exactly how this is done. The potential for real damage to people's lives could be incalculable.

Why would manufacturers even allow for this type of function? I'm sure there's industry taxbreaks involves somewhere and dire pleas of national security. In the process, nothing you say can really be private.

Los Alamos Ignoring Warnings? (CBS)

By Sharyl Attkisson, CBS News Capitol Hill correspondent

CBS News, December 6, 2006

The FBI has conducted two interviews and may schedule a third with the woman who walked out carrying classified documents from what's supposed to be one of the most secure facilities in the world, the Los Alamos National Laboratory, CBS News has learned. The incident has exposed continuing security weaknesses at Los Alamos, which has been the focus of security and management scandals for seven years.

Sources say 22-year-old Jessica Quintana was hired to archive data from weapons tests, and even had access to information on how to deactivate the locks that keep nuclear weapons from firing. Somehow, she managed to leave the laboratory with hundreds of pages of classified documents and several portable computer storage devices known as "thumb drives."

As CBS News was first to report, the materials were found by accident in October during a drug raid on Quintana's roommate at their trailer home. Now, a chief watchdog of the Laboratory, Rep. Ed Markey of the House Energy Committee, plans to fire off a scathing letter to the Energy Secretary demanding answers.

"These are secrets that could be valuable to al Qaeda," Markey tells CBS News. "Our enemies want to have access to the most dangerous technologies to hurt our country. [The Laboratory and the Department of Energy] keep promising they're going to put better security measure in place, but they never do."

In his letter addressed to Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman, Markey outlines years of high-profile security breaches at Los Alamos, followed by promises from the Energy Department and lab officials to tighten the ship. That includes weapons design information being obtained by the Chinese in the late 90s and missing computer hard drives or similar materials in 2000, 2002 and 2004. The security breach in 2004 led to a temporary complex-wide shutdown of the laboratory that cost taxpayers at least several hundred million dollars, according to the Department of Energy.

The Department of Energy's Inspector General, Gregory Friedman, recently weighed in with his own criticism over the latest security breach, calling the laboratory's security "seriously flawed."

"Monitoring by both Laboratory and Federal officials was inadequate," Friedman reported in his findings. He called the latest incident "especially troubling" since taxpayers have spent "tens of millions of dollars" upgrading security at the laboratory in recent years after other security breaches.

A spokesman for Los Alamos tells CBS News that after the October security incident, many new security measures were installed. These include disabling the ability to download classified materials to unauthorized electronic devices and banning computer memory devices in certain areas. However, an official with the Department of Energy tells CBS News he thought those measures had been taken long ago.

Rep. Markey echoes that, saying Congress was promised in prior hearings that such steps were being taken — but "apparently they weren't."

Tune in to the CBS Early Show Wednesday at 7 a.m. for an exclusive report on the investigation and just how easy it was for the Los Alamos employee to slip out with classified documents.

Milberg Weiss In The Hot Seat (ABAJ)

By Martha Neil

ABA Journal, December 6, 2006

Should law firms ever get indicted?

Secret cash payments. falsified court documents. Behind-the-scenes deals between favored clients and their counsel.

All the elements of a John Grisham potboiler are present in the case of United States v. Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman.

The nation's leading plaintiffs securities class-action law firm is on the receiving end of the first criminal indictment filed against a major law firm in U.S. history. The New York City-based firm—which has been both celebrated and vilified for its ferocious attacks on alleged corporate wrongdoing—lost about 40 percent of its 128 lawyers in the five months after its indictment and may be fighting for its very existence.

Lost in the spectacle, according to critics of the government's case, is the question of whether prosecutors have gone too far. Even if Milberg Weiss is found guilty, indicting an entire law firm causes more harm than good, they contend.

The federal government's controversial tactic of getting corporations that are under investigation to surrender their attorney-client privilege in order to avoid prosecution is now being applied to law firms, with disastrous results for the legal profession and clients, the critics say.

And they are concerned that more law firms will be viewed as fair game for the same kind of aggressive criminal prosecutions the U.S. Department of Justice has pursued against a number of high-profile corporations in the post-Enron era.

A 20-count indictment filed on May 18 in U.S. District Court in Los Angeles charges the firm and two of its name partners, David J. Bershad and Steven G. Schulman, with conspiring to obstruct justice and commit bribery, perjury and fraud. United States v. Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman, No. CR 05-587(A)-DDP (C.D. Cal.).

Milberg Weiss, through the two partners, engaged in a multidecade, multimillion-dollar scheme to make illegal payments to hand-picked clients serving as lead plaintiffs in class actions handled by the firm, prosecutors allege. All the while, lawyers from the firm denied in court filings in the underlying cases that any undisclosed payments were made to plaintiffs, prosecutors say.

Counsel for Bershad and Schulman, who are on leaves of absence from Milberg Weiss, assert their clients' innocence, and the firm itself vehemently denies the charges.

Even if the allegations are proven, the government has failed to exercise appropriate prosecutorial discretion, according to Stephen Gillers, a professor of legal ethics at New York University School of Law. "The government obtains little or nothing by indicting the firm, when only a small number of attorneys allegedly were involved in the wrongdoing," he says.

If the Justice Department is concerned about deterrence, says Gillers, "the threat of criminal prosecution and the indictment of two prominent plaintiffs class-action lawyers is plenty chilling. I don't think you have to indict the firm to bring home the point that lawyers are at risk for this kind of conduct or alleged conduct."

Debra Wong Yang, the outgoing U.S. attorney for the Central District of California, whose office is prosecuting Milberg Weiss, says she's just following the facts, as prosecutors would in any case.

"I think the part of this case that was particularly egregious was that a fraud was being perpetrated on the court," Yang says. "You have to respect the rules and the confines of the system in which we work, and can't 'game' it."

Just before press time, Yang announced plans to leave her job and accept a partnership at Los Angeles-based Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher. Her replacement had not yet been named, but Yang says her departure should make no difference to the Milberg Weiss prosecution, which has "always been driven by the facts."

UNPOPULAR PIONEER

Notoriety is nothing new to milberg weiss, which was established four decades ago. Under the leadership of founding partners Lawrence Milberg, who died in 1989, and Melvyn I. Weiss, who still is an active partner, the firm pioneered class action lawsuits on behalf of shareholders alleging violations of securities law by corporations.

By the 1980s, Milberg Weiss was widely recognized as the most influential plaintiffs securities firm in the United States. Since its formation, the firm estimates, it has been responsible for more than $45 billion in plaintiff recoveries. Many of the firm's cases also have established important precedents affirming the rights of shareholders and consumers to pursue class actions against corporations for securities fraud.

DOJ_NMG_0103014

A track record like that hasn't always sat well with the business community. Critics such as the U.S. Chamber of Commerce have complained that class actions are little more than a money machine minting attorney fees for lawyers while the plaintiffs themselves receive little more than token recoveries. Proponents of class actions, however, contend that they often are the only practical means of redress for shareholders and consumers victimized by corporate wrongdoing.

The Justice Department alleges that two of the firm's partners found a way to manipulate the class action process illegally.

Under recent federal legislation, the shareholder in a class action who holds the largest block of shares generally is designated lead plaintiff—in effect, the representative for the class. As a result, lead plaintiffs now often are institutional investors, such as pension funds.

For decades, however, the first plaintiff to file, or an individual agreed upon by class counsel, was commonly put in the position of lead plaintiff. Because the lead plaintiff helps make strategic decisions about the direction of the case, such as what settlement terms would be desirable, he or she may have a considerable role in deciding whether a quick settlement—and hence speedy payment of attorney fees—is appropriate.

The Justice Department contends that Milberg Weiss partners Bershad and Schulman paid friends of the firm secret fees to serve in the lead plaintiff role in numerous cases—and then misrepresented to courts that no such payments had been made.

Although at least some of these illegal kickbacks were disguised as attorney fees paid to "local counsel" representing the lead plaintiffs, the money actually was being paid to lawyers who did virtually no work on the case, according to federal prosecutors. Instead, the so-called local counsel served as conduits to funnel these secret kickbacks to the lead plaintiffs chosen by Bershad and Schulman, the indictment alleges.

The Justice Department contends that Bershad and Schulman, along with their firm and two Southern California men who served as a paid plaintiff and an intermediary lawyer funneling funds, were responsible for some $11 million in secret kickbacks. They allegedly were paid to be lead plaintiffs in more than 150 class action and shareholder derivative suits during a period of more than two decades. The payments—which the Justice Department says ended only in 2005—were required to be disclosed to the courts hearing the class actions, but were not, according to the indictment.

These alleged kickbacks, by providing Milberg Weiss with "a stable of individuals ready and willing to serve as paid plaintiffs," benefited the firm "by, in many cases, allowing the firm to be among the first to file a lawsuit on behalf of shareholders," Yang said in a written statement distributed at the time of the indictment in May.

But the payments created a conflict of interest between the named plaintiffs and the other plaintiffs in the class action, Yang said in her statement. The payments gave "the paid plaintiffs a financial interest that differed from that of the class," said Yang. "In particular, pursuant to their secret arrangement with Milberg Weiss, the named plaintiffs expected to receive a percentage of Milberg Weiss' legal fees, a payment not available to the other class members."

Key factors in deciding to prosecute, Yang told the ABA Journal, included Milberg Weiss' central role in orchestrating alleged misconduct and in filing what prosecutors contend were fraudulent pleadings. There was no motivation for the indictments beyond the four corners of the case itself, she says. "You've got hardworking prosecutors who have really just followed the facts."

The individual defendants as well as the firm itself have denied the Justice Department's charges, and indications are that they intend to slug it out with the government all the way to trial.

Bershad "absolutely denies the charges and expects to be vindicated at trial," says his attorney, Robert D. Luskin of Washington, D.C., who otherwise declines to discuss the case. Schulman's attorney, Herbert J. Stern of Roseland, N.J., also declines to comment on the case.

Meanwhile, Milberg Weiss is telling its side on a Web site devoted to the case.

"The Justice Department's case against Milberg Weiss is based on unprecedented legal theories, unsubstantiated allegations, and a dubious interpretation of how class action litigation is adjudicated," the firm states. "The Justice Department's misguided case is a major blow to consumer rights and not in keeping with its commitment to serve the public good."

Milberg Weiss also maintains the Justice Department has charged the entire firm even though the actions of only a few individuals are in question. Moreover, the firm says it has given "extensive cooperation" to the government's investigation. The firm "has willingly turned over hundreds of thousands of documents and made dozens of current employees available to the Justice Department for examination and questioning," states the Web site. "The firm has also volunteered to develop industry-leading best practices for use of referral fees."

ANOTHER FIRST

Milberg Weiss is the largest and most prominent U.S. law firm to be indicted on criminal charges, say experts who are watching the case.

DOJ_NMG_0103015

"I can't remember, and no one I've talked to can remember, another instance in American history in which an entire law firm has been indicted," says New York University's Gillers. "It's hard to prove a negative—there may be one—but it's certainly not a firm of this size and reputation."

Milberg Weiss, however, is far from the first prominent law firm to face potential sanctions by the federal government. The difference is that, up until now, those cases have been handled as civil matters.

In recent years, for example, the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission has alleged in an ongoing case that Chicago-based Sidley & Austin violated employment discrimination laws when it let go a number of its older partners.

Prior to the Milberg Weiss prosecution, perhaps the most daunting federal action against a major U.S. law firm was an administrative enforcement action brought by the U.S. Office of Thrift Supervision against Kaye, Scholer, Fierman, Hays & Handler, based in New York City. The government sued the firm for $275 million in 1992 over its role as counsel in the late 1980s to a failed savings and loan institution with questionable business and accounting practices.

What really made other lawyers sit up and take notice, though, was when the government upped the ante by freezing the then-400-lawyer firm's assets. Unable to do business without access to its bank accounts, Kaye Scholer voluntarily agreed to pay a $41 million fine a short time later.

But Kaye Scholer stayed in business, and now numbers 500 lawyers.

Milberg Weiss likely will have to deal with potential civil liability arising out of the Justice Department's charges, but experts say it is the government's criminal charges that pose the greatest threat to the firm.

Comparisons are being made to the federal government's 2002 indictment of Big Five accounting firm Arthur Andersen on obstruction of justice charges for allegedly destroying key documents relating to the financial condition of Enron Corp. Arthur Andersen quickly disbanded in the wake of the indictments, even though the U.S. Supreme Court in 2005 overturned the conviction because jury instructions were improper.

Under U.S. law, a business entity, such as a corporation or law firm, can be held vicariously liable for criminal misconduct by its employees even if management was unaware of the adverse activity, notes Columbia University law professor John C. Coffee Jr.

But Coffee says a key distinction between the two cases is that, unlike the Arthur Andersen case, the partners charged in the Milberg Weiss case are members of the firm's senior management.

"So I think this is the opposite end of the continuum from indicting a corporation because of one allegedly rogue employee," Coffee says. "If you're ever going to indict and convict a corporation or partnership, it would be in a case where the senior-most management is believed by the government to be involved."

UCLA law professor Stephen M. Bainbridge doesn't foresee the Arthur Andersen scenario playing out for Milberg Weiss. "There's absolutely no reason to think we'll have the kind of massive, immediate demise that you got with an Arthur Andersen," Bainbridge says. He notes that law firms, unlike accounting firms, are not prohibited by federal government regulators from representing clients while under indictment.

Nevertheless, says Bainbridge, "as long as this thing is hanging over Milberg's head, as a business matter, they are going to have problems getting appointed as lead counsel in these class actions."

Moreover, Bainbridge says, "this is the kind of thing that can put a lot of stress on intrafirm relationships. Partnership—particularly in a smaller firm like Milberg Weiss, which by today's standards is relatively small—that's a real trust relationship. You want these people to have your back. If you're spending a lot of time worrying about your partners—'Are they going to jump ship?' and whether they're going to be there when you need them—that's really not very healthy."

Professional firms, says Coffee, "are fragile." If Milberg Weiss is convicted, "I think it will have to disband."

NEW TWIST ON THOMPSON MEMO

But it isn't the future of Milberg Weiss that most concerns others in the legal profession.

There already is widespread consternation within the legal profession and corporate America about Justice Department policies that restrict the traditional defense rights of businesses charged with crimes and those who work for these businesses. As a result, lawyers who represent these businesses are restricted in their ability to defend them.

And now, with the indictment of Milberg Weiss, concern about overzealous federal prosecution of corporate America has been ratcheted up a few notches, as lawyers realize these controversial policies could be applied directly to their own profession.

Policies at issue include not only pressuring companies to cooperate with prosecutors by waiving attorney-client privilege and the work product doctrine, but also pressuring companies to encourage corporate officers and senior employees to cooperate, says R. William Ide III of Atlanta. He is a past ABA president who chairs the ABA Task Force on Attorney-Client Privilege.

Such policies effectively eliminate many traditional defense rights such as the right to consult a lawyer, Miranda warnings, the Fifth Amendment right to remain silent, and even the right to a criminal defense, Ide says.

At the heart of these concerns is a memorandum issued in January 2003 by then-Deputy Attorney General Larry D. Thompson. Drafted in the wake of the wave of corporate scandals that followed the fall of Enron, the Thompson memo sets forth a list of nine factors that federal prosecutors should take into account in deciding whether to file criminal charges against business entities.

Particularly troubling to businesses and the lawyers who represent them is the Thompson memo's guideline stating that prosecutors should consider a corporation's "willingness to cooperate in the investigation of its agents, including, if necessary, the waiver of corporate attorney-client and work product protection."

Requests by federal prosecutors for privilege waivers from corporations facing potential criminal charges are increasingly common, says Lawrence J. Fox of Philadelphia, a past chair of the ABA Section of Litigation. He cites recent surveys on the issue indicating that federal prosecutors are seeking privilege waivers in up to 20 percent of cases involving corporations.

The ABA has played a leading role in opposing application of Thompson memo factors in a way that forces potential defendants to waive their protections under the attorney-client privilege and work product doctrine.

In recent testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee, ABA President Karen J. Mathis of Denver urged Congress "to send a strong message to the Department of Justice that the attorney-client privilege and the work product doctrine are fundamental principles of our legal system that must be protected." If corporations resist pressure to waive their privileges, they risk being labeled as uncooperative, said Mathis, which can trigger "a profound effect not just on charging and sentencing decisions, but on each company's public image, stock price and creditworthiness."

Just before the hearing, a bipartisan group of former senior officials at the Justice Department submitted a letter objecting to the "culture of waiver" being promoted by the Thompson memo. The letter calls for the Justice Department to "state affirmatively that waiver of attorney-client privilege and work product protections should not be a factor in determining whether an organization has cooperated with the government in an investigation."

(Among the signers is Carol E. Dinkins of Houston, who served as deputy U.S. attorney general in 1984-85. She now chairs the ABA Journal Board of Editors.)

The concern raised by the Milberg Weiss indictment is that, if it's a sign that more criminal actions against law firms may be in the offing, then more firms will be put in the position of compromising their own protections under the attorney-client privilege and work product doctrine.

In her interview with the ABA Journal, then-U.S. Attorney Yang said her office in Los Angeles "complied with all the necessary steps under the manual" of standards for prosecutors, which incorporates the Thompson memo and a 1999 memo that relates to prosecutions of attorneys and law firms. "We have to get approval anytime we do something like that, which we did," she said.

Milberg Weiss' Web site relating to the case states that the Justice Department raised the possibility of privilege waivers before indicting the firm.

"The Justice Department informed Milberg Weiss that, if the firm wanted to avoid indictment, it had to agree to broad waivers of the firm's attorney-client privilege and work product protection," states the Web site. "According to the government, Milberg Weiss could not truly 'cooperate' with the investigation unless it waived these time-honored privileges."

AN OFFER SPURNED

It was an offer Milberg Weiss says it had to refuse. "As members of the bar, the attorneys who work at Milberg Weiss feel strongly that they cannot, in good conscience, contribute to the erosion of the attorney-client privilege by knuckling under to the government's blackmail," states the firm's Web site. "The firm therefore elected to reject the government's demands for broad privilege waivers and will fight the case in court."

A law firm may be in a better position to take that kind of stand than most corporations, Ide says.

"Particularly corporations, the scenario is, if they're indicted—look at Arthur Andersen; it's gone," Ide says. "Because the shareholders walk away and your stock starts going down, and then you get sued by the plaintiffs' lawyers. It's such a huge risk that you'll find very few scenarios that a company's willing, like Milberg did, to run the risk of indictment."

Milberg Weiss is far from out of the woods, but lawyers at the firm are confident it will come out of its ordeal intact.

There were 128 lawyers at Milberg Weiss when the Justice Department indictment was announced in May. (Including support staff, a total of 363 people worked at the firm.) By the end of September, the number of lawyers at the firm had dropped to 78.

"While a number of lawyers have left in recent months, virtually all of the senior lawyers have stayed, along with a significant number of younger attorneys," said Weiss in a written statement to the ABA Journal. "Their combined capabilities have [been] and are being enhanced by the addition of key new hires."

But departures are outpacing new hires. When Matthew Gluck, a 63-year-old partner at New York City's Fried, Frank, Harris, Shriver & Jacobson, came aboard in October, the New York Times headlined its story, "Against Tide, Lawyer Joins Milberg Weiss."

According to news reports, the firm filed 114 securities class-action lawsuits in 2004, 91 in 2005, and 17 through mid-May in 2006, but it has filed no new cases since being indicted. On its Web site, however, the firm says it has some 560 ongoing cases.

Nationwide, class action filings related to securities have dropped to a 10-year low, according to a report issued in July by the Securities Class Action Clearinghouse at Stanford Law School.

In the meantime, Milberg Weiss is continuing to aggressively seek out cases in new practice areas, says senior partner Ariana J. Tadler.

"The firm has always been extremely entrepreneurial in the areas we reach out to," Tadler says. "We continue to have people call us every day asking for us to represent them. Likewise, there are certain firms that continue to call us and say, 'Hey, we want to partner up with you,' because we continue to be the best-resourced."

The case against Milberg Weiss may have a chilling effect on private enforcement of securities laws in the U.S., says Lawrence Rosenthal, a former federal prosecutor in Chicago who now teaches at Chapman University School of Law in Orange, Calif.

Milberg Weiss has been "the single most effective securities regulator in the country," Rosenthal says, taking on major cases that federal regulatory agencies haven't pursued. "I don't want to speculate on anyone's motives who I haven't even met, whose names I don't even know," Rosenthal says of the Justice Department decision to prosecute the firm. "I'm just talking about the effect. It's hard to understand how the incremental deterrent value of pursuing the law firm could possibly exceed the value as a securities regulator that this law firm has had."

Considering Milberg Weiss' history, the firm is getting support from some surprising allies, says Fox.

"The delicious irony here is that we actually had the U.S. Chamber of Commerce come out and decry the fact that Milberg Weiss was indicted, even though the chamber hates Milberg Weiss," Fox says. "Because the Chamber of Commerce understands that the same sledgehammer that was used on Milberg Weiss is being used on corporations every day."

CIVIL LAW:

Family To Be Awarded $500,000 In VA Case (ALBANYTU)

By Brendan J. Lyons, Senior Writer

Albany Times Union, December 6, 2006

Widow wins settlement in corrupt cancer study, but 6 others kept waiting

ALBANY -- The federal government agreed to pay $500,000 to settle the first of seven federal lawsuits brought by the widows of veterans who died in a corrupt cancer research program at Stratton VA Medical Center Hospital, the Times Union has learned.

The six other widows, who still have lawsuits pending against the U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs, are finding the government less willing to admit their husbands were used as guinea pigs in the tainted drug studies.

The Justice Department has not agreed to settle the remaining cases, in part because it's never been determined -- or publicly disclosed -- that more than one veteran died as a result of the corruption. The government's position has been that the men had advanced stages of cancer, so it is impossible to determine what killed them, attorneys in the case said.

But in at least one case it was clear, and Justice Department lawyers recently settled with the family of that victim, James J. DiGeorgio, a 71-year-old Air Force veteran from Brunswick who died at Stratton in June 2001. The settlement comes a little more than a year after a former hospital researcher, Paul H. Kornak, was sentenced to nearly six years in prison for his role in the scandal.

VA officials and federal prosecutors have portrayed Kornak as an out-of-control researcher who forged medical records to push cancern-stricken patients into drug studies that allegedly paid the hospital thousands of dollars. But attorneys for the families and people familiar with the hospital's operation contend the corruption was widespread and Kornak was following orders from oncology doctors.

At his sentencing, Kornak said he was a scapegoat. His conviction exposed deep problems at the hospital, where he masqueraded as a doctor despite flunking out of medical school, and was hired despite a felony criminal conviction in Pennsylvania in 1992 for forging a medical license application.

The scandal triggered nationwide efforts by Congress to reform the Department of Veterans Affairs' hiring practices and embattled research programs. Many widows have dismissed the government's assertions that Kornak acted alone.

Attorneys for the widows recently obtained permission to depose Kornak at an Ohio prison, giving the public an opportunity to hear Kornak's story, contained in sealed files kept by the Justice Department, which has declined to prosecute anyone else.

An assistant U.S. attorney in Massachusetts declined comment on the settlement last week, saying it has not been publicly filed. The criminal investigation was handled by the U.S. attorney's office in Albany.

Mary Snavlin, DiGeorgio's daughter, said her family's settlement doesn't bring any closure.

"The families that are out there waiting for their due, they need to get that," she said. "The Justice Department, the VA, the doctors, the non-doctors, they need to own up for what they did to all of the veterans. They need to say 'OK, we did this,' and whether it's 5 cents or $2 million, they need to understand that families are still hurting over this. It will never go away."

In January, the DiGeorgio family filed a motion saying their case should be settled because there was no dispute that his death was caused by experimental drugs that he should never have been given. Settlement talks began the following month.

"We have several other family members of victims to deal with," said Alan C. Milstein, an attorney for plaintiffs in the case, including the DiGeorgio family. "The difference between DiGeorgio and the others is that Mr. DiGeorgio was the one victim the government used in the prosecution (of Kornak) to basically say it was akin to manslaughter."

Many of the remaining widows have said the litigation is not about money. They contend it's about getting answers to why their husbands were used as experiments and in making sure it doesn't happen again.

Milstein said the quandary in their cases is convincing the government that it is indefensible to argue the men would have died anyway because they all had advanced cancer. Kornak admitted forging their medical backgrounds so they could be enrolled in the drug studies, where they were given drugs that may have worsened their conditions and hastened their deaths.

"It's always been my position that when somebody is used and abused the way these people were, that's what I call damage to their human dignity," Milstein said.

Hospital officials have denied a widespread coverup and instead placed blame on Kornak, who pleaded guilty to federal charges of negligent homicide and falsifying medical records.

Kornak posed as a doctor at Stratton, including carrying the title "M.D." on his VA-issued business cards and being introduced to patients as "doctor" even though he never finished medical school. His supervisors knew about his lack of credentials.

In all, Kornak is accused of undermining at least four major research studies involving dozens of veterans and hundreds of thousands of dollars. The hospital earned thousands of dollars for each patient enrolled in the programs, in which pharmaceutical companies tested new drugs on cancer patients to obtain approval for them from the Food and Drug Administration.

Over the summer, attorneys for the plaintiffs obtained permission from a federal magistrate to depose Kornak at Elkton Federal Correctional Institution in Ohio.

At his sentencing in November 2005, Kornak apologized for his crimes but told a judge he was "used" by the hospital's former cancer research director, James A. Holland, who was fired along with Kornak shortly after the scandal broke about four years ago.

No one else, including Holland, has been charged in the case. Holland now works in a cancer research program at a Georgia hospital. A federal review of his research credentials is pending.

Albano To Testify In FBI Suit (SPRINGREP)

By Stephanie Barry

Springfield (MA) Republican, December 6, 2006

SPRINGFIELD - Former Springfield Mayor Michael J. Albano is among witnesses scheduled to testify in Boston federal court on behalf of four men and their families suing the government for an FBI-sanctioned frame-up in a 1965 murder.

Albano, once a Massachusetts Parole Board member, joins two former governors, notorious gangster-cum-informants and corrupt federal agents as witnesses for Peter Limone, Joseph Salvati and the estates of the late Louis Greco and Enrico "Henry" Tameleo.

The four - two of whom died in prison - were wrongly convicted of the murder of Edward "Teddy" Deegan, who met a shower of mob bullets in a dark alley in Chelsea. They were falsely identified by onetime hit man Joseph "The Animal" Barboza, whom the FBI wooed as a top-level informant in the 1960s. The three initially received death sentences in 1969, later commuted to life in prison.

What's more, the government knew it, even ignoring chatter about the then-proposed hit picked up on a secret FBI wire tap before Deegan's ambush, according to once-secret bureau records presented to bolster the plaintiffs' case.

Reports on the matter were made public during a 2001 U.S. Justice Department probe that exposed collusion among former Boston agents and their informants. Limone and Salvati were released after 30 years; Greco and Tameleo were pardoned posthumously. Their families are suing for malicious prosecution and conspiracy.

So, what does Albano have to do with a 40-year cover-up?

He's glad you asked.

Albano's once-lauded tenure as mayor, 1996-2004, was tainted when his administration became the subject of a federal corruption probe starting around 2000.

Albano argued he was targeted, in part, because he voted to pardon Limone in 1983. He said two FBI agents, one named in the Boston lawsuit, tried to bully him while the state police launched an investigation. Albano contended tangling with the bureau won him a spot on a black list, though investigators have denied this.

Many local political observers looked askance at Albano's theory as several in his administration were charged in federal court in connection with various scandals at City Hall.

More than a dozen were convicted and still more face trial, but Albano was never charged. He declined to run for a fifth term in 2003, moving into the private sector.

Contacted recently, the former mayor confirmed he will testify at the trial in U.S. District Court in Boston. He declined to discuss the case further, citing a gag order.

However, the complaint filed by the plaintiffs in 2002 refers directly to the FBI's treatment of parole board members who supported pardons for Limone, Salvati and Greco in the 1980s. Albano served from 1982 to 1994.

"FBI agents ... caused state law enforcement officials to investigate members of the Advisory Board of Pardons who had voted in favor of commutation to determine if they had relationships with 'organized crime,' with the intent to discourage members of the Board from supporting any future petitions for commutation by Limone," the complaint reads.

The trial began Nov. 16. Albano may testify next week.

Others on the witness list:

Gov. William F. Weld, Massachusetts U.S. attorney for a period in the 1980s;

Gov. Michael S. Dukakis, whom the plaintiffs argue was misled by federal investigators and denied commutations for Limone and others, and Stephen "The Rifleman" Flemmi, now serving a life sentence for 10 murders.

The plaintiffs also intend to introduce testimony from the late H. Paul Rico, the former FBI agent who facilitated the Boston cover-up and died in federal prison in 2004 while awaiting trial for a Miami murder.

Barboza and Flemmi's brother, Vincent, were suspected to have committed the murder. Barboza was gunned down in San Francisco in 1976. Vincent Flemmi died of a drug overdose in prison. As for any connection between the Boston cover-up and the current corruption investigation in this city, the local FBI supervisor scoffed at Albano's theory.

"When I got here in 2001, I had never, ever heard of Michael Albano," Springfield FBI supervisor Michael G. O'Reilly said during a recent interview. "Organized crime was so entrenched, I felt there had to be public corruption. I made it a priority. ... If it affected his administration, so be it."

Smokers Await Calif. High Court Ruling With Bated Breath (LAW)

By Mike Mckee, The Recorder

California Recorder, December 6, 2006

More than 40 years ago, at age 13, Leslie Grisham was already hooked on smoking, convinced doing it would make her part of the cool crowd.

Even as subsequent scientific evidence revealed smoking could cause serious health problems, the Los Angeles-area woman claims she was misled by industry ads proclaiming cigarettes safe.

Five years ago, however, Grisham's faith was shattered when she was diagnosed with severe periodontal disease, which doctors said had been caused by toxins in cigarette smoke. She sued Philip Morris USA Inc. and Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp., accusing them of deceiving her for four decades about the safety of their products.

Today, the California Supreme Court will hear arguments in Grisham's case to resolve an unsettled point of law in the vast realm of smoking suits. At what point, the court must decide, are longtime smokers who relied on manufacturers' false safety claims required to file suit -- when health problems emerge or much earlier, when smokers realize they're addicted?

Millions of dollars in damages hinge on the court's decision. If the justices find that the statute of limitations tolls upon awareness of addiction, thousands of already sick smokers could be left with no recourse, while manufacturers' exposure to damages would be sharply limited.

Manufacturers consider addiction a disease in itself, and contend that all smoking-related claims accrue at that point. However, plaintiffs lawyers, knowing damages for addiction could be hard to prove, contend there are two statutes of limitations -- one at the time of addiction knowledge and another when an actual disease develops.

Kentfield appellate specialist Daniel Smith, who will argue Grisham's case, said last week that the court's ruling will be critical for ailing smokers who were lulled by ads into a sense of security only to develop emphysema, lung cancer, periodontal disease and other serious illnesses.

Tobacco manufacturers, he said, "misled the public by undermining truthful statements and attacking scientific conclusions as not yet being established. They effectively blunted the truth."

Smith, a solo practitioner, will share the lectern with Santa Monica, Calif., lawyer Martin Stanley, a solo practitioner who represents Maria Cannata, an emphysema victim who began smoking about the same time as Grisham. Both plaintiffs are seeking damages not only for their medical bills, but also for smoking cessation programs and the cost of all the cigarettes they purchased over the years.

Daniel Collins, a partner in Los Angeles' Munger, Tolles & Olson who is scheduled to present the industry's position today, didn't return several calls seeking comment. But based on his court documents, it appears he will argue that smokers shouldn't be allowed to wait decades to sue over use of products that the surgeon general declared hazardous in 1966, and addictive in 1988.

"Indeed, Grisham's complaint makes clear that she had actual knowledge of 'deadly health risks associated with smoking' long before her complaint was filed," Collins wrote, "and that she knew she was 'addicted' no later than 1993 -- nine years before she filed suit."

Grisham's and Cannata's case was referred to the state Supreme Court last year by the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which noted different federal and California court interpretations about the statute of limitations in tobacco cases.

"The two lines of tobacco precedent in federal and state court," the 9th Circuit held, "may suggest that California law presumes a general public awareness of the risks of smoking, but that an individual plaintiff, in an appropriate case, can overcome this presumption and receive a jury determination on whether [his or her] reliance on cigarette manufacturers' misrepresentations are justifiable."

The case had reached the 9th Circuit after a Los Angeles federal court dismissed Grisham's and Cannata's case as being time barred.

That decision was based on the 9th Circuit's 2002 ruling in Soliman v. Philip Morris Inc., 311 F.3d 966, which held that the statute of limitations "began to run not when [the plaintiff] was first diagnosed with injuries stemming from his tobacco use, but 'when he should have known of any significant injury from [the companies'] wrongful conduct.'" The court said that included when smokers realized they were addicted.

Since then, however, two state appellate court cases -- 2004's Whiteley v. Philip Morris Inc., 117 Cal.App.4th 635, and 2005's Boeken v. Philip Morris Inc., 127 Cal.App.4th 1640 -- have held that a manufacturer's fraudulent statements might be more important than a smoker's awareness of addiction. A common-knowledge defense to fraud claims, the rulings held, raises a question of fact for a jury to decide.

"Our holdings in Soliman bind us," the 9th Circuit said in Grisham's case, "but at the same time we do not wish to ignore the intervening decisions of California's intermediate appellate courts."

The 9th Circuit judges stated that they would dismiss Grisham's and Cannata's claims if the California Supreme Court decides the two women "cannot overcome the presumed awareness that smoking causes addiction and other health problems."

In his court documents for Grisham, Smith argued that California law doesn't presume a smoker's awareness of addiction, nor does it deem addiction a trigger for the statute of limitations.

"It is illogical to absolve the industry from liability simply because addiction arose years before serious disabling injuries occurred or were diagnosed," he wrote.

In his answer brief for the manufacturers, Collins insists that it would be ridiculous to let career smokers -- aware of tobacco's dangers through accounts in the media, reports by the surgeon general and massive public health campaigns -- claim ignorance about the risks of smoking.

"In light of the overwhelming common knowledge of the dangers and addictiveness of smoking since at least 1988 (and well before)," he wrote, "consumers are presumed to be aware of those risks for statute-of-limitations purposes."

The case, which will be heard in Los Angeles, is Grisham v. Philip Morris U.S.A. Inc., S132772.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Inquiry Into Jail Begins (SEATIMES)

By Mike Carter, Seattle Times staff reporter

The Seattle Times, December 6, 2006

The U.S. Department of Justice has opened a civil-rights investigation into the King County Jail in Seattle, focusing on sexual abuse of inmates and on allegations of inadequate suicide prevention and contagious-disease control.

Lawyers from the department's Special Litigation Section met with jail and public-health officials Monday and will conduct a wide-ranging investigation that may be expanded beyond those topics. The county learned of the investigation in a letter received by King County Executive Ron Sims last month.

"I can confirm the existence of an investigation ... into the King County Jail," said Cynthia Magnuson, a spokeswoman for the Department of Justice in Washington, D.C. "Beyond that, I cannot comment."

The investigation will focus on the jail in downtown Seattle and will not involve the Regional Justice Center in Kent.

Two former jail guards have been convicted of sex-related acts with female inmates and a third is awaiting a retrial after a jury failed to reach a verdict. The assaults surfaced in April 2005 after a female inmate was transferred to state prison and spoke up about the assault.

One of the former officers, Louis G. Laurencio, was sentenced to four months in jail last week after pleading guilty to inappropriately touching an inmate and photographing her breasts.

A report commissioned by the county and released two weeks ago found that a sexualized work environment, meager training and poor communication are among the root causes of the string of sexual-misconduct allegations against corrections officers with the King County Department of Adult and Juvenile Detention.

Cedric McGrew, who coerced an inmate to perform oral sex, is scheduled to be sentenced Dec. 15. Harland Richmond, accused of exposing himself to women and of later having sex with two female inmates, is scheduled for a second trial soon. His first trial ended in a mistrial in August when the jury failed to agree on a verdict.

"We've been pretty aggressive in dealing with jail staff misconduct," said Carolyn Duncan, a spokeswoman for Sims.

Jail Director Reed Holtgeerts said the county will cooperate fully with the DOJ investigation.

According to a list provided by the county, seven inmates have committed suicide while in custody since Jan. 1, 1999. They include three hangings, two self-induced poisonings, a suicide by jumping and a carbon-monoxide asphyxiation by an inmate on home confinement, according to inmate death certificates.

The jail also has investigated reports of potentially dangerous infections, including a jail death involving "methicillin-resistant staphylococcus aureus," or MRSA, commonly called "Mersa."

In a letter last December to the Metropolitan King County Council, Dorothy Teeter, the interim director of the Seattle-King County Public Health Department, said Jail Health Services staff has been trained to prevent and watch for MRSA infections.

AP, December 6, 2006

SEATTLE - The U.S. Justice Department has launched a civil-rights investigation of the King County Jail following incidents of sexual abuse and allegations of inadequate suicide and disease prevention.

"I can confirm the existence of an investigation ... into the King County Jail," Cynthia Magnuson, a Justice Department spokeswoman in Washington, D.C., told The Seattle Times. "Beyond that, I cannot comment."

The county was apprised of the investigation -- which concerns the downtown jail but not the Regional Justice Center in Kent -- in a letter to Executive Ron Sims last month, the newspaper said.

Jail and public-health officials met with Justice Department lawyers on Monday, and they plan to cooperate fully with the investigation, said jail director Reed Holtgeerts.

Two former jail guards have been convicted of sex-related acts with female inmates, while another is to be retried following a hung jury. Seven inmates have committed suicide since January 1999 -- three hangings, two poisonings, a suicide by jumping, plus a carbon-monoxide poisoning by an inmate on home confinement, according to the county. The jail also has investigated reports of potentially dangerous infections, including a jail death involving methicillin-resistant staphylococcus aureus, or MRSA, commonly called "Mersa."

Two weeks ago, the county released a report it commissioned which found that a sexualized work environment, meager training and poor communication were among the root causes of the string of sexual-misconduct allegations against corrections officers with the King County Department of Adult and Juvenile Detention.

Feds Look Into King County Jail Problems (SEAPI)

By Hector Castro, P-I REPORTER

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, December 6, 2006

The past year has been a tough one for the King County Jail with corrections officers caught sexually abusing inmates, suicides and reports of contagious diseases.

Now, the federal government has begun an investigation into jail operations.

Monday, investigators with the U.S. Department of Justice visited the King County Jail to meet with staff and tour the facility, said Carolyn Duncan, spokeswoman for King County Executive Ron Sims.

"We're cooperating," Duncan said Tuesday. "Whatever suggestions they make, we're obviously going to be making changes."

In an Oct. 30 letter to Sims, the Justice Department told the county it would be examining the incarceration and treatment of inmates housed at the main jail in downtown Seattle, which has a bed capacity of 1,697.

"Our investigation will focus on the protection of inmates from harm, including, but not limited to, custodial sexual misconduct, inadequate suicide prevention measures, and inadequate contagious disease prevention measures," wrote Assistant Attorney General Wan Kim, who oversees the DOJ Civil Rights Division.

The letter went on to suggest the federal government may actually be able to assist King County in its efforts to improve conditions at the jail and the government may be able to provide financial assistance.

Jail officials have been working on problems cited in the letter for some time.

Last year, investigators learned about the first of several cases of sexual misconduct by jail guards. Reed Holtgeerts, director of the King County Department of Adult and Juvenile Detention, called in Seattle police to investigate whether there were any other cases.

To date, four guards have been charged with incidents related to sexual misconduct. Several other jail personnel have been disciplined as a result of several internal and criminal investigations into alleged misconduct.

In November, former corrections officer Cedric McGrew pleaded guilty to second-degree sexual misconduct and third-degree assault for having sexual contact with a female inmate and another woman in a work-release program. Another former officer, Louis Laurencio, was convicted of sexual misconduct and sentenced last week to four months in jail.

A third officer, Harland Richmond, is expected to face trial in January on unrelated sexual misconduct charges. And a female guard with the Youth Services Center, Lydia Korolak, was charged with custodial sexual misconduct for her alleged acts with two teenage inmates.

The county brought in an outside consultant, the Moss Group, to suggest ways to curtail sexual misconduct within the main jail. The consultants found in their study that many employees were themselves concerned about the atmosphere within the facility.

Jail officials have made several changes, many of them involving increased training of staff.

As for suicides, Duncan said King County's jail has fewer suicides per capita than is average for jail facilities nationwide, and a suicide prevention program.

Seven inmates have committed suicide since January 1999.

There also were recent concerns about the spread of MRSA, a type of staph skin infection resistant to traditional antibiotic treatments. Last year, in a letter to the King County Council regarding the problem, jail officials said there has been extensive training of the staff to prevent the spread of the disease.

Duncan said the contagious disease is not running rampant in the jail. "There's no medical epidemic," she said.

Still, it will be one area federal investigators will examine.

There is no timeline for when the investigation will be complete.

Atlanta Police Give Few Details For 'no Knocks' (AP)

By Greg Bluestein

DOJ_NMG_0103023

ATLANTA - Atlanta police often offer only cursory details when asking judges for so-called "no-knock" warrants that allow them to burst into homes unannounced, like the one used when an elderly woman was killed in a shootout with plainclothes officers as they stormed her home, according to an analysis by The Associated Press.

Police Chief Richard Pennington called for a review of how his agency uses the warrants after Kathryn Johnson died and three officers were wounded Nov. 21 in the shootout during a no-knock search for drugs in Johnson's northwest Atlanta home. Family members say Johnson was 92 years old; authorities claim she was 88.

An AP review of all no-knock warrants filed in Atlanta's Fulton County this year found that authorities often give scant detail when applying for the warrants, which are typically used to search for drugs and weapons. The special warrants are intended to prevent suspects from getting rid of evidence or to protect officers from suspects who can show a threat of violence.

In an August affidavit, an officer pursuing a suspect named "Kabuki" offered a two-line explanation for the no-knock warrant, claiming that an informant said people at the home "always carry pistols" and could store guns. In others, officers only detailed their years of experience with the police force as justification for no-knock powers.

Critics of no-knock warrants say Atlanta is no anomaly when it comes to judges granting the special search warrants to police on few details.

"One of the problems we have in the country are that lower-level judges who issue search warrants are notorious for being rubber stamps," said Donald E. Wilkes Jr., a University of Georgia law professor who studies the practice. "This is compounded by the fact that police tend to use these boilerplate allegations for no-knock search warrants."

Use of the warrants has ramped up as the war on drugs has intensified, said Peter Moskos, a former Baltimore police officer who teaches police studies at New York's John Jay College of Criminal Justice.

"The problem is that you do get cases where police bust down the wrong door and people die," he said. "And to me, it's not worth it. I don't really care if they flush the drugs down the toilet. I don't care if drugs are destroyed. So what? It's not like the drug war is being won."

Officers obtained the no-knock warrant to search Johnston's home by claiming there was a carefully monitored surveillance system in the home and that an informant recently bought $50 worth of crack cocaine at the house from a man called "Sam."

But since the woman's death, concern over the police's investigation has increased. Her friends and neighbors describe Johnston as a woman who rarely left her one-story brick home and carried a rusty revolver for her protection. The informant cited in the search warrant's affidavit told Atlanta television station WAGA-TV last week that he was never at the house and that he was coached by police to cover for them.

Pennington has said Johnston's death has led his department to closely scrutinize its procedures. The FBI is investigating the shootout.

"Were mistakes made? That is yet to be determined. Could we, or should we, have done anything differently? That will also be determined," Pennington wrote in an Atlanta Journal-Constitution editorial.

"But I do know this: Every policy and procedure that the Atlanta Police Department relies on for guidance in drug arrests and search warrants will be scrutinized."

Pennington said at a community meeting Monday that of the 200 search warrants his department has served this year, 20 have been no-knock warrants. At the meeting, hosted by the NAACP, many in the audience wanted to know where in the city the no-knock warrants had been served - accusing the department of targeting poor, black neighborhoods.

The NAACP is now calling for the establishment of a civilian review board with subpoena powers. On Sunday, the Rev. Al Sharpton called for a congressional inquiry into incidents like Johnston's and the fatal police shooting on Nov. 25 of 23-year-old groom-to-be Sean Bell in New York.

In Atlanta, community members and police have been at odds since Johnston's shooting, and Mayor Shirley Franklin has publicly defended Pennington in an effort to ease tensions. The case has been turned over to state and federal authorities for investigation.

On the federal level, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled in June that evidence obtained in violation of police knock-and-announce rules could be used at trial. A measure was proposed in the House of Representatives shortly after the ruling that would have blocked the Justice Department from obtaining evidence without officers knocking and announcing first. It failed by a 310-109 vote.

Federal Case May Be A Longshot (NSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Newsday Staff Writer
Long Island Newsday, December 6, 2006

While federal officials said they are only monitoring developments in the fatal shooting of Sean Bell, new data indicate that making criminal cases against law enforcement officials such as cops is still a difficult task for the Brooklyn U.S. Attorneys Office, the office that would have jurisdiction if the case shifted to the FBI.

The probe into the police shooting of Bell and two friends on Nov. 25 outside the Kalua Cabaret in Jamaica is currently being handled by Queens District Attorney Richard Brown, who has promised a thorough and fair inquiry. As of Tuesday, the case hadn't been sent to the local grand jury where prosecutors would have to not only present evidence against the cops but also raise the issue of self-defense.

Tuesday attorneys for the wounded men signaled they would be waiting to see what happens to the Brown case before going to federal prosecutors.

"We're taking a wait-and-see attitude," said lawyer Sanford Rubenstein, who wouldn't speculate about what his next move would be if no state indictment comes. "Our clients are fully cooperating with the Queens district attorney in this case."

But federal prosecutors nationwide, including Brooklyn, find that making a criminal case against law enforcement officials for misconduct -- be they federal agents or local police -- is tough. Nationally, data show that 96 percent of civil rights cases are not prosecuted.

As reported in October by Newsday, Brooklyn federal prosecutors in fiscal 2005 declined to prosecute 75 percent of civil rights cases, be they complaints about police misconduct, racial violence or human trafficking, according to data compiled by the Department of Justice.

In recent weeks the data, compiled by the non-profit Transactional Records Access Clearinghouse, affiliated with Syracuse University, showed that Brooklyn federal prosecutors continued to take a tough look at complaints involving specific allegations of law enforcement misconduct. Statistics for the first 10 months of fiscal 2006 (October 2005 through July 2006) found the prosecutors declined to prosecute 91 percent of allegations involving "deprivation of rights under color of law," the statute that covers police and other law enforcement misconduct.

Though the data didn't readily show why the cases were declined, statistics for fiscal 2005 showed that weak or insufficient evidence and lack of evidence of criminal intent were key reasons for tossing the cases. An additional problem, said one federal prosecutor yesterday who didn't want to be named, was the standard of criminal intent required under the civil rights law. The standard was a high one for prosecutors to meet, said the official, who added that the issue of self defense in a police shooting could make a federal case harder to prove.

Still, while federal prosecutions of law enforcement aren't frequent, the cases that do go trial often lead to convictions. For instance Brooklyn federal investigators in fiscal year 2006 convicted 84 percent of the law enforcement defendants accused of civil rights violations. A spokesman for the Brooklyn U.S. attorneys office couldn't provide a list of such cases late yesterday, but noted that a number of law enforcement defendants, including "Mafia Cops" Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa, had been convicted or charged this year for offenses committed while acting as public officials.

"Getting convictions in these kinds of cases isn't easy, but it is not impossible," said Rubenstein, noting how his former client Abner Louima was able to prevail in getting justice when police officers were convicted in Brooklyn federal court in connection with the attack on him in 1997.

"We proved in the Louima ... [case] that federal government can bring to justice police officers who have acted criminally."

Port Chester Challenges U.S. Government's Stance Over Election System (NYJN)

By Liz Sadler

NY Journal News, December 6, 2006

PORT CHESTER - The village is challenging the federal government's claim that its election system illegally disenfranchises Hispanic voters, possibly paving the way for an expensive legal battle.

The Board of Trustees voted unanimously tonight to notify the U.S. Department of Justice that it does not believe the village's at-large election system violates Section 2 of the federal Voting Rights Act, as claimed by the Justice Department. The board reached the decision after reviewing data the Justice Department provided the village.

"The federal government's data does not credibly support their allegations and contentions," Mayor Gerald Logan said before the vote. "I speak for the entire Board of Trustees when I say that we are shocked. The federal government has been working on their case for the past three years. I can only imagine the waste of taxpayer dollars."

Anthony Piscionere, a lawyer for the village, said he had already notified the Justice Department of the board's decision and "they've indicated they will get back to us." Piscionere said he could not speculate about whether a lawsuit is imminent.

"It's very hard to say at this point," he said. "What I'd like to see is some further dialogue."

Tonight's decision came in response to an April 20 letter from the Justice Department to Village Attorney Anthony Cerreto that threatened to sue the village unless it switches to district voting. The letter called for a districting plan that includes a majority Hispanic district and concluded that "voting patterns in Port Chester are polarized by ethnicity."

Though the village's population is nearly half Hispanic, no Hispanic has ever been elected to village office. Hispanic residents represent about 22 percent of the citizen voting age population, or 3,058 of 13,980 eligible voters.

Hawaii Schools' Racial Enrollment Upheld (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, December 6, 2006

The Kamehameha Schools in Hawaii, private schools with an endowment of more than $6 billion, are entitled to limit their enrollment to Native Hawaiian children, a federal appeals court panel in San Francisco ruled yesterday by a vote of 8 to 7.

Students may be denied admission based on their race without running afoul of a civil rights law, the majority ruled, citing what it said were unique factors in the history of Hawaii, the plight of Native Hawaiians and the schools' distinctively remedial mission, which Congress has repeatedly endorsed.

The schools are the only beneficiary of the enormous legacy of a 19th-century Hawaiian princess. They have an enrollment of some 5,000 students, from kindergarten through 12th grade, on campuses on three islands. Admission is a great prize, as students pay about $1,800 in annual tuition for an education worth about $20,000.

The schools' admissions policy requires prospective students to prove that at least one ancestor lived on the Hawaiian Islands in 1778, when the British explorer Capt. James Cook arrived.

The suit was brought by a student identified as John Doe. The schools conceded that the student probably would have been admitted had he possessed Hawaiian ancestry. The suit argued that the admission policy ran afoul of a Reconstruction-era law, the Civil Rights Act of 1866. The court, splitting almost entirely along partisan lines, ruled that the prohibition did not apply to the schools' admissions program. (The eight judges in the majority were appointed by Democratic presidents. All but one of the dissenters were appointed by Republicans.)

"The schools are a wholly private K-12 educational establishment, whose preferential admissions policy is meant to counteract the significant, current educational deficits of Native Hawaiian children in Hawaii," Judge Susan P. Graber wrote for the majority. That fact, coupled with Congressional praise for the schools' mission, she wrote, meant that the admission program did not violate the civil rights law.

The decision overturned a decision by a divided three-judge panel last year. Judge Graber was in dissent in that decision. Judge Jay S. Bybee, who wrote the principal dissent yesterday, wrote the majority decision last year.

Eric Grant, the plaintiff's lawyer, said he would ask the United States Supreme Court to hear the case. "We're disappointed to be on the seven side rather than the eight," Mr. Grant said. But the closeness of the vote, he added, made Supreme Court review more likely.

Kathleen M. Sullivan, a lawyer for the schools and a law professor at Stanford, said her clients were elated by the decision and particularly by its unanimity on some points.

"All of the judges agreed that the Kamehameha School has a noble mission and has had extraordinary success in addressing what all the judges admitted are the continuing disadvantages suffered by Native Hawaiians," Professor Sullivan said.

The schools' history and mandate is so unusual, she added, that yesterday's decision will have "no precedential impact on any other school in the nation."

In a dissent joined at least in part by six other judges, Judge Bybee said the schools' worthy mission nonetheless violated the law.

"I cannot reconcile its admissions preferences — a racially exclusive policy that operates as a complete bar to all applicants who are not of the preferred race — with the Supreme Court's requirements for a valid affirmative action plan," Judge Bybee wrote. "The majority exempts an organization with noble goals that seeks to remedy a significant problem in a community that is in great need, but it can do so only because the majority departs from clear principles and established precedent."

The case from Hawaii is only superficially similar to the ones from Seattle and Louisville, Ky., argued Monday before the United States Supreme Court, Professor Sullivan said.

In contrast to the schools involved in the Supreme Court case, the Kamehameha schools are private, receiving no federal funds; they say their discrimination is remedial, meant to address historical wrongs; the beneficiaries are indigenous peoples; and the program has met with Congressional approval.

The student-assignment programs before the Supreme Court, Professor Sullivan said, involve public schools, mean to achieve racial diversity, are not directed at any particular racial group and come without similar Congressional endorsement.

Federal Appeals Court Upholds School's Admissions Policy Favoring Hawaiian Natives (FINDLAW/AP)

By David Kravets, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 6, 2006

(AP) - SAN FRANCISCO-A private school in Hawaii can favor Hawaiian natives for admission as a means of giving a helping hand to a downtrodden indigenous population, a divided federal appeals court ruled Tuesday.

The decision by a 15-judge panel of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals overturned an earlier ruling by three of the same judges that the Kamehameha Schools policy amounted to unlawful discrimination.

In Tuesday's decision, the majority noted that the case was unique because Congress has singled out the plight of native Hawaiians for improvement, just as lawmakers have done with Alaskan natives and American Indians.

The policy "furthers the urgent need for better education of Native Hawaiians, which Congress has repeatedly identified as necessary," the court said.

Admission to the elite school is first granted to qualified Hawaiian students, and non-Hawaiians may be admitted if there are openings available.

Only one in eight eligible applicants is admitted to the schools, which serve about 5,400 students at three campuses.

The case was brought by a white student excluded because of his race.

Three of the dissenting judges wrote separately that civil rights law prohibits a private school from denying admission because of race.

The Kamehameha Schools were established under the 1883 will of Princess Bernice Pauahi Bishop as part of a trust now worth about $6.8 billion (â‚¬5.1 billion).

The trust subsidizes tuition and is designed to help remedy some of the wrongs done during the U.S.-backed overthrow of the Hawaiian kingdom in 1893.

The decision came a day after the Supreme Court suggested during arguments in a different case that it might ban the practice of race-based admissions in public schools, even if the policy was intended to create racial harmony.

The last time the Supreme Court ruled on a similar issue was in 2003, when justices banned the use of rigid formulas that award points based on race for admission to the University of Michigan and its law school.

But the court that same year also permitted colleges to consider race as part of a "holistic review" of every application.

Private School Is Allowed To Favor Native Hawaiians In Its Admissions (LAT)

By Henry Weinstein, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 6, 2006

The 9th Circuit Court splits 8-7 on the policy for educational parity.

A sharply divided federal appeals court ruled Tuesday that a private school can favor Native Hawaiians for admissions in an effort to "counteract the significant, current educational deficits" experienced by the islands' indigenous population.

In an 8-7 ruling, the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco held that the admissions policy of Hawaii's Kamehameha Schools is constitutional because it is narrowly tailored to remedy a well-documented problem and does not unnecessarily trammel on the rights of other students.

The schools' policy furthers a goal that "Congress has repeatedly identified as necessary," Judge Susan P. Graber wrote for the majority.

Native Hawaiian students, she wrote, "are systematically disadvantaged in the classroom." They score lower on standardized tests than other ethnic groups in the state, are more likely to be in special education classes, and are less likely to graduate from high school and attend college.

The Kamehameha Schools — with campuses on Oahu, Maui and Hawaii — admit students from kindergarten through 12th grade. They were founded in 1887 to educate Native Hawaiians and are supported by a $6.2-billion trust endowed by the last direct descendant of King Kamehameha I.

The schools receive no federal funding and typically cover 60% or more of a student's tuition — making them considerably less expensive than other private schools in Hawaii.

Graber said the schools' admission policy "is not an absolute bar to non-Native Hawaiians; instead it is intended only for so long as Native Hawaiians suffer educational disadvantages."

But Judge Jay S. Bybee, writing for the dissenters, said the policy clearly violated the rights of other students by in effect blocking their admission. Kamehameha has admitted only one non-Native Hawaiian since 1962, he said.

The case highlighted a stark ideological divide on the 9th Circuit, which considers federal appeals in nine Western states, including California. All eight judges who voted to uphold the school's policy were appointed by Democratic presidents, whereas all but one of the dissenting judges were appointed by Republicans.

The ruling came one day after two affirmative action cases were argued before the U.S. Supreme Court, in which the debate suggested most justices favor halting the use of race to assign students to public schools.

But Stanford University law professor Kathleen Sullivan, who argued the case successfully for Kamehameha Schools, said: "Apart from the fact that both are about education, our case is nothing like" the Seattle and Louisville, Ky., school systems cases before the high court.

"Kamehameha is private; Seattle and Louisville are public. Kamehameha involves remedial preferences; Seattle and Louisville involved diversity," Sullivan said. "Kamehameha involves preferences of a kind explicitly adopted by Congress; Seattle and Louisville do not."

Kamehameha is highly selective, with only one in every eight students who applies gaining admission.

The case was brought by a white Hawaiian student who initially was denied admission to Kamehameha four years ago when he applied for the 9th grade, and then was turned down the next three years too, said the applicant's attorney, Eric Grant.

A U.S. district judge in Honolulu initially dismissed the case. But the student, identified as John Doe, appealed to the 9th Circuit and prevailed, 2 to 1, last year in a decision written by Bybee. But Kamehameha was granted a rehearing by a larger panel of judges, setting the stage for Tuesday's ruling.

Hawaii's political establishment, including its Republican governor and its full congressional delegation, supported the schools' position in the case.

Grant said he and his client were disappointed but planned to ask the Supreme Court to review the case. "We think the closeness of the decision bodes very well for the eventual resolution of this case by the U.S. Supreme Court," Grant said. "The admissions policy does operate as an absolute exclusion of children with the wrong ancestry."

He said John Doe is now a freshman in college but declined to say where.

But Sullivan said that "it is hard to see why the Supreme Court would be interested in a case that turns on such unique circumstances. There is no other case just like this one."

Black, White And Brown (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 6, 2006

FIFTY-TWO YEARS after the U.S. Supreme Court ruled in Brown vs. Board of Education that "separate educational facilities are inherently unequal," the court still can't agree on what that landmark decision really meant. That was painfully clear Monday when the Brown ruling was cited by justices on both sides of a debate over the constitutionality of programs that try to maintain a racial balance in public schools.

It was equally clear that the outcome of the cases, from Seattle and Louisville, hangs on the vote of Justice Anthony M. Kennedy. Some of Kennedy's comments from the bench Monday were ominous for the school districts. But if Kennedy views Brown in the proper perspective, he will provide a fifth vote to allow school districts, including the Los Angeles Unified School District, to experiment with ways to bring children of different races together in the classroom.

Brown vs. Board of Education, of course, was the 1954 case in which the court ruled that Topeka, Kan., and several Southern states had violated the 14th Amendment's guarantee of "equal protection of the laws" by operating separate schools for whites and blacks. Yet wrapped inside that seemingly straightforward result was a riddle. Were segregated schools wrong because they violated the principle that pupil assignments must always be "colorblind," or because they took race into account for a malign purpose: to separate "superior" whites from "inferior" African Americans?

Four conservatives on the Supreme Court seem wedded to the first view of Brown. In their view, once the vestiges of state-sponsored segregation are remedied, schools may not engage in what Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. has called the "sordid business [of] divvying us up by race."

But for the court's four liberal justices, Brown wasn't primarily about abstract colorblindness. Rather, it was about giving force to the 14th Amendment, which was intended, as Justice Stephen G. Breyer noted Monday, "to take people who had formerly been slaves and their children and make them full members of American society. And part of that was that the state couldn't insist that they go to separate schools."

Breyer has the better of the argument. Taking account of race to bring children of different backgrounds together is fundamentally different from using race to keep those children apart. Is there a ray of hope that Kennedy, the likely swing vote in these cases, will agree?

At several points Monday, he seemed to be endorsing his conservative colleagues' colorblind approach. At other points, he signaled that he recognizes that efforts to integrate schools are not the moral or constitutional equivalent of pre-Brown school segregation. In this, as in so many other cases, what Kennedy decides may well dictate what the court itself does.

It's Not Black And White (USAT)

By Jonathan Turley

USA Today, December 6, 2006

Monday, the Supreme Court once again ventured into the quagmire of affirmative action. In two cases, the court will decide whether it is permissible to use race as a criteria in the selection of students on the elementary or high school levels — three years after the court barely sustained the use of such policies on the university level.

Even after many decades, affirmative action remains one of the most contentious issues in our society. Yet, like abortion, there appears to be less, not more, true dialogue. Many people who are uncomfortable with these programs remain silent in fear that their concerns will be misconstrued or mischaracterized.

All too often, critics of affirmative action are dismissed as racists. Such hair-trigger attacks were common during the debate over Michigan's Proposition 2, a ban on affirmative action in government contracts, hiring and public education. In launching his organization's campaign against the measure, NAACP President Bruce Gordon said the organization "does not plan to stand by while the architects of racism dismantle affirmative action programs that attempt to level the playing field in higher education and help create a diverse work force."

Such racial politics clearly did not serve opponents well: The proposition passed with an impressive 58% of the vote. According to Gordon's logic, does that mean that 58% of Michigan is either racist or enabling racism? If so, 55% of Californians were racists in 1996 when they enacted Proposition 209 barring affirmative action, and 59% of voters in Washington were racists in 1998 when they passed Initiative 200 that imposes a similar ban.

Most Americans are neither racist nor hostile to the ends sought by affirmative action. It remains a question of means.

We have a long way to go to bring down the continuing economic and social barriers for African-Americans. There is considerable support for programs to assist minority students with extra funds for improving schools, creating scholarships, and affording greater opportunities to excel on their own merit. There is also broad support for continuing to offer low-interest loans to minority businesses to help get them into the competitive marketplace. Nonetheless, there is a valid distinction between programs that "level the field" of competition and programs that direct its outcome.

When it finally comes down to the competition itself between students or businesses vying for the same goals, the outcome should be based entirely on merit. In other words, we need to draw a clear line between programs that assist minority students and businesses in reaching the field of competition and those that favor competitors on the basis of race, gender or religion. That means that some anti-affirmative action measures go too far. Yet, it is equally wrong when the government moves beyond facilitating and begins manipulating competition.

Under such an approach, states would be allowed to give disproportionate funds for improving opportunities for minority students or businesses, but they would be barred from using racial preferences in competitive selections for schools, government contracts, or hiring. For example, while a minority business can be given special help in its formation, government contracts should be awarded entirely on the basis of the best product and the lowest cost for citizens.

Not surprisingly, both sides take different meanings from studies of the effect of eliminating affirmative action programs. Thus, many people were rightfully alarmed to learn that UCLA would have only 96 African-Americans among its incoming freshmen — 2% of the class. For affirmative action advocates, it shows why special programs are necessary even after so many years of racial preferences in selection. For opponents of affirmative action, it shows that many students in prior years were not the most qualified on academic scores and achievement.

Both sides might be partially correct. The fall in minority admissions and minority contractors should motivate leaders to improve recruiting efforts in minority areas for schools and explore programs to help minority businesses. But it also shows that many past students and businesses were not sufficiently competitive to prevail on a playing field that is entirely free of racial preference in selection.

Some leaders, however, cannot shake the desire to manipulate the final outcome of competition. After Proposition 2 passed, Detroit Mayor Kwame Kilpatrick stated his interest in an ordinance that gave a preference to Detroit-based contractors — who would presumably be largely minorities in the largely minority city population. "That way, you don't have to deal with gender or race," said the mayor's spokesperson. Putting aside the legal mistake of openly admitting an intention to create de facto preferences to avoid the law, Kilpatrick would be better off addressing the underlying reasons for the lack of competitive showing through special pre-competition programs. Indeed, the removal of preferences will increase the pressure on such firms to be competitive and the pressure on cities such as Detroit to better educate and train citizens for such competition.

It is time to have a substantive dialogue about the promise and limits of affirmative action — free of race-baiting language. Opposing some forms of affirmative action does not make someone any more of a racist than opposing abortion makes someone a misogynist.

Until such true dialogue occurs, we will continue to speak to each other through ballot referendums, or worse yet, many will continue not to speak to each other at all.

Police Analyst Sues New York, Charging Anti-Muslim E-Mail (NYT)

By William K. Rashbaum

The New York Times, December 6, 2006

For several years, the New York Police Department has touted an elite undercover unit of Middle Eastern and Asian investigators who use their foreign-language skills online to search out potential terrorist threats against the city.

But now the department is under sharp criticism from a member of the unit, an Egyptian-born analyst who filed a lawsuit yesterday that charges he was subjected to hundreds of blistering anti-Muslim and anti-Arab e-mail messages sent out by a city contractor over the course of three years.

The analyst, who is not named in the court papers, filed the discrimination lawsuit in federal court in Manhattan as "John Doe Anti-Terrorism Officer" because he still works undercover in the Cyber Unit. In an interview yesterday, he said that he complained repeatedly to his supervisors about the messages but that no one took action.

A 48-year-old captain with the New York City Department of Correction, the analyst has been assigned to work with the Police Department's Intelligence Division since 1998. He said he helped to form the Cyber Unit in 2002. He and the other members, who number about a dozen, troll message boards and Web sites to engage extremists and collect intelligence about potential threats, the lawsuit says. He fears that his family in Egypt might face retaliation if his name and the nature of his work were revealed, said his lawyer, Ilann M. Maazel.

At the center of the lawsuit are e-mail briefing messages sent out several times a day to members of the Intelligence Division by Bruce Tefft, a former C.I.A. official who has identified himself in the past as the Police Department's counter-terrorism adviser.

Mr. Tefft worked for Orion, a company that provided the department with counter-terrorism information culled from its massive database, including news articles and other materials known as open-source intelligence.

According to the suit, the briefing messages were preceded by commentary from Mr. Tefft that included virulent anti-Muslim and anti-Arab statements like, "Burning the hate-filled Koran should be viewed as a public service at the least," and "This is not a war against terrorism ... it is against Islam and we are not winning."

In one message, he asked, "Has the U.S. threatened to vaporize Mecca?" and responded, "Excellent idea, if true."

"These e-mail briefings ridiculed and disparaged the Muslim religion and Arab people, and stated that Muslim- and Arab-Americans were untrustworthy and could not reliably serve in law enforcement positions or handle sensitive data," the suit said.

Paul J. Browne, the Police Department's chief spokesman, said in an e-mail message that the department moved to stop the e-mail messages when it became aware of a complaint about them. <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

Panel Backs Guideline Favoring Voting-Machine Verification (WP)

By Cameron W. Barr

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

A federal panel voted yesterday to begin developing a national standard that could result in the gradual phasing out of the paperless electronic voting machines in use across the Washington region and in many parts of the country.

The "next generation" of voting systems should have an independent means of verifying election results, the Technical Guidelines Development Committee said. The standard would have to be adopted by the U.S. Election Assistance Commission.

"This seems to mark the end of an era" for paperless electronic voting, said Doug Chapin, director of electionline.org, a nonpartisan organization that tracks changes in the country's election systems.

The commission and its advisory panel have yet to determine when the new standard would go into effect and how it would apply. A report prepared by scientists at the National Institute of Standards and Technology last week said the new standard would not be implemented until 2009 at the earliest.

Some politicians indicated yesterday that they would move more quickly to add verification systems -- also known as paper trails -- to voting systems that lack them.

The speaker of Maryland's House of Delegates, Michael E. Busch (D-Anne Arundel), said the legislature would start exploring options for a paper trail during its upcoming session with an eye toward having something in place for the 2008 elections.

"It would be nice if we could get a look at a couple of options," Busch said. "The price tag is going to be great."

Maryland Gov.-elect Martin O'Malley (D) said his administration would "have to find some way to move forward" and noted that a transition panel is looking at election issues.

Maryland is one of five states that exclusively use electronic voting systems that offer no independent means of verifying an election result. Virginia and 10 other states, as well as the District, use such systems in some jurisdictions or allow voters to choose whether to use them or some other voting system.

Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) said he plans a careful review of the findings. "I'm going to take a look at this report. I've talked to a lot of people who are very concerned about electronic machines without a paper trail," he said.

Del. Timothy D. Hugo (R-Fairfax), a main sponsor of unsuccessful legislation in Virginia's General Assembly last year that would have required the state to launch a paper-trail pilot program, said: "I think the committee recommendations will help validate what we have been doing. It will really make people stand up and pay attention."

District Mayor-elect Adrian M. Fenty (D) said in a statement that the red flags raised by the federal panel had caught his attention and that "we need assurances that election outcomes are reliable. As Mayor, I will work closely with the Council and the Board of Elections to make sure that the District of Columbia's election process is regulated and administered in a fashion that supports the report's findings and is in-line with best practices from around the Country."

In unanimously approving the resolution yesterday, members of the panel made it clear that they would not recommend that states stop using such systems "at this time" as long as proper security measures are in place.

The panel also said the commission should ensure that all voters -- including disabled ones -- "can verify the independent voting record." Advocates for people with disabilities have said that existing systems of verification, such as electronic voting machines that show voters a printed summary of their choices before they cast their ballots, would not be accessible to blind voters.

The voting-machine industry will have to come up with new technology to satisfy the need to provide verification accessible to all voters, said James C. Dickson, vice president for governmental affairs at the American Association of People with Disabilities. That means it could be 2020 before the voting systems envisioned by the panel are "widely available in polling places."

A supporter of the paperless electronic machines, Dickson disputed the notion that the panel's resolution meant the end of an era for such systems. "Era, schmera," he said. "There isn't any money to buy anything else."

The panel considered a similar resolution Monday but deadlocked and failed to pass it. The version adopted yesterday contained new language that grandfathers in existing systems, calls on the commission to ensure that verification systems are universally accessible and credits election officials and voting-machine makers for adopting security controls.

Michael Newman, a spokesman for the National Institute of Standards and Technology, said the panel, which the institute is advising, would have until the end of July to prepare a draft set of standards that would then be considered by the Election Assistance Commission.

The commission would solicit public input before adopting new standards. The standards are voluntary, but many state laws require voting systems to meet federal or national criteria before they can be used.

Microsoft Technical Documents Back On Track In Antitrust Case (IDG)

By Grant Gross, IDG News Service

IDG News Service, December 6, 2006

Microsoft sets up delivery schedule after complaints about the company's technical documentation caused delays in the DOJ antitrust case

A U.S. district judge on Tuesday praised the schedule set up in a revamped technical documentation project that's part of the 4-year-old antitrust settlement between Microsoft Corp. and the U.S. government.

Judge Colleen Kollar-Kotelly, of the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, hailed a new plan that would deliver 58 documents related to Microsoft's software communication protocols by Dec. 15, with more documents coming in February, April and May.

Kollar-Kotelly in May approved a two-year extension to parts of her antitrust judgment against Microsoft because of ongoing problems in the technical documentation for Microsoft's software communication protocols.

"I hope this approach works," Kollar-Kotelly said during Tuesday's antitrust compliance hearing. "We seem to be on the correct time table."

Kollar-Kotelly, in an antitrust settlement approved in November 2002, ordered Microsoft to create the technical documentation so that competing software companies can buy licenses to Microsoft's communications protocols and make products that work with Microsoft software.

The judge expressed support for the new plan after numerous delays and past complaints about the quality of technical documentation."We'll have to see if this achieves the [results] that have eluded us so far," she said after Microsoft representatives explained the technical documentation "reset," as they called it.

Under the plan, Microsoft delivered 32 technical documents to the court-mandated technical committee overseeing the settlement by Oct. 25, and is on track to deliver another 26 documents by Dec. 15. The technical documentation that's most useful to protocol licensees will be delivered first, Microsoft said.

The schedule has Microsoft delivering another 99 technical documents between Feb. 22 and May 29. About 90 days after the initial release of a document, Microsoft will give the technical committee and licensees an online build of the document.

In addition, there were 943 identified problems with the current technical documentation as of Oct. 31, up from 835 problems identified as of Sept. 30, according to court records. Microsoft will work on fixing those problems as part of the revamped documentation project, said Robert Muglia, senior vice president of Microsoft's server and tools business.

Lawyers for the U.S. Department of Justice and some of the plaintiff states in the antitrust case said the documentation plan seems to be working. But Stephen Houck, a lawyer for the California group of state plaintiffs in the case, noted that hundreds of problems still exist in the current documentation.

"While much as been accomplished, there's much left to do," Houck said.

Muglia walked the judge through an example of the new technical documentation, and Kollar-Kotelly noted the new version had "a lot more details."

"My only wish is that it had been done earlier, so we wouldn't be at this point," she said.

US Airways Won't Fight Over Delta Deal (USAT)

By Marilyn Adams

USA Today, December 6, 2006

US Airways will give up its proposed takeover of Delta Air Lines if management there can't be persuaded of the benefits, US Airways CEO Doug Parker said Tuesday.

Parker said he's not prepared to fight Delta's management in bankruptcy court by submitting a merger plan to the judge without the backing of Delta officials.

"We have to get to a point where we are all working together on this, or it's not going to happen," Parker said at a meeting with editors and reporters at USA TODAY. "This is all about convincing Delta's management that this plan makes sense."

US Airways has made an unsolicited takeover offer of $8.5 billion in cash and stock to acquire Delta, the USA's third-biggest carrier.

Delta's management has rebuffed the offer, saying it's too risky and that Delta is better off as an independent airline. Delta declined to comment on Parker's remarks. Delta CEO Gerald Grinstein has repeatedly voiced opposition to the merger proposal since US Airways announced it Nov. 15.

In a memo to employees Tuesday, Grinstein said Delta, "is making crucial progress toward becoming a strong, independent, stand-alone company."

But because Delta is in bankruptcy, its management does not have complete control of the company's fate. Its creditors must approve Delta's post-bankruptcy business plan before the airline can exit. Delta executives plan to unveil the plan this month.

Delta CFO Ed Bastian has expressed alarm that a merger would prolong the airline's stay in bankruptcy at least by several months because it would have to be reviewed by antitrust experts at the U.S. Department of Justice. That would increase Delta's bankruptcy costs and run the risk of a downturn in the economy or a spike in jet fuel prices, Bastian says.

Parker predicted a US Airways-Delta merger could close by June 30, 2007, roughly when Delta had predicted emerging from bankruptcy alone.

Parker called the proposed merger schedule "aggressive," but said he believes it can be done, although his airline is still working through last year's merger of America West and the old US Airways.

Although that deal closed 15 months ago, the new, combined US Airways is still flying with two separate reservation systems and two sets of pilots and flight attendants who are scheduled separately and who work under separate labor contracts.

Parker and US Airways President Scott Kirby said they would finish merging America West and the old US Airways before beginning a merger with Delta.

Delta Chief Firmly Against Merger (WP)

By Del Quentin Wilber, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

US Airways Proposal Bad for Consumers, Grinstein Asserts

The top executive at Delta Air Lines said he would vigorously defend his company against an unsolicited takeover bid, insisting that the Atlanta-based carrier would be a stronger company and better for consumers if it remained independent.

In his first interview since US Airways Group announced its merger proposal last month, Delta chief executive Gerald Grinstein said he was confident that creditors would accept his reorganization plan. He also said it would be difficult for a combined company to overcome internal and regulatory hurdles.

"Whenever you go from having two carriers to one, or three carriers to two, that is going to have a consumer impact," he said. "There will be a loss of service in some smaller communities. There will be an increase in fares. . . . There is no question that there are antitrust issues that won't be quickly or easily resolved."

"I think the track record of good mergers is hard to find" in the airline industry, he said.

Delta and US Airways are battling to convince creditors, regulators and legislators of the virtues of their competing plans. US Airways has dominated the early rounds. Its stock price soared the day the merger proposal was announced but has since retreated slightly.

Many outside analysts and airline executives think the industry needs to consolidate to improve its financial outlook.

Grinstein, 74, has been working to get Delta, the nation's third-largest carrier, out of Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection for the past year. He is expected in the coming weeks to present creditors and the court with a reorganization plan that he says would be better for creditors than US Airways' $8.5 billion offer.

Several analysts and executives at other airlines said US Airways appeared to have lost momentum, as investors and creditors look more carefully at the merger proposal. Among their concerns are the reaction of regulators, the new Democratic-controlled Congress and the short time available for US Airways to complete a deal. US Airways hopes to do that before Delta leaves bankruptcy protection, which is expected next year. Otherwise, US Airways would lose some cost-cutting advantages it could gain in the bankruptcy process.

"There are more chances of this deal being killed because of market forces and the Justice Department," said Michael Miller, an analyst with the Velocity Group. But, he added, the offer has "the power of dollars behind it."

Ray Neidl, another analyst, said the merger proposal has a 30 to 40 percent chance of overcoming internal and regulatory hurdles in such a short time.

US Airways chief executive W. Douglas Parker said he was confident that the merger would be completed. Creditors seem receptive to the offer, he said in an interview. "It was well received and the process continues. The process is gaining steam."

Parker expressed confidence that the companies could address antitrust issues. A combined airline would probably have to sell some airport gates and one of the lucrative shuttle routes among Washington, New York and Boston, US Airways executives acknowledged.

Parker is interested in Delta because the two airlines compete on many of the same routes. A merger would allow him to reduce the number of flights and aircraft serving those cities. He said he thought such a business plan would save $1.6 billion a year by combining functions and cutting flights.

Parker said such a strategy would benefit consumers by offering them a healthier airline that serves more destinations. He said the new airline would not raise fares.

"Consumers will be better off," he said.

Grinstein disputed that claim and said his airline would serve customers better without a merger because it has already streamlined operations and achieved more than $2 billion in annual savings.

Although it is still has problems with mishandled baggage and major delays at some airports, Grinstein said Delta is using planes more efficiently and plans to expand its lucrative international routes.

Grinstein would not discuss the specifics of his restructuring plan and said he did not know what creditors thought of the US Airways offer. "They have their cards to play and they are going to play them," he said.

He said there were a variety of obstacles that would make a merger difficult, such as the airlines' different fleets, employment structures and cultures.

US Airways also hasn't fully digested its prior merger, with America West, raising questions about whether it could handle a hostile takeover at the same time, Grinstein said.

"They haven't concluded last night's dinner before planning tonight's," he said. "This was totally unexpected, unsolicited, unencouraged and unhoped for. . . . We are so dissimilar. We have different equipment. We have different service philosophies."

If the merger sets off a spree of consolidation among the other major carriers -- American, Continental, United and Northwest -- the outlook wouldn't be good for a combined Delta and US Airways, which would be smaller than other partnerships, Grinstein said.

"If this devolves into three systems, which is the weakest of the three systems?" he said. "The answer is pretty clear."

Grinstein declined several attempts by Parker to discuss merger possibilities before US Airways made its offer public last month. The Delta executive said he was surprised to learn of the offer while listening to the radio at home before going to work. "I would have handled it differently," Grinstein said.

FCC Chair Acts To Clear Vote On Telecoms By GOP Panelist (USAT)

By Leslie Cauley

USA Today, December 6, 2006

NEW YORK — If you can't settle through negotiation, why not try a different approach?

So it goes these days at the Federal Communications Commission, which is using legal maneuvering to break its 2-2 deadlock on the pending AT&T-BellSouth merger.

The $80 billion deal just needs FCC approval to close. It already has received the other necessary approval, from the Department of Justice, which imposed no conditions.

Last week, FCC Chairman Kevin Martin asked the panel's third Republican to cast the tiebreaking vote on the deal. The commissioner, Robert McDowell, has recused himself because he worked as a lobbyist for a trade group opposing the deal. McDowell also cited ethical concerns of the Virginia Bar Association.

An official can be unrecused if the FCC's general counsel determines that the need for his or her participation outweighs public ethics concerns.

Gene Kimmelman, public policy director of Consumers' Union, which opposes the deal, calls the move "the most unusual thing I've ever seen in my entire career."

Kimmelman says he was helping to negotiate an agreement among AT&T and the two Democrats and Martin when the chairman pulled the plug.

"We thought we were making progress," Kimmelman says. "It's just bizarre."

In moving to unrecuse McDowell, Martin, who declined to comment, cited legal precedent in a case involving the National Association of Broadcasters. But that request to break the FCC stalemate came from the U.S. Court of Appeals after a two-year impasse.

In the AT&T case, the request is from an FCC chairman who openly favors approval with no conditions. And it comes after a stalemate of just two months.

Tuesday, McDowell issued a statement that he is prepared to get up to speed quickly on the AT&T merger should the general counsel unrecuse him.

McDowell offered no comment on the merits of the deal or whether conditions should be attached. He did note that the deal "is not that different from the two (deals) we saw last year," referring to SBC's acquisition of AT&T and Verizon's purchase of MCI.

In those cases, both buyers were forced to divest a number of assets, including hundreds of phone and high-speed broadband lines, to gain approval.

Some lawmakers are unhappy with Martin's actions. Chief among them is Rep. Edward Markey, D-Mass., the ranking Democrat on the House Subcommittee on Telecommunications and the Internet.

In a Monday statement, Markey urged McDowell to abstain from voting "as a matter of principle." The FCC can unrecuse McDowell, but cannot make him vote.

The two holdout Democrats have been pushing AT&T to make concessions in the area of "special access." The term refers, generally, to the high-speed, high-capacity lines that serve business customers across the USA. It's a $16 billion-a-year business. Big carriers like AT&T continue to dominate the segment by dint of their size and reach.

By the time Martin pulled the plug on talks last week, Kimmelman says AT&T was offering a number of sweeteners, including an offer to sell "naked" DSL — meaning stand-alone DSL with no strings attached or purchase of other services required — for $24.95 a month. That's almost half the $45 price for stand-alone DSL currently.

But he says the carrier did not address a larger issue: its post-merger market power. "AT&T was unwilling to provide strong assurances that they won't abuse the enormous power that they will get with this merger."

Top Democrats Question Move By FCC Chairman On Telecom Deal (HC/AP)

By John Dunbar, Associated Press

Houston Chronicle, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — Two powerful Democrats on Capitol Hill Tuesday night sharply questioned a move by the chairman of the Federal Communications Commission to allow a fellow commissioner who had claimed a conflict of interest to vote on the nation's largest telecommunications industry merger.

Sen. Daniel Inouye, D-Hawaii, wrote FCC Chairman Kevin Martin expressing "disappointment" in Martin's "apparent willingness to waive government recusal rules" to allow former lobbyist and current commissioner Robert McDowell to vote on the proposed merger of San Antonio-based AT&T Inc. and BellSouth Corp.

Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich., along with Rep. Ed Markey, D-Mass., sent a letter to the FCC's general counsel asking 15 pointed questions about past precedent of such recusals and other issues.

Their dismay takes on added significance because the Democrats will take control of Congress in January. Inouye will be chairman of the Senate Commerce, Science and Transportation Committee and Dingell will chair the House Energy and Commerce Committee. Both committees oversee the FCC.

Late Friday, with the commission deadlocked on AT&T Inc.'s proposed $82 billion acquisition of BellSouth Corp., Martin — who favors approval of the deal — told members of Congress that he had asked the FCC's counsel to consider whether to allow McDowell to vote.

McDowell, one of three Republicans on the five-person commission, had recused himself because he is a former lobbyist for a trade group that opposes the merger. Despite that background, Martin is betting McDowell will cast a deciding vote in favor of the deal.

The two Democratic commissioners are demanding the companies offer concessions to ensure the deal won't harm consumers. The Justice Department approved the deal without requiring such concessions.

Inouye, who has been largely quiet on the issue, said waiving the rules and allowing McDowell to vote would derail negotiations over concessions he said were necessary to preserve competition.

He urged Martin to reconsider his decision and "return to serious negotiations with your other colleagues."

In his letter to FCC General Counsel Sam Feder, Dingell and Markey asked what it officially means to be at an impasse and whether it is possible to reach that point since no formal vote has been held.

Neither Inouye nor Dingell have the authority to stop the FCC vote from occurring, but as the chief congressional overseers of the FCC, they are in a position to make life difficult for the chairman.

McDowell once worked for the trade association COMPTEL, which represents companies that compete with AT&T and the other regional Bell phone companies.

Democratic commissioner Michael Copps said allowing McDowell to vote would be "taking a mulligan" and "starting over with a changed set of players." He said the move would "create more problems than it resolves" and "short circuit discussions, and very likely shortchange consumers."

Commissioner Jonathan Adelstein, also a Democrat, said Martin was trying to cut short negotiations "about measures to safeguard choice and competition for consumers."

Federal ethics regulations permit the FCC's general counsel to clear McDowell to vote as long as the government's interest outweighs concerns about how the vote may affect the agency's integrity.

It is unclear how long it will take for the general counsel to reach a determination on whether McDowell should be allowed to vote. The commissioner, who has declined to participate in any conversations about the pending deal, would need time to get up to speed, if he participates.

The next FCC meeting is scheduled for Dec. 20. Dingell and Markey have asked for responses to their questions by Dec. 11.

NYSE-Euronext Steams Ahead As EU Regulators Back Merger (WSJ)

By Alistair Macdonald And Aaron Lucchetti

The Wall Street Journal, December 6, 2006

One of the last major hurdles to a merger of the New York Stock Exchange and Euronext NV was removed yesterday, after European regulators gave their provisional clearance, pushing the first major trans-Atlantic stock-exchange merger toward the finishing line after a six-month battle.

NYSE's likely success will heap further pressure on its fast-growing rival, Nasdaq Stock Market Inc., to do a deal. Last month, Nasdaq made a bid for London Stock Exchange PLC, but London rejected its approach. Nasdaq has acquired a 29% stake in the London exchange since April, but says its bid is a final offer, unless London agrees on a deal or a rival bidder comes in.

The Euronext deal still needs approval from the Dutch finance minister, because the exchange is incorporated in Amsterdam, though operated from Paris. Also, shareholders in Euronext and NYSE Group Inc., which operates the New York Stock Exchange, will vote on the deal in about two weeks. Neither the finance minister nor shareholders are expected to block the creation of what would be a $28 billion company. A spokesman for the Netherlands Finance Ministry said Finance Minister Gerrit Zalm is expected to decide in January.

NYSE-Euronext Group, as the combined company will be called, will have stock exchanges in New York, Paris, Brussels, Lisbon and Amsterdam, as well as a London-based market in the fast-growing sector of derivatives.

Yesterday, Euronext's College of Regulators, which include the market watchdogs of France, Netherlands, the United Kingdom, Belgium and Portugal, said they won't block a deal, subject to commitments from the combined company that will include giving them some limited say over board appointments and future integration of the business. NYSE and Euronext said such conditions are acceptable.

The European regulators also said they were working with the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission on "a memorandum of understanding" for coordinating regulation and supervision of Euronext-NYSE. It will be signed when the deal gets its final approval. The potential for U.S. regulatory interference had been a concern to both market users and investors in Europe.

NYSE's rival suitor for Euronext, Frankfurt stock-market operator Deutsche Börse AG, had sounded this concern unsuccessfully to drum up support for its rival bid.

Euronext and NYSE each need more than 50% of their shareholders to approve the deal. Hedge fund Atticus Capital, which owns almost 10% of the exchange, and French bank Société Générale, which owns about 3.5%, have publicly given their approval.

The share prices of both exchange operators climbed on news of the regulatory clearance, with Euronext closing up 2.3% at €87.30 ($116.35) and NYSE Group trading up $1.55 at $97.60 in 4 p.m. Big Board trading yesterday.

Still, Euronext trades below the valuation of about €93.50 a share under the NYSE bid, indicating investors don't believe the road ahead is entirely clear.

Bloodied Investor Icahn Returns To Flying Solo (WSJ)

By Susan Pulliam And Jennifer S. Forsyth

The Wall Street Journal, December 6, 2006

For years, financier Carl Icahn has been a prominent "activist" investor, attempting to push companies to make changes in a bid to boost their stocks. Now he's being forced to change his game plan in using this brand of investing.

This week Mr. Icahn's partners pulled out of a $4.6 billion bid for Reckson Associates Realty Corp., a real-estate investment trust. Mr. Icahn initially pressed ahead with the Reckson bid on his own. Late Monday night, the Reckson board rejected Mr. Icahn's offer in favor of a merger with SL Green Realty Corp., a rival real-estate trust. Yesterday, Mr. Icahn said he would back out.

"The offer is pretty much done," Mr. Icahn said in an interview. "It's a minor disappointment." Reckson shareholders must decide whether to approve SL Green's cash and stock offer, valued at about $45.56 a share as of yesterday's market close.

The development illustrates the complications for even the savviest shareholders in mounting corporate challenges. These days, companies are launching ever-more aggressive legal and public-relations efforts, among other things, to block such efforts. Competition from industry players is intense.

"It's a daunting proposition to challenge management in a public activist scenario unless you have experience at it," said Ken Squire, who runs 13D Monitor, a research service that tracks activist investing.

Real-estate developer Harry Macklowe and Mack-Cali, a real-estate investment trust, both dropped out of the partnership with Mr. Icahn over the weekend. Now, Mr. Icahn said he is returning to his roots as a solo financier, bringing him full circle in his approach to "activist" investing. Until a couple of years ago, when Mr. Icahn began joining forces with other investors to prod corporate managements to change, he largely had operated on his own.

During difficult management battles, Mr. Icahn said, "most guys fade away." In the end, he said, many investors don't have the stomach for "activist" investing because "it's not easy."

Mr. Icahn could potentially re-emerge if less than two-thirds of Reckson shareholders approve the SL Green merger. The merger agreement has been contentious because of questions about a sale of one-third of the Reckson portfolio to an investor group led by Reckson Chief Executive Scott Rechler for $2.1 billion -- an amount that some investors believe is too low.

Mr. Icahn's bid, by contrast, may have been too high, some analysts say. After due diligence, Mack-Cali found the offer wasn't "in the best interests of its shareholders." Mr. Macklowe backed away at least partly because he couldn't secure the amount of bank financing at the terms he desired, according to a person familiar with the matter. When Mr. Macklowe informed Mr. Icahn that he wasn't prepared to pay $49, Mr. Icahn stayed firm, prompting the partnership's termination. Mr. Macklowe didn't return calls for comment.

It isn't the first time Mr. Icahn's enthusiasm has exceeded that of his partners. When Mr. Icahn -- with the help of another powerful hedge-fund manager, Steven Cohen's SAC Capital Advisors -- made a big investment and waged a proxy contest with Time Warner Inc. in mid-2005, corporate chiefs fretted it was the beginning of a period in which hedge funds would throw their financial muscle around, posing threats to management at even the largest companies. Instead, Mr. Icahn backed away from his proxy battle with Time Warner earlier this year as some of his hedge-fund investors lost their resolve.

Mr. Icahn has made a bundle on his Time Warner investment -- about $210 million, according to people familiar with the situation. Mr. Icahn said Time Warner has adopted many of the measures he had been pushing, including a $20 billion share-buyback program and $1 billion in cost cutting. Mr. Icahn added that he and Richard Parsons, Time Warner's chief executive, have patched together a working relationship and are planning to dine together this week. "We meet every few months," he said.

REAL-ESTATE PLAY

The Situation: Shareholders of Reckson Associates Realty Corp., a Uniondale, N.Y., real-estate investment trust, are to vote today on whether to merge with SL Green Realty Corp., another REIT.

The Bids: SL Green is offering cash and stock valued at $45.56 as of yesterday's close, about $4.1 billion not including debt assumption. The Reckon board rejected a late bid by financier Carl Icahn offering $1.1 billion in cash and $3.3 billion in a new class of stock in American Real Estate Partners LP, a publicly traded company that is 90% owned by Mr. Icahn.

The Controversy: The SL Green merger agreement has been contentious because of a secondary transaction in which SL Green is selling back about one-third of the Reckson portfolio to an investor group led by Reckson Chief Executive Scott Rechler for $2.1 billion, a price some shareholders say is low.

Even though his partners haven't shown much staying power, Mr. Icahn has had successes this year. His hedge fund, a private investment pool for wealthy individuals and institutions, is up 26.3% this year, compared with hedge-fund returns averaging 9% this year.

His hedge fund has made a profit of $300 million on its investment in Kerr-McGee Corp., an Oklahoma City energy and chemicals producer, and a profit of $175 million on its investment in South Korea's KT&G, South Korea's dominant tobacco maker, which it has sold. American Real Estate Partners LP also sold NEG Oil & Gas LLC to Riata Energy Inc. for $1.26 billion, giving it a return of about 40% on the investment.

Mr. Icahn, 70 years old, isn't the only veteran investor who is shifting gears. Last week Kirk Kerkorian, 89, sold his stake in General Motors Corp. stock after finding the battle to persuade management to adopt his plans for the company more difficult than he expected.

Said Mr. Icahn: "Activism is a lot more difficult than it looks."

Mr. Icahn is adapting to fit with the market changes since he began making investments for his hedge fund in 2005, which has quadrupled in size, to $4 billion in assets. About half of the increase stems from profits on investments with the rest from new investor money.

In a twist, Mr. Icahn is trying to buy shares in companies a step ahead of private-equity players, who make a profit by buying and selling companies. "It's no secret which companies are set up well for leverage buyouts," he said. Mr. Icahn says investment bankers call him and say: "This is a good one" for (a private-equity firm) -- "why don't you look at it?"

Ryanair Offers Airport Slots In EU's Review Of Aer Lingus Bid (BLOOM)

By Matthew Newman

Bloomberg, December 6, 2006

Dec. 5 (Bloomberg) -- Ryanair Holdings Plc, Europe's biggest discount airline, has offered to sell slots at eight airports, including London's Heathrow, to win European Union antitrust approval to buy Aer Lingus Plc.

Ryanair told the European Commission, the EU's antitrust authority in Brussels, that it would sell as many as four Aer Lingus slots at Heathrow if its bid for the carrier succeeds, according to a document submitted to the regulator last week. It also offered slots at Stansted Airport near London and airports serving Frankfurt, Paris, Milan, Rome, Bratislava and Barcelona.

``The purpose is to allow one or more entrants to operate a new or additional non-stop scheduled daily frequencies on the 8 identified relevant airport pairs," said the document, which was obtained by Bloomberg News today.

Ryanair Chief Executive Officer Michael O'Leary has pursued the 1.48 billion-euro ($2 billion) hostile takeover of Ireland's flag carrier to add routes to the U.S. The Irish government and Aer Lingus employee shareholders, who together control almost 40 percent of the carrier, have rejected the offer, which expires Dec. 22. Ryanair said on Nov. 21 that it won't raise its offer.

Peter Sherrard, a spokesman for Ryanair, and commission spokesman Jonathan Todd declined to comment.

Gillian Culhane, a spokeswoman for Aer Lingus in Dublin, couldn't be reached for comment. A spokeswoman at Drury Communications, the airline's public-relations company, said the airline wouldn't be commenting.

Government Resistance

The Irish government, which has a 25 percent stake in Aer Lingus, is ``unlikely to support" the sale of the Heathrow slots to defend the public's interest in connections in London, according to Aer Lingus's prospectus when it was partially privatized.

The government's stake plus a further 5 percent of shareholders is enough to block any sale of the Heathrow slots.

Rival airlines would have ``limited interest" in Ryanair's other offers, such as up to four slots at Girona, an airport 104 kilometers (64 miles) from Barcelona, said Nick van den Brul, an analyst at Exane BNP Paribas in London.

The commission will decide by Dec. 20 whether to approve the deal, refer it to another antitrust authority or launch a four-month investigation.

Ryanair on Oct. 23 acquired a 19.2 percent stake and offered 2.80 euros a share for the rest of Aer Lingus. The discount carrier then spent about 87.5 million euros Nov. 29 to boost its stake to 25.2 percent.

Ship's Crewmen Plead Guilty To Covering Up Oil Dumping (AP)

AP, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) _ The chief engineer and second engineer of a South Korean cargo vessel have pleaded guilty to environmental crimes and obstruction of justice for covering up illegal dumping of oil residue at sea, the U.S. Department of Justice announced Tuesday.

The owner and operator of the vessel, Sun Ace Shipping Co., based in Seoul, South Korea, previously pleaded guilty in the case and agreed to pay a $400,000 fine and $100,000 to New Jersey environmental organizations.

Chief engineer Chang-Sig O pleaded guilty to obstruction of justice for maintaining a false oil record book and lying to the Coast Guard about his knowledge of hoses used to bypass shipboard pollution control equipment.

Second engineer Mun Sig Wang pleaded guilty to violating the Act to Prevent Pollution from Ships for presenting a false oil record book to Coast Guard inspectors who boarded the ship in Camden on Jan. 3.

Inspectors learned that crew members had dumped oily waste into the ocean at least two times on their voyage from South Korea, the Justice Department said.

International and U.S. law prohibit such discharges without treatment by an oil-water separator, and then require all discharges be recorded in an oil record book.

Chang-Sig O faces up to five years in prison and a $250,000 fine. Mun Sig Wang faces up to six years in prison and a $250,000 fine. The Justice Department announcement did not mention a sentencing date.

Activists Use Research To Win Pollution Battles (USAT)

By Charisse Jones

USA Today, December 6, 2006

Whether it's bus fumes in Harlem or nuclear waste in Utah, advocates for minority and poor communities do homework needed to win 'environmental justice'

NEW YORK — The buses idle along 146th Street, the faint smell of diesel exhaust in the air. The weathered brick bus depot sits across the street from day care and recreation centers for seniors and children.

Millicent Redick raised a son and daughter here in Harlem, across the street from the city's Mother Clara Hale Bus Depot. She recalls how they both suffered from eczema and asthma. "I was always led to believe that I had to keep the dust out of my apartment, so I cleaned all the time," says Redick, 61, a retired accountant. "But I was never informed that the air we were breathing played a role. … I thought it was all me."

Then she learned of connections between pollution and asthma attacks, and cleaning up the air became her new mission. "I've always felt strongly that no matter where I live, I have a right to everything every other community has," she says. "That's what I fought for."

Five of Manhattan's six bus depots are north of 96th Street. The struggle by residents and activists against that concentration is one of many environmental battles being waged around the nation in a campaign to improve the health and safety of poor and minority communities.

"People are not … taking the poison quietly," says Robert Bullard, director of Clark Atlanta University's Environmental Justice Resource Center and author of the book Dumping in Dixie: Race, Class, and Environmental Quality. "Over the last decade or so, not only do you have communities fighting, but they also have developed alliances and coalitions with scientists and lawyers and economists."

Neighborhood activists from California to Washington, D.C., are using a growing body of research on how pollutants exacerbate illness to block the building of facilities, relocate residents from contaminated communities and gain other concessions from large firms.

"One of the problems with all environmental struggles, but particularly when you have the overlay of environmental racism, is the community always has the burden of proof of harm," says Elizabeth Crowe, an organizer with the Kentucky Environmental Foundation in Berea, Ky. Now, "we have much more definitive information as to how bad this stuff is. … So the science is catching up to the experiences of folks on the ground, and it helps prove the point."

Among recent developments:

·A group in Port Arthur, Texas, signed an agreement on Nov. 6 with Motiva Enterprises under which the oil company will pour up to $3.5 million into the impoverished neighborhood as it expands a refinery there. The money will help fund new local businesses.

·A plan to build a nuclear waste storage facility on the Skull Valley Goshute Indian reservation in Utah was scuttled in September by the federal Bureau of Land Management and Bureau of Indian Affairs. The agencies were concerned that it would have a negative impact on the reservation, says attorney Paul EchoHawk, who represented tribal members opposing the project.

·From Sept. 24 to Oct. 1, representatives of more than 70 social justice and human rights groups toured the nation by bus caravan, visiting communities where residents face health problems associated with pollution.

Upper Manhattan's bus depots, many of them former trolley barns, have been around for nearly a century. The New York City Council's transportation committee held a hearing in October on the concentration of bus depots in Harlem, which has the city's highest rate of asthma hospitalizations for children 14 and younger, according to the city Department of Health and Mental Hygiene. The department says diesel particulates have been proved to worsen asthma.

"We think (the depots are) very, very responsible for the high asthma rates in the community," says Kizzy Charles-Guzman, policy coordinator of the group WE ACT for Environmental Justice. "It goes beyond air quality. … It's also quality of life impact. You have constant noise and vibrations from the buses, and we also have sanitation truck depots and sewage treatment facilities. … We're not necessarily saying let's shut down the depots and move them all over the city, but if all the clean buses the (bus agency) claims to have in the fleet were assigned to these particular depots, that would help."

MTA New York City Transit, which operates 4,489 buses, says it is dealing with pollution. "No one has done more to improve air quality than New York City Transit," spokesman Charles Seaton says. "We have more than 350 hybrid electric buses on the road. … And the majority of them are in depots in Upper Manhattan."

The environmental justice movement took root in the South in the early 1980s, when activists, church leaders and residents complained that toxic waste sites and other polluters often were located in poor and black neighborhoods. Their protests merged the struggle for a clean environment with that of civil rights.

Winning environmental justice cases in court has become more difficult since a 2001 Supreme Court decision increased the legal burden for those filing suit under the 1964 Civil Rights Act by requiring proof of intentional discrimination, Bullard says.

Analyzing the location of many landfills, chemical plants and highways, Bullard says, "you have to ask is this random or patterns that follow historically the path of least resistance? … If you don't have a lot of resources in terms of money, experts, lawyers and political leaders to divert those things, you are going to get (them)."

Ted Cromwell, senior director of security and operations for the American Chemistry Council, which represents leading U.S. chemical firms, says businesses don't target certain communities.

"In the vast majority of situations, chemical plants have been in place for many, many years," Cromwell says. Since the late 1980s, emissions from group members' factories have dropped more than 75%, he says. "It's not so much plants being sited in these communities as it is communities building up around them and over time the demographics change."

Some activists see progress. Companies increasingly are trying to create safer products, says Crowe of the Kentucky foundation. "What community organizers look for is … steps forward."

In the Port Arthur case, Hilton Kelley says the agreement he and his organization, Community In-Power and Development Association (CIDA), reached with Motiva is "a significant victory" for his neighborhood.

"We found out it would be difficult to stop the (refinery) expansion, but we were able to negotiate some things for our community's well-being and for our economic stability," Kelley says.

Kelley and his group had challenged Motiva's application to increase the production capacity of its refinery from 275,000 to 600,000 barrels of crude a day. Motiva now has agreed to provide air- pollution monitors and other controls. It also will help finance a local health clinic to offset the medical expenses of residents and supplement services for the diagnosis and treatment of asthma and other respiratory ailments in children.

Extensive pollution controls at the facility were planned before the community challenge, says Rick Strouse, a refinery manager. However, "CIDA had some concerns. I think we've resolved them."

In New York City, concerns remain over the buses in Harlem.

"This is first and foremost a health issue that is important to the residents and children of Harlem," says City Councilman John Liu, who heads the committee that held the hearing. "Secondly, it's a simple matter of honest accountability."

Redick, who has lived in her Harlem apartment for 38 years, says neighbors living closest to the depot entrance never "can open their windows. Never."

She has also noticed the cough her 4-year-old granddaughter develops when she visits — which disappears once she returns home. So Redick fights on.

"I have a right to walk down the street," she says, "and see flowers and trees and pretty buildings and people with smiles on their faces."

Leave Bristol Bay Alone (NYT)

President Bush is thinking about rescinding a longstanding presidential order that specifically prohibits oil and gas drilling in Alaska's pristine Bristol Bay. He should resist the impulse to do so, no matter how powerful the entreaties from his friends in the oil business. Drilling in Bristol Bay would threaten one of the nation's most productive fisheries without appreciably strengthening the nation's long-term energy security.

Bristol Bay occupies over 33 million acres of open sea, islands and estuaries just north of where the Aleutian Islands meet the Alaskan mainland. It is home to the world's largest wild salmon run and the source of a commercial fishing industry with an estimated annual value of nearly $2 billion. In the furor following the Exxon Valdez oil spill in 1989, the bay was placed off limits to drilling, first by Congress, and then, in 1998, by President Clinton.

The presidential prohibition has remained in effect even though the Congressional moratorium was lifted in 2003 when Alaska's Ted Stevens — overriding protests from local fishing interests — called in all the chits he had accumulated as head of the Senate Appropriations Committee.

The Interior Department now wants to make about one-fifth of the bay available for leasing — a move, it says, that could create 11,000 jobs and "net benefits" of about $7.7 billion in oil and gas. But this would be a one-shot deal, and the numbers are trivial compared with the country's overall resources. More to the point, they pale in comparison to the sustainable year-after-year yields from a fishing industry that could be devastated — as was Prince William Sound in 1989 — by another major spill.

Mr. Bush has been speaking out lately about the importance of making America more energy independent. Few things are more important for the new Democratic Congress than developing an energy policy more heavily weighted toward conservation, efficiency and development of alternatives to traditional fossil fuels. This might be a rare area in which both sides can work together, but opening Bristol Bay to drilling would be exactly the wrong way to begin the conversation.

FBI Needs To Step Back Before Moving Forward, IG Says (FCW)

By Dibya Sarkar

Federal Computer Week, December 6, 2006

Although the FBI is forging ahead with establishing an interoperable fingerprint system with the Homeland Security Department, the Justice Department needs to regroup following a failed $1.18 million effort to modernize a system that manages evidence, according to a semi-annual report released by Justice's inspector general.

The recently released 66-page IG report, which summarizes the office's audits, investigations, inspections and special reviews, provided updates on several information technology initiatives Justice agencies started.

In March, after two and a half years, FBI officials terminated a contract with a private company for a commercial laboratory information management system that would have used bar code technology to track evidence and improve reporting capabilities at the FBI Laboratory in Quantico, Va. "After many delays and extensive customization" the system did not meet the agency's security requirements, the IG report states.

According to the report, the initiative began before the agency's IT investment management processes were established, making it difficult to identify problems with the contract and adequately document security requirements for certification and accreditation of the software. Among several recommendations, the IG report states that an experienced IT manager must oversee any future project.

The laboratory conducts more than 1 million examinations of physical evidence annually, but the current system is limited in tracking evidence and reporting capabilities.

However, the joint initiative to make the bureau's 10-fingerprint Integrated Automated Fingerprint Identification System interoperable with DHS' two-fingerprint Automated Biometric Identification System is on track, the IG report states. In the first phase of the three-phase project, both agencies will establish a joint automated system to share important immigration and law enforcement data. The other two phases will focus on expanding the shared data and access by various federal, state and local law enforcement agencies to that data. The initiative is scheduled to be complete by December 2009.

"When the interoperability effort is completed, a single request will search all fingerprint records maintained by the FBI and the DHS, and the requestor will receive all associated criminal history and immigration information about an individual," according to the IG report.

The IG report also provided updates with respect to the Federal Information Security Management Act (FISMA).

A review found that systems within the FBI; the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosive (ATF); the Drug Enforcement Agency (DEA); and the Justice Management Division (JMD) were all certified and accredited, security controls were tested and evaluated in the past year, and contingency plans were in compliance with FISMA. However, the FBI, ATF and DEA did not perform electronic authentication risk assessments, and the FBI and ATF did not fully implement Justice's process for tracking system vulnerabilities and corrective actions, the IG report adds.

"Moreover, departmentwide system configuration policy was not always implemented as required within the DEA and JMD," the IG report states. "With respect to IT security awareness training, we found that ATF did not fully ensure that all of its employees were trained as required by department policy."

The IG's office is also reviewing and evaluating several classified and unclassified systems within several Justice agencies and plans to issue reports this fiscal year.

In assessing compliance with the Office of Management and Budget guidelines for securing sensitive data, the IG report states that although Justice is implementing additional security controls to protect personally identifiable information, it is not fully compliant for all automated systems.

"For example, the department failed to ensure that personally identifiable information is transported and stored off-site only in encrypted form," the report states. "We also found that the department is not requiring users who access the system remotely to provide two independent ways of authenticating identity, as required by the National Institute of Standards and Technology Special Publications 800-53 and 800-53 A."

Additionally, Justice has established a task force to develop a comprehensive approach to secure wireless access to personally identifiable data on the internal systems and assess technical solutions for remote access.

FBI Denies Woes In Data-sharing Computer System (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, December 6, 2006

The FBI says a new computer system -- introduced last year as a replacement for a failed case-file program -- is within cost and on schedule to be fully operational by 2009, despite criticisms in a report this week by the Justice Department's Office of Inspector General.

In a report released this week, Inspector General Glenn A. Fine said that the new program, known as Sentinel, faced a $56.7 million funding gap and that although it could still prove to be successful with careful oversight, the Bush administration's funding request for this year's share of the $425 million system is short of what is needed.

"The FBI appreciates the Inspector General's continued interest and assessment of the Sentinel program," the bureau said. "The OIG performed the audit at the request of the FBI Director and Congress. This audit was the second in a series of audits to evaluate the progress and implementation of Sentinel.

"According to the audit the FBI has made 'good progress' in addressing the concerns surrounding staffing, information sharing, earned value management, cost tracking and controls, and documentation that were identified in the first audit report," it said.

The FBI said Phase II of the Sentinel program is expected to cost about $157 million. As part of President Bush's fiscal 2007 budget request, $100 million in funding was requested and the balance of $57 million "has long been identified from existing FBI balances and will not impact operational programs."

"The total project cost for Sentinel was budgeted at a cost of $425 million and that figure remains the same. Characterizations to the contrary are misleading," the FBI said. "At this time, Sentinel is within cost and schedule."

The Sentinel program was introduced last year as a replacement for the failed Virtual Case File system and is scheduled to be fully operational by 2009, as part of an FBI effort to close internal communication gaps and improve information sharing with other law-enforcement and intelligence agencies.

The system will be built by Lockheed Martin Corp. on a $305 million contract. The FBI also expects to spend about $120 million evaluating the system.

FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III has said the Sentinel program will "strengthen the FBI's capabilities by replacing its primarily paper-based reporting system with an electronic system designed for information sharing."

"Sentinel will support our current priorities, including our No. 1 priority: preventing terrorist attacks," he said.

The Sentinel program will deliver an electronic information-management system, automate work-flow processes for the first time and provide a user-friendly Web-based interface to access and search across multiple databases. It is designed to help the FBI manage information beyond the case-focus of the existing Automated Case Support (ACS) and will provide enhanced information-sharing and search-and-analysis capabilities.

Sentinel also is expected to facilitate information sharing with members of the law-enforcement and intelligence communities. Mr. Mueller is scheduled to testify today during a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing on FBI oversight.

20 Alleged Gang Members Arrested In Drug Trafficking Sting (AP)

By Sophia Tareen

AP, December 6, 2006

CHICAGO - Twenty alleged street gang members have been arrested on charges of running of sophisticated drug trafficking operation in the culmination of what officials said was a three-year undercover investigation, authorities announced Tuesday.

Since the investigation began, 38 alleged members of the Latin Kings street gang have been charged and at least 20 individuals - including several men believed to be top leaders - are in custody on drug and weapons charges, U.S. Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald said during a news conference.

The charges are included in 13 separate federal complaints filed or unsealed Tuesday.

"We pretty much decapitated the Latin Kings on the South Side," said Andrew Traver, a special agent with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, the main agency involved in the investigation.

Among Tuesday's arrests were 36-year-old Fernando "Ace" King of Chicago, who authorities allege is a gang leader. He is charged with attempted drug possession with the intent to distribute.

"If you take out the main person, you also send a message to gang leaders that the position comes with a price," Fitzgerald said.

Also arrested was Anthony "Loks" Compean of Cicero, believed to be the second-in-command, authorities said. Compean, 29, has been charged with intent to distribute narcotics.

It was unclear Tuesday who was representing King. Compean's attorney, Todd S. Pugh, declined comment Tuesday evening because he was just receiving the complaint. They were to appear Wednesday in U.S. District Court.

Authorities said they had an informant who wore a wiretap during the investigation and officials seized more than 15 kilograms of cocaine and 90 guns - including at least seven AK47 rifles.

"Every one of these guns is one less crime that won't take place, " Traver said.

Authorities showcased an organizational flow chart Tuesday, detailing what they believed to be the gang's inner workings and systematic coverage of seven regions around the Chicago area.

The Latin Kings street gang in Chicago started in the 1960s as a social club in the Humboldt Park neighborhood, according to Mike Casey, an ATF supervisory special agent.

Officials said their influence has grown to a "tightly controlled narcotics distribution empire." Though the group's presence has been strongest on the city's South Side, authorities said their operations also are active in the suburbs.

"It's time for a lot of people to wake up and see, gangs do not see borders," said Cook County Sheriff Tom Dart.

Feds Make Landmark Arrest Of 30 Gang Leaders (WMAQ)

WMAQ-TV, NBC 5, Chicago, December 6, 2006

CHICAGO -- A lengthy federal probe leads to the arrest of nearly 30 gang leaders in Chicago.

Federal agents moved in on the gang on Tuesday.

"Operation Broken Crown" started when a member of the Southside Latin Kings began cooperating with ATF agents.

Federal authorities were able to infiltrate the gang, described as one of the area's largest and most violent drug trafficking street gangs.

Officials made a point to say they're "not going to pretend to end the drug wars with this arrest or end gangs with this arrest, but we're making a dent and we'll keep pushing."

Numerous automatic weapons were also seized during the undercover operation.

Feds Arrest Latin Kings Gang Leader (CHIT)

By Jeff Coen And Rudolph Bush

Chicago Tribune, December 6, 2006

A Chicago man described by federal authorities as "the CEO of the Latin Kings Nation on the South Side" was taken into custody early Tuesday, capping a three-year investigation into the operations of the violent street gang.

Fernando "Ace" King was among 18 gang members whose arrests were announced Tuesday by U.S. Atty. Patrick Fitzgerald. King had the title of "Supreme Inca," running the gang's drug empire on the city's South Side and the south suburbs, officials said. There are only a small circle of leaders above him, including Gustavo "Gino" Colon, the gang's imprisoned head, officials said.

"It may seem pretty cool to be a Supreme Inca when you're the leader on the street of a gang until the title 'Supreme Inca' becomes 'lead defendant,'" Fitzgerald said.

The Latin Kings operate in seven regions in Chicago, including the southwest and northwest suburbs, authorities said.

King is one of 38 members and associates charged in the case after investigators with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives used wiretaps and undercover drug purchases to crack the gang's operations. He was charged with intent to distribute cocaine as part of "Operation Broken Crown," which is billed as the most significant federal effort against the Latin Kings since the takedown of Colon in 1998.

Others in the case are charged with a wide range of drug and gun violations.

The investigation began in 2003, when a longtime gang member agreed to cooperate and provided investigators with access to the organization's structure, authorities said. About 90 guns were seized during the probe, along with more than 15 kilograms of cocaine.

Investigators said they hoped the case would have an effect in many of the subregions controlled by King.

"I think at this point we've pretty much decapitated the Latin Kings on the South Side," said Andrew Traver, special agent in charge of the Chicago ATF.

Traver said support in executing arrest warrants early Tuesday came from a variety of federal agencies, the Cook County sheriff's office and police in Summit, Hickory Hills, Stickney and Orland Park.

King's alleged second in command, 29-year-old Anthony Compean of Cicero, was charged with conspiring to distribute cocaine.

Compean, known on the street as "Loks," was charged after a cooperating gang member was arrested by the ATF early this year and decided to help investigators.

The gang member, who was not identified, has a rap sheet that includes a 1997 attempted murder conviction in Cook County and a 1999 drug conviction in Texas. He told authorities he knew Compean as a Latin Kings leader in "Chi-Town" and agreed to record drug transactions with him, according to a criminal complaint against Compean.

During a March meeting at the gang member's house, Compean agreed to sell the man a half-kilogram of cocaine for $10,000, the complaint states.

Compean's lawyer, Todd Pugh, declined to comment Tuesday, saying he has not had a chance to read the complaint.

Oscar Diaz, 32, of Blue Island, the alleged southwest regional leader of the gang, was charged with providing a Russian assault rifle to a cooperating witness in November, a gun delivered to Elmhurst. Danny "Fat Danny" Aguilar, 29, of Justice, the gang's alleged regional enforcer, was charged with conspiracy to distribute drugs.

In the case against King, a former gang member cooperating with federal agents recorded conversations with King in which drug deals were discussed, according to a criminal complaint released Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0103043

On Monday, the informant provided King with a kilogram of what King thought was cocaine, leading to his arrest and the charges against him. The informant told agents that he understood King to report to no one but the gang's highest echelon.

An attorney for King could not immediately be reached for comment.

Fitzgerald said authorities hoped investigations such as the one that ended Tuesday would send a message to would-be gang leaders that such a position comes with a price.

New Cook County Sheriff Tom Dart said the case should also be a warning for suburban residents that street gangs are entrenched in their neighborhoods too.

"For those people who still feel for some reason that gang crime is centered in the city of Chicago and does not touch suburban Cook County, if this is not their wake-up call, I don't know what they're looking for," Dart said. "Gangs do not see borders."

Bay City News Wire, December 6, 2006

(BCN) SAN FRANCISCO Eight members of San Francisco's Down Below Gang will spend years in prison after pleading guilty to federal racketeering and drug-dealing charges Monday, according to the U.S. attorney's office.

The gang, whose turf lies in the Sunnydale housing projects in Visitacion Valley, has been involved in criminal activity such as selling crack cocaine and intimidation for years, according to U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan.

Four of the gang members admitted to committing acts of violence as egregious as murder, robbery and carjacking.

For their crimes, Don Johnson, 20, agreed to 23 years in federal prison; Robert Calloway, 22, agreed to more than 17 years; Dornell Ellis, 25, agreed to almost 16 years; and Ricky Rollins, 21, agreed to 15 years.

The admissions help police put to rest at least three murder cases from 2004.

The defendants admitted to murdering Beverly Daryl Robinson on April 15, Kenya Taylor on June 25 and Jacquain Williams on Oct. 14.

The pleas are the result of a joint investigation by the FBI and the San Francisco Police Department.

Ryan thanked the two organizations in a statement.

"We continue to be committed to bringing peace and justice to communities that have been devastated by gang violence," Ryan said in a statement. "These guilty pleas mark a significant step in the resolution of this prosecution."

The other four defendants face sentences of up to seven years.

Christopher Byes, 26; Paris Ragland, 21; Ronnie Calloway, 26; and Allen Calloway, 24, all admitted to conspiracy to distribute controlled substances.

Police Chief Heather Fong also highlighted the cooperation between federal and local authorities.

"A violent criminal street gang has been removed from the streets of San Francisco," Fong said in a statement. "This case represents a historic chapter in San Francisco's commitment to ending gang and gun violence."

SAN FRANCISCO Guilty Pleas In Gang Case (SFC)

By Rachel Gordon, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, December 6, 2006

Eight members of a violent San Francisco street gang involved in murder and the trafficking of narcotics and weapons pleaded guilty Monday to federal racketeering and conspiracy charges, the U.S. attorney's office announced Monday.

The defendants admitted responsibility for a number of crimes, including murder, attempted murder, conspiracy to commit murder, robbery, carjacking and various drug offenses. The FBI and the San Francisco Police Department led the joint investigation.

The Down Below Gang is based in the violence-plagued Sunnydale public housing project in San Francisco's Visitacion Valley neighborhood on the south side of the city.

Authorities, who obtained indictments last year, said the gang sold drugs and engaged in armed robbery to help finance its operation. Its members also killed rivals. Prosecutors used the federal Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organization Act to go after the gang.

"In their plea agreements, several defendants admitted to significant acts of violence, including three murders," said U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan, who is in charge of the agency's Northern California office. Four of the defendants admitted involvement in the murders of Beverly Daryl Robinson, Kenya Taylor and Jacquain Williams, all of which took place in 2004.

The four men who pleaded guilty are Don Johnson, 20; Robert Calloway, 22; Dornell Ellis, 25; and Rickey Rollins, 21. They agreed to sentences ranging from 15 years to 23 years in federal prison. Any prospect of the death penalty has been taken off the table.

The four other defendants pleaded guilty to drug-related charges, according to federal prosecutors. They are Christopher Byes, 26; Paris Ragland, 21; Ronnie Calloway, 26; and Allen Calloway, 24. Their sentences will range from 21 months to 77 months in federal prison.

Man Cooperates For Less Jail Time (CHCP)

By Leo Strupczewski, Courier-Post Staff

Cherry Hill Courier-Post, December 6, 2006

TRENTON -- A Camden gang member who cooperated with federal investigators was sentenced Friday to 10 years in federal prison for his role in a drug trafficking organization, the U.S. Attorney's Office said.

U.S. District Judge Freda L. Wolfson said she recognized the need to reward Lamont Powell, also known as "Mont G," 29, for his cooperation. Had he not cooperated, Powell would have faced a sentence of anywhere from 30 years to life.

Powell will also serve eight years of supervised release and pay a $2,000 fine after his prison sentence.

The sentence stems from a April 15, 2004 plea agreement in which Powell pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to distribute and possession with the intent to distribute heroin and crack cocaine.

Powell was a member of the "Tuten Organization," a notorious drug gang. After his arrest, he cooperated with federal investigators to convict other gang members, including one of the organization's leaders, Leonard Paulk of Camden.

Powell also testified against two leaders of another drug organization called the "Perez Organization." Those men -- Bernard Murray and Allen Resto, both of Camden -- were convicted on charges of conspiracy to distribute heroin and crack cocaine and gun-related charges, including use of an AK-47 rifle and three handguns.

Wolfson said rewarding Powell sent a message to the community about the importance of cooperating with the government.

Doctor Or Dealer? (ORS)

By Karen P. Tandy, Special To The Sentinel

The Orlando Sentinel, December 6, 2006

To find new patients, Dr. Freddie Williams, a general practitioner in Panama City in the Florida Panhandle, would send two recruiters, one of whom was a heroin addict, searching for people looking for easy prescription drugs -- and frequently found them in bars. The recruiters were paid in OxyContin prescriptions, and the new "patients" received practically limitless amounts of high potency OxyContin. The OxyContin was not for pain, nor any other medicinal purpose, but simply for abuse. Patients were injecting and snorting it for the heroin-like high it gave.

Williams created addicts. Patients were overdosing. Parents called his practice pleading for him not to give their children any more drugs. He did anyway. Williams was even demanding sex in exchange for prescriptions.

He was diverting so many OxyContin pills to abusers and traffickers that after Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) agents and our partners arrested him, the street price of OxyContin nearly doubled in the area because of the significantly diminished availability of OxyContin. Similarly, pharmacy burglaries and patients seeking treatment increased.

A jury convicted Williams on 94 counts of conspiracy to distribute controlled substances and health-care fraud, among other violations, and he was sentenced to life imprisonment.

Fortunately, these kinds of criminal doctors are few and far between. In any given year, including 2005, fewer than one in every 10,000 physicians in the United States -- less than 0.01 percent-loses their authority to prescribe controlled substances based on a DEA investigation.

These few doctors cause grave harm and contribute to the alarming prescription-drug-abuse problem in our country. Prescription controlled substances are the second most abused type of drugs -- behind only marijuana. Nearly one out of every 10 high-school seniors abuses dangerous painkillers.

The addictions these drugs cause are rapidly swelling the number of Americans seeking treatment -- 63,000 at last count. The consequences can turn deadly as illustrated by the deaths of Jason Surks of New Jersey and Ryan Haight of California, who died at ages 19 and 18 after overdosing on prescription narcotics they obtained through the Internet. The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention report that Jason and Ryan are part of a disturbing trend: Prescription painkillers now cause more drug-overdose deaths than cocaine and heroin, combined.

It is DEA's job to enforce the laws of this nation to ensure pharmaceutical narcotics and other controlled drugs are used only for the health and welfare of the public. Prescription drugs help millions of Americans every day, but when these drugs harm citizens' health, feed addictions, ruin innocent lives and put more dangerous substances in our neighborhoods, the DEA must target that diversion and those responsible.

In September, the DEA announced three steps to ensure that people who medically need drugs get them, and that those who are diverting them, don't. We issued a proposed rule that will make it easier for patients with chronic pain or other chronic conditions to avoid multiple trips to a physician. The DEA also released a first-of-its-kind pain statement to give the medical community the information they requested on prescribing and dispensing controlled substances to treat pain. Finally, DEA launched a new page on our Web site (www.dea.gov) to provide everyone with the facts on DEA cases against the small number of doctors who violate federal drug laws.

There is much debate within the medical community about how chronic pain should be treated, how aggressively and with what medications. The DEA doesn't enter into that debate except to ensure the drugs aren't being diverted for illegal purposes as we are required to do by federal law. Doctors need to practice medicine as they have been trained to do and as they are sworn to do: to help their patients. The DEA in turn will do what we are sworn to do: to protect the American public by putting dealers like Williams out of business.

Hearing Set For Chargers Player Accused Of Shipping Codeine Cough Syrup (KGTV)

KGTV-TV, December 5, 2006

SAN DIEGO -- A Feb. 7 preliminary hearing was set Tuesday for a Chargers player accused of getting codeine-based cough syrup from a friend who worked at a San Diego pharmacy and trying to ship it to his home state of Texas.

Terrance Kiel faces a maximum of seven years and four months in state prison if convicted of five felony charges: three counts of possession for sale of a controlled substance and two counts of transporting a controlled substance, said Deputy District Attorney James Fontaine.

The 26-year-old safety, out of custody on $160,000 bail, was arrested Sept. 26 at team practice after federal agents searched his car and locker.

Drug Enforcement Administration agents said they intercepted two FedEx packages containing 18 pint bottles of the codeine-based cough syrup in June and September.

Prosecutors alleged Monday that Hope Devina Vines, 30, was stealing codeine-based cough syrup from her employer, Sharp Rees-Stealy, and giving it to Kiel.

Vines, charged with grand theft and possession for sale of a controlled substance, was released on her own recognizance, Fontaine said. A readiness conference was set for Dec. 14.

A bar code on one of the codeine bottles that Kiel tried to ship was traced back to the pharmacy where Vines worked, Fontaine said. Other bottles that were intercepted seem to have bar codes that had been scratched off, the prosecutor said.

The prosecutor said earlier that the amount of cough syrup with codeine that Kiel allegedly tried to ship did not constitute "personal-use quantities."

Defense attorney Bob Grimes said adding a co-defendant wouldn't change the case against Kiel much.

Bottles of codeine-based cough syrup sell for up to $325 on the street in Texas, where people are known to mix the drug with soft drinks and refer to it as "lean," according to the DEA.

Kiel allegedly admitted knowing that it was a controlled substance that he was shipping. The athlete paid cash to ship the parcels, even though he has an account with FedEx, according to the DEA.

Kiel is among five Chargers players arrested since last spring.

In early April, linebacker Shaun Phillips was taken into custody for allegedly resisting arrest when officers tried to detain him over an alleged domestic dispute. No charges were filed.

A week later, linebacker Steve Foley was jailed following a scuffle with police at a University City hotel.

Over the Labor Day weekend, Foley got into another confrontation with police, this time when an off-duty Coronado officer tried to pull him over on suspicion of drunken driving.

An ensuing pursuit ended outside the linebacker's Poway home, where the lawman opened fire as Foley allegedly advanced on him in a threatening manner. Foley, who was hospitalized with multiple gunshot wounds, is facing misdemeanor DUI charges.

On Oct. 9, the Chargers released practice squad defensive back Markus Curry following his arrest on suspicion of domestic violence.

On Nov. 27, cornerback Cletis Gordon was arrested on suspicion of driving drunk in the Gaslamp Quarter.

Pharmacy Worker Arrested In Terrence Kiel Case (KFMB)

KFMB-TV,, December 6, 2006

A pharmacy technician working at a downtown medical building is being accused Tuesday of supplying San Diego Charger Terrence Kiel with the codeine-based cough syrup he allegedly shipped to Texas.

According to drug enforcement agents, 30-year-old Hope Vines was arrested Thursday afternoon. She worked at Sharp Rees-Steely in the downtown area, where a large number of bottles of cough syrup were reported missing.

Prosecutors allege that Kiel shipped several bottles of the cough syrup to his home in Texas. They say a bar code on one of the bottles was tracked back to the San Diego pharmacy where Vines worked.

Vines was charged with theft and possession of a controlled substance. She was released without bail after a court appearance on Monday.

Kiel is accused of possessing and transporting a controlled substance.

Prosecutors say Vines and Kiel will be tried in court together.

Nevada Boxing Officials Suspend Nino, Salido Over Drugs (USAT/AP)

USA Today/AP, December 5, 2006

LAS VEGAS (AP) — WBC light flyweight champion Omar Nino was temporarily suspended Tuesday after testing positive for methamphetamine after last month's title bout, Nevada boxing regulators said.

The 30-year-old Mexican fighter retained the 108-pound title Nov. 18 with a majority draw over former champion Brian Viloria of Hawaii, even though Viloria knocked down Nino twice in the Las Vegas bout. Nino first won the title with a unanimous decision over Viloria in August in Las Vegas.

Nino is the first fighter ever to test positive for methamphetamine in Nevada.

The Nevada Athletic Commission decided to keep Nino out of the ring until it could hold a formal hearing, probably in January, commission executive director Keith Kizer said.

Two tests on a urine sample taken after the Nov. 18 title fight came back positive, enough to bring a case before the commission, Kizer said.

Nino has denied using the drug.

Under commission rules, Nino (24-2-2) could face a suspension, have his boxing license revoked, be fined and have the commission rule that his latest bout was a no-decision.

Also, the WBC is preparing to conduct its own test, which could put Nino's belt in jeopardy, Kizer said.

Kizer said Nino is the first fighter ever to test positive for methamphetamine in Nevada.

The commission also temporarily suspended Orlando Salido of Mexico after he tested positive for the banned steroid Nandrolone after his Nov. 4 unanimous decision over IBF featherweight champ Robert Guerrero.

Salido faces a one-year suspension and up to a $250,000 fine, although Kizer said the commission would consider fining Salido only the $17,500 he was paid for the fight.

Saints' Thomas Barred After Failing Drug Test (NYT/AP)

The New York Times/AP, December 6, 2006

Saints defensive tackle Hollis Thomas was suspended yesterday for the final four games of the regular season for violating the N.F.L.'s steroid policy.

Thomas, supported by the club, appealed the suspension, which he said was caused by asthma medication. He uses an inhaler daily and it apparently contained a banned steroid.

Thomas signed this year with New Orleans after playing nine seasons with the Eagles. He missed the 2002 season in Philadelphia with a broken right foot. He has had 43 tackles and 3½ sacks for the Saints and has been an important component in building their division-leading 8-4 record.

If New Orleans makes the playoffs, Thomas will be eligible to play. He can be added to the active roster on Jan. 1, the day after the regular season ends.

SHOULDER SURGERY FOR PORTIS Redskins running back Clinton Portis had shoulder surgery yesterday that will require six months of rehabilitation.

Portis was placed on injured reserve Nov. 15 after breaking his hand in a loss to Philadelphia. His left shoulder had also been ailing him. He partly dislocated the shoulder making a tackle in the first preseason game, then jammed the rotator cuff in the regular-season opener.

FRYE HAS WRIST IN BRACE Browns quarterback Charlie Frye did not practice because of a bruised right wrist, leaving his status uncertain for Cleveland's game against the Pittsburgh Steelers tomorrow night.

If Frye cannot play, the Browns will turn to the backup Derek Anderson. Frye will spend at least another day with his wrist in a brace. Today team doctors will re-evaluate his injury, which the club feared was a break before X-rays and magnetic resonance imaging test results came back negative.

COURT DATE FOR TITANS' JONES A judge in Nashville set a Feb. 1 hearing for Titans cornerback Pacman Jones on a misdemeanor charge of assault filed by a woman who said he spit on her at a nightclub.

Jones's lawyer hoped to settle the case with yesterday's appearance before Judge John Holt and had talks with the district attorney's office. But Krystal Webb, the Tennessee State University student who filed the charge over the October incident, has hired a lawyer.

"I had had some positive dialogue with Ms. Webb, but since she's retained outside counsel, I'm no longer able to discuss the case with her," said Worrick Robinson, the lawyer who is representing Jones.

Jones told Robinson that he left before the incident happened.

LATER START FOR GIANTS The starting time of the Giants' game against the Eagles at the Meadowlands on Dec. 17 was moved to 4:15 p.m. from 1 o'clock.

Also moved that day was the starting time for the Dolphins-Bills game, to 4:05 p.m. from 1 o'clock.

The moves are part of the network's flexible scheduling, a feature of the new television contract with the National Football League.

CLAYTON OUT Another disappointing season for Buccaneers receiver Michael Clayton came to an end yesterday when the team said he would miss the remaining four games because of a knee injury.

Clayton was one of the N.F.L.'s top rookies in 2004, with 80 receptions for 1,193 yards and 7 touchdowns. <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

Mounting Gun Violence, Gang Activity Seen In Area (SEAPI)

By Scott Gutierrez, P-I REPORTER

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, December 6, 2006

The slaying of King County sheriff's Deputy Steve Cox is another harsh reflection of resurging gun violence and gang activity plaguing Seattle and cities around the country, law enforcement officials say.

Cox was shot and killed early Saturday as he interviewed witnesses in connection with a shooting and beating outside a party at a White Center home. The felon and gang member who apparently shot him, Raymond O. Porter, is thought to have killed another man in SeaTac Friday night.

"Gang members are more dangerous, they're more armed, than other criminals and that fact alone means we're going to run into more people and things like this," Sheriff's Sgt. John Urquhart said Monday.

"But I don't believe (Porter) killed Deputy Cox because he was a gang member. I believe he killed Deputy Cox because he was armed," Urquhart added.

Cox's death comes after a year in Seattle in which gun assaults were up by 25 percent, similar to national trends, according to law enforcement. Police say shootings are becoming much too frequent, whether gang-related or not. Even as deputies responded to the gun blasts that killed Cox in White Center, Seattle police were busy Saturday hunting for another shooter in Rainier Valley who wounded another man in an unrelated case.

"There is certainly much more willingness to use firearms and a willingness to use them on human beings," Urquhart said.

In October, Seattle police gang detectives lamented in a Seattle P-I story that they had already investigated more gang cases than in all of 2005. An estimated 30 to 60 street gangs are operating in the Seattle area.

The Sheriff's Office does not field a gang unit, which means gangsters pushed out of Seattle likely work their way into the suburbs and unincorporated areas such as White Center, Urquhart said.

The reasons for the latest surge in violence vary, according to law enforcement and gang experts. Some experts say it's stoked in part by gang-bangers who went to prison in the early 1990s and now are finishing their sentences.

Earlier this year, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales promised $30 million to buttress anti-gang programs nationwide, calling street gangs "an increasingly deadly threat to the safety and security of our citizens." Locally, agents with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives teamed up with Seattle police, the Sheriff's Office, the state Department of Corrections and others to form a Violent Gang Task Force.

"We don't have the problems that Chicago and Los Angeles have," ATF Special Agent Julianne Marshall said. "But rather than be reactive, we want to attack it from the front end so we really can make a difference."

The ATF also launched a database called "Gangnet," which links law enforcement data from the West and East coasts on tens of thousands of suspected gang members.

Martin Speckmaier, a retired Edmonds police officer who now works as a consultant on school security, said there is a consensus gang activity is back on the rise.

The problem, however, is that officials have no uniform criteria for defining a gang member.

"It's so hard to fight a problem when you can't even define it," said Speckmaier of Comprehensive School Safety LLC.

"It's just really, really sad and tragic that someone so committed to this like Deputy Cox would have his life taken from him in such a tragic way," he said.

IMMIGRATION:

Court Rejects Interpretation Of Immigration Drug Law (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

WASHINGTON, Dec. 5 — The Supreme Court rejected the government's interpretation of immigration law on Tuesday, ruling that a noncitizen is not subject to mandatory deportation for a drug crime that, while a felony in the state where the crime was prosecuted, is only a misdemeanor under federal law.

The 8-to-1 decision restored to one category of immigrants, caught in the nearly impenetrable maze where immigration law and criminal law meet, the ability to avoid automatic deportation and the other dire consequences of being guilty of an "aggravated felony."

The category is made up of immigrants convicted of simple drug possession in states that treat those offenses as felonies. Federal law treats possession in most instances as a misdemeanor. But in the government's view, possession when deemed a felony under state law became a "drug trafficking crime," which under federal immigration law is an "aggravated felony" that strips an immigrant of the right to seek relief from automatic deportation, to seek asylum, or ever to return legally to the United States.

Writing for the majority on Tuesday, Justice David H. Souter said the government's interpretation was based on a strained and implausible reading of the definition of "drug trafficking crime" in the federal criminal code.

Thousands of immigrants every year might benefit from the ruling, according to Jayashri Srikantiah, a law professor who heads the Immigrants' Rights Clinic at Stanford Law School and who filed a brief on behalf of Jose Antonio Lopez, the immigrant whose Supreme Court appeal led to the decision, Lopez v. Gonzales, No. 05-547.

In an interview, Ms. Srikantiah said the decision was informed by "a sense of proportionality" and of the "real world consequences" of subjecting legal residents convicted of minor offenses to automatic deportation.

The Immigration and Nationality Act contains a list of aggravated felonies that includes "a drug trafficking crime." This phrase, in turn, is defined not in the immigration law, but in the criminal code as "any felony punishable under the Controlled Substances Act," the basic federal narcotics law.

The government's position was that "any felony" meant any crime that was considered a felony either under federal law or in the state where the prosecution took place. In this way, a conviction for simple possession could become a drug trafficking offense and hence an aggravated felony, which is what happened to Mr. Lopez.

A Mexican who was a permanent legal resident of the United States, Mr. Lopez pleaded guilty in a South Dakota state court to aiding and abetting another person's possession of cocaine. That crime is a felony in South Dakota, although the analogous offense is a misdemeanor under federal law.

Mr. Lopez served 15 months in state prison and was then placed in federal deportation proceedings as an aggravated felon. After unsuccessfully contesting the designation before the immigration service and the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit, in St. Louis, he was deported to Mexico.

The Supreme Court's decision makes Mr. Lopez eligible to apply for the administrative relief from deportation known as "cancellation of removal," an option that was foreclosed by his designation as an aggravated felon.

In analyzing the government's position that any offense "punishable" under the Controlled Substances Act therefore became a "drug trafficking" felony, Justice Souter said that "there are a few things wrong with this argument, the first being its incoherence." While "trafficking" ordinarily meant "some sort of commercial dealing," he said, "commerce, however, was no part of Lopez's South Dakota offense of helping someone else to possess."

Justice Souter continued that while the government's argument appeared implausible, that was "not to deny that the government might still be right; Humpty Dumpty used a word to mean 'just what he chose it to mean — neither more nor less,' and legislatures, too, are free to be unorthodox."

But in this instance, he said, if Congress meant to define drug trafficking in such an “unexpected” way, “Congress would need to tell us so, and there are good reasons to think it was doing no such thing here.”

Justice Souter said that under the government’s interpretation, a central part of federal immigration law, deportation, would depend not on a federal judgment about the seriousness of an offense, but on “varying state criminal classifications.” He added, “We cannot imagine that Congress took the trouble to incorporate its own statutory scheme of felonies and misdemeanors if it meant courts to ignore it whenever a state chose to punish a given act more heavily.”

The court’s conclusion was that “a state offense constitutes a ‘felony punishable under the Controlled Substances Act’ only if it proscribes conduct punishable as a felony under that federal law.”

Justice Clarence Thomas was the lone dissenter, observing in his opinion that “without doubt, Congress could have written the definition with this limitation, but it did not.”

This was not the first time the Supreme Court has resisted a categorical interpretation of immigration law by the executive branch. In a unanimous opinion two years ago, the court ruled that contrary to the government’s view, driving under the influence of alcohol was not a “crime of violence” for which an immigrant could be subjected to automatic deportation. <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

Justices Rule On Deporting (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court ruled Tuesday that a foreign national living here legally should not be automatically deported if he is convicted of a low-level drug offense that would be a misdemeanor under federal law.

The 8-1 decision could affect thousands of permanent legal immigrants, often known as green-card holders, who, because of certain state convictions, face deportation without a chance to plead their case before a judge.

The ruling ensures that legal immigrants can fight deportation after they have been convicted of simple drug possession or other offenses that are misdemeanors under the federal Controlled Substances Act even though they are classified as felonies in a state law.

The decision, drawing the dissent of only Justice Clarence Thomas, rejected a position taken by the Bush administration and resolved a split in views among lower courts.

Federal law requires green-card holders who have been convicted of an "aggravated felony" to be deported without an opportunity for appeal. The case tested whether simple drug possession could rise to the level of "illicit trafficking" and an "aggravated felony" because the offense was a state felony.

Jose Antonio Lopez, a Mexican national who became a legal permanent U.S. resident in 1990, was convicted in South Dakota of aiding and abetting possession of cocaine. He was sentenced to five years in prison and released after 15 months for good conduct.

Federal officials began the deportation process, contending that the felony status of drug possession in South Dakota qualified it as an "aggravated felony" requiring Lopez's mandatory banishment.

Justice David Souter wrote for the majority that a state offense should lead to automatic deportation only if it was a felony under the federal Controlled Substances Act.

Souter said that helping someone else possess cocaine does not constitute "illicit trafficking" under federal law: "The government's reading would render the law of alien removal … dependent on varying state criminal classifications," rather than code written by Congress.

Lopez has been in Mexico since his January deportation. Robert Long, his lawyer, said Lopez would now have a chance to argue that he should be allowed to return.

Justice Department spokesman Kathleen Blomquist said officials had not determined how the ruling would affect recent deportations and pending cases.

Court Bars Automatic Deportations In Drug Cases (LAT)

By David G. Savage, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court on Tuesday rejected the Bush administration's aggressive use of immigration laws to automatically expel legal immigrants for minor drug crimes, a decision that could spare thousands from being deported.

Immigrant-rights lawyers said the resounding 8-1 decision will allow noncitizens who have a family, a job and an otherwise clean record to appeal to immigration judges to stay in this country, despite a drug conviction.

"This ensures these lawful residents will have their day in court," said Benita Jain, a lawyer for the New York State Defenders Assn. in Brooklyn.

Federal judges in nine Western states, including California, have previously rejected the government's position on the language in the law. Immigrant-rights experts said Tuesday's decision doesn't change anything for legal immigrants in those states.

Since 1996, the more than 12 million legal immigrants in the United States have been subject to mandatory deportation if they are found guilty of an "aggravated felony," including a "drug trafficking crime." Four years ago, the government expanded the reach of this law to include state drug crimes that can result in a one-year jail term, even if the offense is simple drug possession.

In Tuesday's decision, the high court said that broad interpretation ignored the plain words of the law.

Noting Humpty Dumpty's use of words to mean whatever he wanted them to mean in author Lewis Carroll's "Through the Looking-Glass," the justices said it did not make sense to interpret the words "aggravated felony" and "drug trafficking crime" to mean simple drug possession.

Justice David H. Souter, who wrote the opinion, said the government's interpretation was incoherent and is "just what the English language tells us not to expect, and that result makes us very wary of the government's position."

The court said the automatic deportation rule should be triggered only by drug offenses that are the equivalent of drug crimes "punishable as a felony under federal law."

The decision reopened the case of Jose Antonio Lopez, an immigrant from Mexico who had lived as a permanent resident of South Dakota since 1990. He was married with two children and had owned a grocery store.

In 1997, he pleaded guilty to aiding and abetting another person's possession of cocaine. This was a felony in South Dakota but a misdemeanor under federal law.

After serving 15 months in prison, Lopez was released, but U.S. immigration authorities deported him to Mexico.

His lawyer, Patricia G. Mattos of St. Paul, Minn., said she told Lopez on Tuesday about the decision and his right to file a request to cancel his removal. "He was speechless. It was very emotional. He was very pleased the system had worked in the United States and that he will have his day in court," she said.

The ruling does not shield immigrants who commit minor drug crimes from being deported in all instances.

However, without the trigger of the automatic deportation rule, they can seek relief from an immigration judge.

It's unclear how many legal immigrants have been deported for minor drug crimes. Last year, the government said 77,000 legal immigrants were deported because they had criminal records, about 10% of which involved drug crimes.

From mid-1997 to May 2006, federal officials used the aggravated felony provisions to deport an estimated 156,713 people through court proceedings, according to the Transactional Records Access Clearinghouse, which is associated with Syracuse University.

Of that number, a third had criminal convictions for a controlled substance.

Immigrant-rights advocates say the stepped-up enforcement has collared many legal residents who are generally law-abiding and often well established in their adopted communities.

The Washington Legal Foundation, which had supported the government's view, called Tuesday's ruling a disappointment. Lopez was initially charged with more serious drug crimes, said Richard Samp, the group's general counsel.

"One would hope that immigration judges will grant 'cancellation of removal' to aliens convicted of felonies only in the rarest of circumstances," he said.

Tuesday's ruling is the second in three years in which the high court has limited the law's reach. The immigration law requires the government to expel those who commit a "crime of violence," but in 2004, the high court said that drunk driving is not a crime of violence.

In recent years, federal judges have split over whether an immigrant's conviction for a low-level state drug crime can be deemed an "aggravated felony" under immigration laws. Judges in the South and Midwest had adopted the government's view, but judges on the West Coast had rejected it.

"This does not change the situation for folks in California and the 9th Circuit," said Jayshri Srikantiah, a lawyer and director of the Immigrants Rights Clinic at Stanford University.

The Supreme Court justices did not focus on whether it was fair to deport longtime legal immigrants for a low-level drug offense.

Instead, they parsed the words in the federal law.

Souter said that "normal English usage" suggests Congress meant to punish and deport those who sell drugs, not those who simply possess them.

Justice Clarence Thomas was the sole dissenter, saying the law also makes reference to "any felony," which he said could mean both state and federal drug offenses that carry the felony label.

Lawyers who worked on the case said they were uncertain whether those who had been deported several years ago could reopen their cases.

By coincidence, the court heard arguments Tuesday in a related case involving the deportation of a legal Peruvian immigrant who was convicted of stealing a car in Marin County.

A ruling on that issue is due in several months.

Supreme Court Allows Discretion In Deportation For State Felonies (WP)

By Robert Barnes

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

The Supreme Court ruled yesterday that an immigrant convicted of a state felony drug charge that would be a lesser crime under federal law may contest the government's decision to deport him.

The 8 to 1 ruling, with Justice Clarence Thomas dissenting, held that a state felony charge that would be only a misdemeanor under federal statutes is not the kind of conviction that would trigger automatic deportation under the federal Immigration and Nationality Act.

The court's action reverses lower-court decisions that led the government to send back to Mexico Jose Antonio Lopez, a South Dakota grocery store owner who had pleaded guilty in 1997 to aiding and abetting another person's possession of cocaine.

The decision came in one of several cases the justices are considering to reconcile conflicting lower-court decisions on when immigrants convicted of crimes must be deported. After announcing yesterday's decision, the court heard arguments in a separate case from California in which a Peruvian immigrant was convicted on car theft charges.

Justice David H. Souter's opinion contained something of a grammar lesson for prosecutors and said Lopez's crime could not be classified as the kind of "aggravated felony" that means the government must move for deportation without any discretion.

At issue was the phrase "felony punishable under the Controlled Substances Act."

The government held that that meant the crime could be a felony under state law, as long as it was also punishable under the act.

"But we do not normally speak or write the Government's way," Souter wrote. "We do not use a phrase like 'felony punishable under the [CSA]' when we mean to signal or allow a break between the noun 'felony' and the contiguous modifier 'punishable under the [CSA].' "

Neither, Souter wrote, should it be read as "if it said 'felony punishable under the CSA whether or not as a felony.' "

Thomas agreed with the government's view of the law and found his colleagues' arguments "unpersuasive."

Despite Lopez's victory, his future is uncertain. He entered the country illegally in 1986 and became a legal permanent resident in 1990. He married and had two children in South Dakota and, according to his attorney -- Washington lawyer Robert A. Long Jr. -- had never been in legal trouble until his conviction in 1997 for telling someone where he could buy cocaine.

The court's decision does not mean that Lopez could stay if he decided to return to this country, only that the government had discretion over whether to initiate deportation proceedings. The justices remanded the case, Lopez v. Gonzales , No. 05-547, to the lower courts.

Supreme Court Rules In Favor Of Immigrant On Deportation Issue (LAW/AP)

By Pete Yost, The Associated Press

AP, December 6, 2006

The Supreme Court on Tuesday made it easier for some immigrants convicted of drug possession under state law to remain in the United States rather than being subject to deportation.

In an 8-1 decision, the justices ruled in favor of an immigrant who pleaded guilty to aiding and abetting possession of drugs in South Dakota for telling someone where to obtain cocaine.

While such a crime is a felony in South Dakota, most first-time simple possession offenses are punished as misdemeanors under the federal Controlled Substances Act.

The issue before the Supreme Court was the interpretation of the federal Immigration and Nationality Act, which says immigrants found guilty of aggravated felonies are subject to deportation.

Conduct that is a felony under state law but a misdemeanor under the Controlled Substances Act is not a felony for purposes of immigration, stated the ruling by Justice David Souter.

Jose Antonio Lopez, a 16-year permanent U.S. resident, was deported to Mexico in January 2006, but could return to his wife and two children, who are U.S. citizens, one of his lawyers has said.

Even then, Lopez, who had operated a grocery store in Sioux Falls, S.D., still could face deportation, but an immigration judge would have discretion to allow him to remain in the United States.

In opposing the immigrant's legal position, the Bush administration said that Congress left the door open to counting state felonies as felonies under the federal Controlled Substances Act, which would make them a crime that could trigger deportation under the Immigration and Nationality Act.

"We do not normally speak or write the government's way," Souter wrote, referring to the government's interpretation of the law. "Regular usage points in the other direction."

Treating a misdemeanor under the federal law as a felony "would be so much trickery," Souter wrote.

Justice Clarence Thomas dissented, declaring his colleagues' approach "unpersuasive."

"Whatever else 'illicit trafficking' might mean" in federal law, "it must include anything defined as a 'drug trafficking crime,'" Thomas said.

The court dismissed the case of another immigrant whose case had been consolidated with that of Lopez. The court said its decision to accept the case of Reymundo Toledo-Flores had been improvidently granted.

Toledo-Flores is a Mexican national who objected to having his latest conviction for illegally entering the United States classified an aggravated felony. Toledo-Flores was contesting his prison term, not his deportation, and he had already served it.

The cases are Lopez v. Gonzales, 05-7664, and Toledo-Flores v. U.S., 05-493.

Dems May Take Hardline On Those Who Hire Illegal Immigrants (HILL)

By Cameron Joseph And Bob Cusack

The Hill, December 6, 2006

The selection of Rep. Silvestre Reyes (D-Texas) to head the Intelligence Committee may be an indication that Democrats will press the Bush administration to crack down on employers who hire illegal immigrants.

Reyes, a former Border Patrol agent, is one of the most outspoken proponents of enforcing these types of employer sanctions and appears to have an ally in Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), who will be the House caucus chairman next year.

In an interview with The Hill earlier this year, Emanuel said many Democrats want to focus on employer sanctions as a way to stem illegal immigration. He accused the White House and the Republican-led Congress for letting “its guard down when it comes to employer sanctions.”

Reyes is a cosponsor of a bill by Rep. Charles Gonzalez (D-Texas) to increase enforcement of sanctions against employers of illegal aliens. And while the Judiciary Committee has lead jurisdiction on immigration reform, Reyes has argued that lax enforcement on illegal immigrants jeopardizes national security, which is under his panel’s purview.

He was the lead Democratic cosponsor on a bipartisan bill to enforce restrictions on employment in the United States of unauthorized aliens through the use of improved Social Security cards and an employment eligibility database. He worked closely with House Rules Committee Chairman David Dreier (R-Calif.) in crafting the bill.

Republican leaders championed border security throughout the 109th Congress, but the GOP has been reticent to call for increased government enforcement on corporations.

A recent Government Accountability Office study showed that the enforcement of employer sanctions has been nearly nonexistent over the last few years. Audits of employers to make sure they are checking employee documentation fell 77 percent from 1998 to 2003. Based on available figures, after reaching a peak in the early and mid-1990s, employer-sanctions investigations, warnings and fines have all dropped sharply.

Reyes called the Republican-led immigration reform in the House “a waste of time” because, he claimed, it was an unfunded mandate, and he voted against the House border security bill. He also argued that Republicans’ border-security plan was politically motivated, stating at the time, “Instead of acting to secure our borders and pass immigration reform, Republicans are holding hearings, just so they can keep scapegoating immigrants.”

Democrats are expected to seek to permanently bridge the gap with “Lou Dobbs Democrats” that voted for “fair trade” policies, while avoiding alienating an expanding Hispanic voting bloc. In focusing on employer sanctions, Democrats hope to appear tough on border security and illegal immigration while avoiding alienating most voters.

However, this may be difficult to do. Asked whether Democrats are likely to push hard for more employer sanctions, a senior Democratic committee staffer familiar with the immigration debate expressed doubt: “I’m not sure that many people in either party want employer sanctions. There are just too many constituencies that don’t support this.”

The AFL-CIO opposed the Gonzalez-Reyes bill, and expresses reservations about expansion of employer sanctions based on Social Security number verification.

"Implementation of employer sanctions in the short run has been disastrous," said AFL-CIO legislative representative Sonia Ramirez. "In the future I think that we would really be concerned with expansion of employer sanctions, and would have to look very carefully at any legislation to make sure that it will not give amnesty to any complying employers."

Rep. Sheila Jackson Lee (D-Texas), the ranking member on the Judiciary subcommittee on Immigration, Border Security and Claims, supports employer sanctions but acknowledged union concerns last summer during the immigration reform debate: "The AFL-CIO has a meritorious argument that when you enforce employer sanctions, employers who are unscrupulous will then enforce them against innocent persons."

Many business groups will oppose a Democratic effort to increase employer sanctions.

Angelo Amador, the director of immigration policy for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, said, "We think everything should be done as part of a package. You need to address the 12 million [estimated illegal immigrants in the U.S.] and the future flow of immigrants, and our concerns of filling jobs, as part of immigration reform." He promised to oppose any increased employer sanctions if they came to the House floor without other immigration reform provisions.

Some Democrats this fall called on their leaders to lay out a clear agenda on immigration reform. In a 25-page agenda document for 2007, Democratic leaders did not mention immigration at all, triggering criticism from the Congressional Hispanic Caucus.

Still, Emanuel is committed to focusing on employer sanctions, saying earlier this year: "There are over 20 million businesses in the U.S.; the main attraction for people coming to this country is work and there has been almost zero enforcement … You have got to have a real consequence to hiring illegal immigrants if you want to fight it."

TAX:

Calif. Tax Case Linked Locally (NOPT)

By John Lindenberger, The North Platte Telegraph

North Platte (NE) Telegraph, December 6, 2006

The U.S. Department of Justice is seeking a preliminary injunction against California accountant Lowell Baisden, who is currently under investigation for promoting an illegal tax fraud scheme.

The motion, which was filed Nov. 29 in U.S. District Court, asks for a preliminary injunction to prevent Baisden from preparing any federal tax returns for his clients and from representing them before the IRS.

Court documents indicate seven North Platte practitioners have been investigated by the IRS in connection with Baisden's scheme. They are doctors Michael Trierweiler, Chris Johng and Walter and Deborah Weaver, along with anesthetist Burt McKeag and nurse anesthetists Evan Geilenkirchen and Kathryn Snoozy.

According to the court records, Baisden helped his clients set up phony corporations to significantly reduce their tax liabilities. He also allegedly prepared their tax returns to perpetuate his scheme. Many of these clients were referred to Baisden by his brother-in-law, Michael Koning, a former North Platte anesthesiologist now living in Montana.

The tax scheme allegedly involves creating sham corporations to which the client's income is assigned. Baisden would then allegedly claim large illegal deductions for non-deductible personal expenses. The remaining income would then be reported as royalty or rental income, which is not subject to self-employment and social security taxes.

According to the complaint from the Justice Department, "several of Baisden's former customers have sought new representation, filed the past-due returns and conceded that the tax returns filed by Baisden are incorrect."

Supporting documents show that McKeag consulted a new accountant in 2003, who prepared an amended return to correct the false information Baisden allegedly reported on his 2002 tax return. In addition, McKeag told investigators that Baisden claimed his tax plan complied with the Internal Revenue laws.

Geilenkirchen said he has also refiled all his taxes with a credible local accountant and is in the process of paying the past taxes that are due. He and his wife have filed their own lawsuit against Baisden, seeking damages for the interest and penalties that have been assessed against them by the IRS.

Others involved could not be reached for comment on Monday.

While many of the local practitioners in this case are involved with the hospital, GPRMC president Cindy Bradley said the hospital is not involved in any way, and they have cooperated fully with the IRS in their investigation.

"Furthermore, no one has been convicted," Bradley noted. She added, she feels it is a shame the medical community could be tainted by the actions of a few people.

According to court records, Baisden has been promoting his tax scheme since 1999, when he created a corporation called Bioventures Inc. to assist Koning in reducing his tax liability by assigning income from his practice, Anesthesia Consultants of Nebraska, to the sham corporation.

The Justice Department's complaint states Baisden was able to offset more than 50 percent of Koning's yearly income. Over a three-year period Baisden allegedly understated Bioventures' tax liability by more than $676,000.

Koning reportedly classified the employees of Anesthesia Consultants as independent contractors to perpetuate Baisden's tax scheme. Court documents state this made it less apparent to the IRS that the employees' income was actually wage income, since no W-2 forms were issued.

Court records indicate Baisden eventually promoted his tax scheme to Koning's employees and associates as well as his Baisden's clients in California.

Baisden allegedly set up sham corporations in Nevada and provided similar tax avoidance by claiming large expense deductions that reduced his clients' taxable income by well over 50 percent.

Baisden reportedly charged his clients an initial fee between $5,000 and $6,000 to establish their corporations, according to the court records. In addition, he charged $1,000 to $2,500 per month to complete the necessary bookkeeping and accounting work to perpetuate the scheme and prepare his clients' tax returns.

When the IRS became aware of Baisden's alleged scheme, it began to investigate the tax returns of several of his clients and determined that the majority of the corporations he created were not engaged in any legitimate business activities.

In addition to promoting his illegal tax scheme and preparing fraudulent returns, the complaint says Baisden delayed IRS investigations by acting as a power of attorney for his clients. Baisden allegedly filed numerous taxpayer advocate forms requesting determination of whether his clients were experiencing a hardship from the IRS.

The court records state, "Using this technique, Baisden was successful in delaying the IRS investigations by several months while the taxpayer advocate was researching his meritless claims."

Based on the IRS investigations that have been conducted, the U.S. Department of Justice estimates Baisden has understated his clients' tax liability by more than $3 million.

Since the IRS investigations began, Baisden has reportedly stopped preparing tax returns for some customers and has filed requests for extensions for their 2003 and 2004 tax returns. However, he has failed to meet the deadlines, and court records indicate his clients are now faced with penalties for nonfiling and for the underpayment of taxes.

In addition, the court documents allege that Baisden has formed new corporations in Wyoming for at least two of his clients to avoid further detection by the IRS.

Baisden has been given 20 days to respond to the complaint filed by the U.S. Department of Justice. The complaint states failure to respond will result in a default judgment against him.

U.S. Giving Bank's Papers To Lawyers In KPMG Suit (NYT)

By Lynnley Browning

The New York Times, December 6, 2006

Federal prosecutors who are investigating Deutsche Bank over questionable tax shelters have been turning over internal bank documents to lawyers defending former employees of the accounting firm KPMG in a separate criminal case.

The providing of the Deutsche Bank documents, which began in earnest earlier this year and has accelerated in recent months, was disclosed in a court filing late Monday by John M. Hillebrecht, an assistant United States attorney in Manhattan who is overseeing the case against the indicted KPMG employees. His office is also overseeing the investigation of Deutsche Bank.

The judge in the KPMG case, Lewis A. Kaplan of United States District Court in Manhattan, had previously criticized prosecutors for tardy production of evidence. The trial of the 16 former KPMG employees had been scheduled to begin in January, but last month Judge Kaplan postponed it indefinitely, citing concerns that the defendants, who include an outside lawyer and investment adviser, would not be able to pay their legal bills.

In his filing, Mr. Hillebrecht wrote that prosecutors were turning over the Deutsche Bank documents in part because the Deutsche Bank case had "substantial overlap" with the KPMG employees case, which prosecutors call the largest criminal tax case ever.

Mr. Hillebrecht also disclosed that prosecutors had asked Deutsche Bank to provide additional assistance with the documents for the defendants in the KPMG case, in which Jeffrey Stein, a former KPMG executive, is the lead defendant.

A spokesman for Deutsche Bank declined to comment yesterday.

Lawyers for the KPMG defendants, who requested the Deutsche Bank documents, have been seeking ammunition to make their case. KPMG and Deutsche Bank worked together on a number of tax shelters. But by giving the defense lawyers the Deutsche Bank documents, prosecutors may be hoping to entice one of the KPMG defendants to cooperate in the separate case against Deutsche Bank.

"They may have hit a brick wall with the Deutsche Bank case and need somebody to help them out from Stein," said Peter Henning, a former lawyer in the Justice Department's criminal division.

Prosecutors are also turning over to the defense for the indicted KPMG employees other evidence from other, unnamed tax-shelter investigations, according to Mr. Hillebrecht's filing. The evidence includes documents relating to a former tax lawyer with the firm of Jenkens & Gilchrist; to a previously unidentified investment firm called Qantas Investments U.S.; and to four unnamed employees of the accounting firm PricewaterhouseCoopers.

A spokesman for PricewaterhouseCoopers said yesterday that "we have no reason to believe that either PWC or our personnel are under criminal investigation." <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

IRS Cracks Down On Dodgers Who Use Onshore Tax Havens (WSJ)

By Tom Herman

The Wall Street Journal, December 6, 2006

Escalating its assault on cheating, the Internal Revenue Service is turning up the heat on tax dodgers who conceal taxable income by exploiting gaps in state business-formation laws that allow hidden ownership or control.

The IRS is focusing on individuals or small groups whose tools include use of corporations, trusts, partnerships, limited liability companies and other types of business structures. Some people may form a company, conceal their ownership and use it to claim phony expenses, an IRS official says. Other cases involve outright fraud. IRS officials say some people have created sham, one-person, tax-exempt religious corporations to dodge taxes.

Officials say the problem appears to be particularly severe in Nevada, where recent investigations into promoters of corporations there have turned up widespread abuses. As a result, the IRS has begun expanding the number of audits of people involved in forming Nevada corporations, says Steven Burgess, director of examination for the IRS's Small Business/Self-Employed Division.

The IRS also is considering additional investigations of promoters, Mr. Burgess said at a recent Senate hearing. Even if promoters aren't guilty of wrongdoing, their client lists could be valuable in unearthing evidence of cheating, he said.

The problem isn't limited to Nevada. Mr. Burgess also pointed to Wyoming and Delaware laws as being particularly susceptible to abuse, but added that most states have gaps in their business-formation laws, creating the potential for disguising ownership and other abuses.

The push comes at a time when the IRS faces increasing pressure from Congress to do more to discourage tax evasion and reduce the nation's "tax gap" -- the difference between what the IRS collects each year and what it should be collecting. IRS researchers have estimated this gap at around $290 billion. Some influential lawmakers, notably Sen. Max Baucus, the Montana Democrat who will become chairman of the Senate Finance Committee next year, have said the Treasury needs to do much more to attack the problem.

For years, law-enforcement officials have expressed concern about widespread use of offshore tax havens to hide or shelter taxable income. But now IRS officials and senators are also focusing on the exploitation of onshore havens. "The absence of ownership disclosure requirements and lax regulatory regimes in many of our states make U.S. shell companies attractive vehicles for those seeking to launder money, evade taxes, finance terrorism, or conduct other illicit activity anonymously," said Sen. Norm Coleman, a Minnesota Republican.

While laws vary from state to state, a report earlier this year by the U.S. Government Accountability Office, a congressional investigative arm, said most states don't require companies or third-party agents representing them to disclose ownership information when companies are being formed or in periodic reports.

Mr. Burgess, of the IRS, said the agency is taking additional steps to nab wrongdoers. For example, the IRS has begun using special types of summonses to discover the names of people who have paid businesses to help them form a business in Nevada. The IRS also is coordinating efforts with other federal agencies, including the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Department of Homeland Security and the Treasury's Financial Crimes Enforcement Network.

The GAO study reported that state officials, agents and others said that collecting company ownership information could be "problematic." For example, state officials told the GAO that the costs and time involved in approving company formations could increase, thus "potentially slowing down or derailing business dealings." A few states and agents feared losing business to other places with less stringent rules. Officials and agents also expressed concern about violating the privacy of owners of legitimate businesses.

Nevada statutes "were designed for legitimate purposes," says Scott Anderson, Nevada's deputy secretary of state for commercial recordings. "We do understand there are some entities out there using them for illegitimate purposes," he says, adding that "we will be addressing these in the upcoming legislative session." * * *

About 70% of taxpayers will be eligible for an offer of free federal tax-preparation software and electronic filing next year.

The offer comes through the "Free File" program, a partnership between the IRS and a coalition of tax-preparation software makers. For 2007, only taxpayers who earn $52,000 or less will be able to find an offer for which they're eligible, the IRS said. That means about 93 million people, or 70% of all taxpayers, will be eligible.

In a twist, the program includes an agreement by private-sector partners not to offer controversial "ancillary" services, such as "refund anticipation loans," through the program, the IRS said. Consumer groups have long attacked these loans, which use a taxpayer's refund as collateral for a short-term loan that typically carries a very high interest rate.

"We heard many legitimate concerns about the marketing of ancillary products during the last filing season," IRS Commissioner Mark W. Everson said. "This is a constructive step."

Sen. Baucus criticized the IRS decision to retain an income limit on the Free File program. Taxpayer participation in the program fell sharply this year after income limits were imposed. But Sen. Baucus also praised the decision to block the offering of refund-anticipation loans through the program.

"A direct portal on the agency's Web site should allow taxpayers to file directly and truly for free, regardless of income," Sen. Baucus said. * * *

The AMT Reckoning (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 6, 2006

Fans of political irony will appreciate that Democrats in Congress are saying they now want to address the "wealth gap" even as they deplore and want to eliminate the Alternative Minimum Tax, or AMT. It was a previous crusade against the wealthy that created the AMT. Haven't we learned anything about the perils of tax policy rooted in political envy?

The AMT became law in 1969 after LBJ's last Treasury Secretary, Joseph Barr, created a liberal uproar by disclosing that 21 millionaires had managed to pay little or no income tax in 1967. Thus the "alternative" tax was designed to capture high earners who claimed a lot of deductions, and somehow Democrats never raised a peep over the years when the AMT was whacking mostly Republican voters. But the tax has now become the monster that ate Marin County, to pick just one of the blue state redoubts where the AMT hits especially hard. This year it will strike four million Americans, and next year without a change in law it will snare 23 million -- one in four tax filers.

More telling for class warriors, next year a higher percentage of Americans with incomes between $50,000 and $100,000 will pay the AMT than will tax filers with incomes above $1 million a year (see chart). One lesson: Whenever a politician claims a tax will only hit "the rich," don't believe him. Sooner or later the tax always soaks the middle class, because that's where the money is.

The latest data indicate that the eight states with the highest percentage of tax filers subject to the AMT all voted heavily Democratic in 2004 and 2006 -- including Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Jersey and Rhode Island. Those voters are now screaming for relief, and the question for Democrats is where they'll find the money. Eliminating the AMT would cost about $50 billion for one year and $1.2 trillion over 10 years, according to the Treasury Department.

Our free advice is that they consider some bipartisan tax reform. What Americans loathe about the AMT is that it first requires filers to comply with the regular IRS tax code with its hundreds of tax forms, work sheets and instructions. But then if they qualify for too many deductions -- for state and local taxes, say, or the child credit -- they must double their pleasure by recalculating their income and filling out separate tax schedules for the AMT. Then they pay whichever tax is higher. It's really a Mandatory Maximum Tax.

The AMT is gradually evolving into the de facto U.S. tax system, and the regular tax code with its Byzantine rules and carve-outs is becoming less relevant each year. According to the liberal Tax Policy Center at the Brookings Institution and Urban Institute, the total cost to the Treasury of scrapping the entire IRS tax code but retaining the AMT would be only $63 billion in the first year, $56 billion in the second year, and less than that in each succeeding year. For a growing number of Americans, the first page of the IRS 1040 instruction manual might as well read: Go directly to the AMT.

So here's a possible deal between the Bush Administration and the Pelosi Democrats: Junk the IRS code and use the AMT as the basis for tax reform. The AMT provides at least the crude framework for a much simpler tax code, because it eliminates almost all deductions and special interest carve-outs. It requires only about one-tenth as many tax forms as the regular code. It has a broad tax base and only two tax rates, 26% and 28%.

Yes, a load of sticky tax issues would still need to be negotiated: The double and triple taxation of investment and savings would have to be eliminated, and adjustments would also be needed lest many families with children be socked with a huge tax hike as they are under the current AMT.

The Democrats created the AMT and we suppose it's rough justice that they're now stuck with finding a way out of their own mess. Yes, they could try to create some tax showdown between repealing the Bush tax cuts for "the rich" and AMT relief. But Republicans would rightly portray this as a tax increase and our guess is they'd win that fight. Meanwhile, today the average American sucked into the AMT pays an extra $6,000 of tax to the IRS, and next year some 20 million additional Americans will have to pay this "rich man's tax." Democrats running Congress would get the blame if they do nothing.

The whole tax system is on the verge of collapse and needs to be modernized. Republicans pledged for 12 years to create a simpler, fairer tax system and never delivered. This is your chance, Speaker Pelosi.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush To Meet With Centrist Dems (HILL)

By Josephine Hearn

The Hill, December 6, 2006

President Bush has invited leaders of the conservative Blue Dog and New Democrat coalitions to the White House Friday to discuss areas of "mutual cooperation" in the words of one Democratic Congressional aide.

The outreach comes at a time when Bush's image on Capitol Hill and around the country has taken a serious beating. The meeting is scheduled just two days after the Iraq Study Group is scheduled to release its findings and one day after the Senate Armed Services Committee plans to hold hearings on them.

Reps. Alan Boyd (Fla.), Dennis Moore (Kan.) and Mike Ross (Ark.) will represent the Blue Dogs, a coalition of usually southern, conservative-leaning Democrats and Reps. Joe Crowley (N.Y.), Artur Davis (Ala.), Ron Kind (Wis.), Adam Smith (Wash.) and Ellen Tauscher (Calif.) are set to represent the New Democrats, a group of business-friendly centrists, at the meeting, which the president is expected to attend.

Lawmakers Unlikely To Accept U.N. Position (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, December 6, 2006

As President Bush begins vetting candidates to succeed resigned U.N. Ambassador John Bolton, as many as five departing lawmakers have surfaced as players in the Beltway's nominations guessing game.

Centrist GOP Rep. Jim Leach (Iowa) was a longtime senior member of the International Relations Committee whose support of abortion rights and opposition to the 2003 Bush tax cuts often placed him at odds with conservatives in the conference. He has emerged as a favorite among House colleagues, 48 of whom recommended him to Bush before Bolton's resignation became public.

Leach is flattered and honored by the bipartisan effort on his behalf but is making other plans for his future, spokesman Gregory Wierzynski said. A former Princeton University trustee and expert on international affairs, Leach is leaning toward taking a visiting professorship at Princeton's Woodrow Wilson School.

One source close to Leach's deliberations said the 15-term veteran recognizes that the next nominee is likely to share Bolton's staunchly conservative record. "He realizes that he is in an awkward position, having voted against the war," the source said.

Another surprise on several U.N. shortlists is Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.), who not only voted against the war in Iraq but also helped put the brakes on any reconsideration of Bolton during this month's lame-duck session. Chafee, a Foreign Relations Committee member, also is leaning toward taking an academic or policy position after leaving the Hill.

"It's something that's just such a very remote possibility that it would be an extreme hypothetical, and I don't think the senator wants to deal with hypotheticals at this time," Chafee spokesman Chris Spina said of reports that Chafee could be named Bolton's successor.

Former Senate Majority Leader George Mitchell (D-Maine), himself a subject of speculation surrounding the post, dismissed that possibility, telling CNN yesterday that Bush would seek to replace Bolton with a Republican.

Mitchell acknowledged the upside to naming a former lawmaker who might have an easier path to confirmation among former colleagues, and offered up three defeated Republican senators: George Allen (Va.), Mike DeWine (Ohio) and Jim Talent (Mo.). But DeWine took himself out of the running yesterday, telling the Cleveland Plain Dealer that he was flattered but planned to return to his home state.

The President's 'Lost Opportunity' For The 4th Circuit (LAW)

By Emma Schwartz, Legal Times

Legal Times, December 6, 2006

Chief Judge William Wilkins, who has presided over the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the past four years, sent President George W. Bush a letter last week announcing his plans to step down in June.

"I've had it for a good while now and it's time to move on," Wilkins tells Legal Times. Though Wilkins, a South Carolina native who will turn 65 in March, will still hear cases as a senior judge, his quasi-retirement creates a fourth official vacancy on the 15-member bench. (Technically, there are five openings, but Judge H. Emory Widener Jr., who announced plans to retire in 2003, has pledged to stay active until the nominee for his seat -- Defense Department general counsel William Haynes II -- is confirmed.)

The large number of vacancies during a Republican administration is particularly striking given the 4th Circuit's reputation as one of the most stalwart conservative courts in the nation. The circuit, which covers Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, and North and South Carolina, also is the key appellate arena for the administration's terrorism cases, largely prosecuted in the Eastern District of Virginia.

"You'd think they'd want to fill them and fill them as quickly as possible," says Arthur Hellman, a professor at the University of Pittsburgh School of Law.

Though the Bush administration has tried to fill a few open seats, it has faced stiff opposition even during the Republican-controlled Congress. U.S. District Judge Terrence Boyle's nomination to the 4th Circuit has languished since 2001, and senators have blocked Haynes' confirmation over questions about his involvement with the Justice Department's infamous "torture memo." It's unlikely the administration will fare any better under the incoming Democratic-controlled Congress.

So the question some court watchers are asking is whether future picks to the 4th Circuit could inch this reliably conservative bench closer to the center.

"A lot of people have said this is a lost opportunity for the Bush administration, because it has been considered quite a conservative court, and they haven't been able to confirm their nominees," says Carl Tobias, a professor at the University of Richmond School of Law.

U.S. Drops Plan To Increase Foreign Control Over Airlines (USAT/AP)

By Michael J. Sniffen

USA Today, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — Already rebuffed by a Republican-controlled Congress, the Bush administration on Tuesday withdrew its plan to give foreign investors more management control of U.S. airlines.

Announced Tuesday by Transportation Secretary Mary Peters, the decision follows a department review of public comments about the proposal, and votes by the Senate and House this year to prevent the plan from going forward.

"It was clear from reviewing the comments that the department needs to do more to inform the public, labor groups and Congress about the benefits of allowing more international investment," Peters said in a statement.

On Capitol Hill, Sen. Frank Lautenberg, D-N.J., who introduced the measure to block the plan in the Senate, said the Bush administration recognized that new Democratic majorities in the House and Senate "will not put up with this bad idea." The decision may affect U.S. negotiations with the European Union on a so-called Open Skies aviation treaty that would allow European and U.S. airlines to fly wherever they want between European cities and the USA, and charge whatever they want.

Advocates hope such a deal would increase air travel, lower airfares, create jobs and boost investment in U.S. carriers. Labor unions, some airlines and their allies in Congress fear it would cost U.S. jobs and allow foreign investors, even foreign governments, control over an industry critical to national security.

Peters' decision was greeted with disappointment by Jacques Barrot, vice president of the European Union's Commission in charge of Transport. In a statement, Barrot called the scrapped proposal "an essential element" to concluding a new aviation agreement. He did, however, accept Peters' proposal to send U.S. representatives to Brussels in early 2007 for talks on how to proceed.

Peters renewed the U.S. commitment to seeking an Open Skies agreement with Europe. She asserted the investment proposal was not directly linked to the treaty but acknowledged that some in the European negotiations had aligned the two.

The administration first proposed giving foreign investors in U.S. airlines more control over marketing, routing and fleet structure in November 2005. It amended the plan last May to limit the ability of foreign investors to make decisions about safety, security and national defense obligations.

A 65-year-old law limits foreign ownership of U.S. airlines to 25%. The administration argued that its plan would not have lifted that limit, but opponents claimed it was trying to use regulations to circumvent the statute at the request of Europeans who viewed that as a prerequisite for an Open Skies treaty.

US Scraps Airline Investment Reforms (FT)

By Doug Cameron

Financial Times, December 6, 2006

Hopes for an open skies aviation pact between the US and the European Union suffered a severe setback on Tuesday when the US abandoned plans to give overseas investors more influence in the management of its airlines.

Bowing to pressure from Congress, labour unions and airlines, Mary Peters, the new transportation secretary, acknowledged dropping the reforms could affect the preliminary transatlantic deal agreed last year.

EU negotiators had made it clear a revision of the rules was essential for their approval of the preliminary open skies pact, which would have opened market access and led to co-operation in areas such as safety, security and competition policy.

The US transport department wanted to ease restrictions on the involvement of overseas investors in marketing and operational decisions, in part to boost airlines' access to capital markets, although the 25 per cent foreign ownership ceiling would remain unchanged.

Current rules prevent overseas investors having any "semblance" of influence in management decisions of US airlines.

After speaking to Ms Peters by telephone, Jacques Barrot, European transport commissioner, expressed disappointment at Tuesday's move.

"We have been waiting a year," said his spokesman. "The legal situation is now fragile."

Further talks are scheduled in Brussels next month, but the European Commission said it would resume legal proceedings if they broke down.

The European Court has ruled current bilateral deals between EU member states and Washington illegal as some countries receive better treatment than others.

Ms Peters, who inherited the controversial proposal when she took over in October, had hoped to present a revised version of the rule change to EU transport ministers next week, having twice missed self-imposed deadlines for the reforms as the DoT wrestled with domestic opposition.

She said: "There simply are too many questions and too many concerns about the potential impact of this rule for us to continue at this point," but she reaffirmed US commitment to a new transatlantic deal.

Congressional critics said that more foreign involvement in the operation of US airlines raised national security concerns and such changes were outside the DoT's jurisdiction.

U.S. Drops Plan For Greater Foreign Role In Aviation (WSJ)

By Laura Meckler

The Wall Street Journal, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The White House withdrew a proposal to allow foreigners greater control over U.S. airlines, bowing to congressional opposition and putting in question an important aviation agreement with Europe.

The Department of Transportation said yesterday it was dropping a proposed regulation that would have allowed foreigners to exercise power over routes, scheduling and many other aspects of airline operations, after the planned change came under criticism from U.S. lawmakers, labor unions and others.

The move underscored the rising protectionist sentiments in Congress and throughout the country. It will have an impact on negotiations over a long-sought agreement that would allow U.S. and European airlines to fly without restrictions across the Atlantic.

The "open skies" agreement also would provide greater access to London's popular Heathrow airport for U.S. carriers. Europeans had said they wouldn't finalize that agreement if the U.S. doesn't liberalize the foreign-investment rules on U.S. airline operations.

The parties plan to return to the bargaining table in January to see how the deal might be salvaged. Europeans, who are after broader access to the U.S. market, could seek alternative concessions from the U.S., though it is unclear what those might include.

The Europeans face additional pressure to wrap up the talks: A European high court has ruled that the bilateral aviation agreements that all European countries have with the U.S. are illegal and must be replaced with a broader European regime. If those bilateral agreements were dissolved, it could disrupt airlines services, such as alliances among U.S. and European carriers.

European transport ministers are scheduled to meet next week in Brussels, where they had been expected to approve the open-skies agreement, had the change in U.S. law been complete. Deep and widespread opposition in Congress and elsewhere forced the White House to back down. Opposition is significant in the Republican-led Congress and is only likely to intensify once Democrats take over next year.

For years, U.S. law has limited stock ownership by foreigners in U.S. airlines and has barred foreigners from exercising "actual control" over operations. The administration of President Bush argued that loosening the control rules would attract more foreign investment in U.S. carriers, as well as help with the European negotiations. The Bush plan would have allowed foreigners power over most operations, save matters of safety, security and use of craft by the U.S. military.

Some Republicans Take A Scorched-Hill Tack (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Like a retreating army, Republicans are tearing up railroad track and planting legislative land mines to make it harder for Democrats to govern when they take power in Congress next month.

Already, the Republican leadership has moved to saddle the new Democratic majority with responsibility for resolving $463 billion in spending bills for the fiscal year that began Oct. 1. And the departing chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, Rep. Bill Thomas (R., Calif.), has been demanding that the Democrat-crafted 2008 budget absorb most of the $13 billion in costs incurred from a decision now to protect physician reimbursements under Medicare, the federal health-care program for the elderly and disabled.

The unstated goal is to disrupt the Democratic agenda and make it harder for the new majority to meet its promise to reinstitute "pay-as-you-go" budget rules, under which new costs or tax cuts must be offset to protect the deficit from growing.

"I think we're trying to get an accommodation," said Speaker Dennis Hastert (R., Ill.) last evening. "You're digging a hole now and filling up with money from '08," he said of Mr. Thomas's demands. "He says he's trying to move away from that."

But with Mr. Hastert dismantling his office, House Republicans appear to be operating in a post-election leadership vacuum. The White House is watching with alarm, as are many Senate Republicans, who have a greater stake than the House in maintaining relations with Democrats.

"There are individuals who want to blow up the tracks, and there are more of those individuals in the House," said one Senate leadership aide.

The collapse of the appropriations process will be felt soon in the Justice and Commerce departments, food-safety agencies and veterans' health care. "It's not just a mess. It's a mountainous mess," complained Wisconsin Rep. David Obey, the next House Appropriations Committee chairman.

In the Medicare dispute, Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley (R., Iowa) has aligned himself with Democrats against Mr. Thomas and House Energy and Commerce Chairman Joe Barton (R., Texas). Talks continued last night in hopes of reaching agreement this morning on the physician issue and a larger $38 billion tax-and-trade package important to business.

"Failure is not an option," warned John Engler, president of the National Association of Manufacturers. New York City and Wall Street have a major stake in $682 million in tax provisions important to transportation infrastructure and redevelopment of the World Trade Center area. And the trade package, as introduced by Mr. Thomas last night, runs from Vietnam and Andean countries to a set of expired general preferences for developing countries around the globe.

"We are fairly close," said Sen. Max Baucus (D., Mont.), the next Finance chairman. But given the still-uncertain Republican support, the Vietnam trade bill could yet be sacrificed, Mr. Grassley warned.

With Congress turning off the lights this week, there seems no chance of saving the appropriations process. Instead, most of the government will remain on a stopgap bill through Feb. 15, and in kicking this can down the road, the Republican leadership has no idea where it will stop rolling.

"It's a demonstration of the irresponsibility of Republicans that they would leave this country with this mess," said the next House speaker, Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D., Calif.). "But we won, we will deal with it."

Democrats could simply extend the stopgap resolution again in February and set themselves up as a budget appeals court of sorts, to which the administration will have to come for relief. "I think we can work through it, but it is not our preference," said

White House budget chief Rob Portman. But the administration admits it could yet pay a price if the spending issues become entangled with President Bush's spring supplemental-spending request for military operations in Iraq.

The stopgap resolution, which the House expects to take up today, allows no growth above 2006 spending, and as a rule, any spending cuts from 2006 levels voted by the House this past summer prevail. On balance, annual funding is about $6 billion less than the president's budget request -- without always reflecting his priorities.

In the course of the House floor debate, for example, general administration funds for the Justice Department were cut to $35.4 million, less than half the 2006 funding level and a nearly 70% cut from the president's request. House members were gambling then that at least some of the money could be restored in final talks with the Senate, but since the appropriations process has collapsed, those talks never took place, and the Justice Department must live with the results.

Mr. Portman will have greater discretion to apportion funds to deal with the crisis. But the gaps are too big in some cases to easily work around. Food-safety inspections face a $17 million shortfall by Feb 15. Veterans medical care will be funded at an annual rate $3.1 billion less than most of Congress agrees is needed, and Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison (R., Texas) is demanding changes in the stopgap bill to recognize this shortfall.

"What a sad mess," said Sen. Robert Byrd (D., W.Va).

Lawmakers Try To Keep Their Bills Alive During Final Week (HILL)

By Kelly Mccormack

The Hill, December 6, 2006

Rep. Mark Green's (R-Wis.) legislation that would crack down on abuses against animals has an impressive 324 cosponsors. Green's party controls Congress and the White House. And Green's bill is going nowhere.

The legislation is one of many on its last breath as Congress inches closer to the end of its 109th session. But unlike the other thousands of bills that will formally die over the next several days, Green's bill is backed by an overwhelmingly majority of lawmakers, making its inevitable demise more frustrating.

When bills fail to cross the finishing line of the president's desk, the rationale usually is that "time ran out." However, with politically popular legislation, the real culprit is usually a powerful subcommittee or committee chairman.

On Feb. 15, 2005, Green introduced a bill to strengthen laws against animal fighting. Two months later, 70 lawmakers had signed on as cosponsors and the Senate passed similar legislation by unanimous consent. By the end of February 2006, the number of cosponsors totaled 221. In mid-May, a subcommittee held a hearing on the bill.

On Sept. 20, in a video sent to Congress, wrestling-entertainment star Hulk Hogan stated, "The laws against animal fighting just aren't tough enough."

On Sept. 25, the Humane Society urged House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) to put the bill on the House calendar.

Yet, nearly two years after it was introduced, hope is all that Green and his supporters have left.

"I am hopeful we will find a way to pass this legislation before the end of session," Green wrote in an e-mail to The Hill.

A lobbyist familiar with the issue blames Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner Jr. (R-Wis.) for stifling its passage.

Wayne Pacelle, president and CEO of the Humane Society of the United States, said that Sensenbrenner "has been an impediment on this bill." He says the group doesn't know why the chairman, from Green's own state and political party, is holding it up.

Judiciary Committee spokesman Terry Shawn did not know why the bill hasn't been passed, but said "there certainly have been a number of priorities," citing homeland security matters. He did not follow up on the matter.

Rep. John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.), who is expected to head the Judiciary Committee in 2007, is a cosponsor on Green's bill. But there is no next year for the retiring Green, who ran unsuccessfully for governor.

As time runs out in the Congress, politics can trump policy in deciding which bills become law. Even if a bill has more than enough support to pass if brought to the floor, powerful members and long-held vendettas can determine a bill's fate.

Some lawmakers file discharge petitions to get their bills out of committee, trying to attach their legislation to appropriations bills or wage last-ditch efforts to get their objectives pushed through.

For Rep. Phil English (R-Pa.), who introduced a bill that would repeal Medicare's outpatient therapy caps, time just isn't on his side. His bill has 260 cosponsors.

"Frankly, it's not our time yet," said Julia Wanzco, English's press secretary. "Patience is a virtue in the legislative process."

Wanzco stressed that there have been other vehicles for her boss to accomplish his goal — other legislation has created a temporary fix, while his bill would permanently eradicate the healthcare caps.

Other bills require that companion legislation be passed along with them.

For instance, Sen. Pete Domenici (R-N.M.) has a series of three bills that would bolster research-and-development programs, each of which has at least 60 cosponsors. But each of the measures was relegated to a separate committee, making passage difficult, Domenici's spokesman Matt Letourneau said. The bills have since been folded into a broad leadership bill, which may or may not be passed this year, he said.

Rep. Bob Filner (D-Calif.) introduced legislation in January 2005 that would allow World War II Merchant Marines and Naval and Army transportation personnel to be eligible for benefits. He's got 267 cosponsors, but it hasn't yet passed.

"It has a bipartisan majority, but the Veterans [Affairs] Committee Chairman [Steve Buyer (R-Ind.)] just won't move it," Filner told The Hill.

The Veterans Affairs Committee's press secretary, Brooke Adams, said that Buyer has policy concerns with the bill.

And even though Filner had so many cosponsors, his discharge petition fell short by about 40 signatures, locking the bill in committee.

Leadership officials have warned their members not to sign on to discharge petitions. It is rare for GOP members to sign them because they are viewed as a rebuff of their leaders. Yet the week after the GOP washout on Election Day, Reps. Walter Jones (R-N.C), Ron Paul (R-Texas), and Ted Poe (R-Texas) put their names on discharge petitions.

Explaining his boss's decision to sign a petition on an education bill, Paul spokesman Jeff Deist said, "I think he was hopeful that leadership would do something about it and … there's no reason to give deference to the leadership if it's going to be different in the spring."

Sometimes a bill would be a piece of a larger puzzle that never gets discussed. Debate on Social Security reform, for example, was crucial for Rep. Buck McKeon's (R-Calif.) chances for his legislation, which had 326 cosponsors.

"The thought was that it would be incorporated into any Social Security reform package, [but] time ran out. We never got that far," said James Geoffrey, McKeon's press secretary.

One Democratic aide, who chose to remain anonymous because of the sensitivity of his boss's bill, said it all comes down to money: "[Many bills have] a lot of members' support, but they're not paid for," he said. "There's a cost. It's not in the budget. It's not paid for; it ought to be, but it's not."

Sen. James Inhofe (R-Okla.), who introduced a bill that would give Native American code-talkers commemorative medals, expressed frustration earlier this year when his bill stalled.

"The hard part of the bill was you have to have two-thirds of members to get it out of the Banking Committee. We had 79 on this," Inhofe said. "There wasn't any opposition to it, [but] a lot of people don't want to add any more commemorative medals."

Things changed in September, however, as Inhofe's press secretary Ryan Thompson had breaking news to relay: "I'm doing fantastic," he said. "The code-talkers bill went late last night."

GOP House Leaders Choose To Let Bill Die (WP)

By Mary Beth Sheridan And Yolanda Woodlee

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

Republican congressional leaders decided yesterday not to bring to the floor a bill giving the District a full voting member of the House, dooming the measure's chances in this legislative session.

Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), the bill's author, had appealed to his party's leadership to cram in a vote during Congress's lame-duck session, which could end as soon as Thursday. But in a closed-door meeting, House leaders rejected the request.

"There was a certain level of resistance because there were a number of constitutional concerns from members," said Kevin Madden, a spokesman for Rep. John A. Boehner (R-Ohio), the House majority leader. He did not elaborate.

The bill had faced long odds for approval this week, given the time constraints. Even if it got through the House, it would have needed to clear the Senate. But proponents had taken heart from the bipartisan support it had attracted. The bill would have balanced the new seat for the mostly Democratic District with an additional one for heavily Republican Utah.

D.C. Mayor Anthony A. Williams (D) criticized lawmakers for not moving ahead this week. "I'm disappointed because District residents have waited long enough for basic voting rights, and we shouldn't have to wait one day longer," Williams said in a statement.

Questions about the bill's legal merits have persisted, as it worked its way through Congress this year. Some scholars have testified that the Constitution limits full membership in Congress to states; others have argued that Congress has the authority to treat the District as a state for the purposes of representation.

Davis, working with Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton (D-D.C.) and other voting-rights advocates, had built a wide-ranging coalition to support the bill, and had won the backing of some prominent legal scholars. He and Norton expressed dismay at the decision.

"It's tough to take after we, along with D.C. residents, had created so much momentum for this bipartisan bill," Davis and Norton said in a statement. "We got it farther than anyone anticipated."

They pledged to reintroduce the bill "as our first order of business in the 110th Congress."

Norton has represented the city in the House for eight terms, introducing legislation and serving on committees. But she is not allowed to vote on the floor. Advocates have sought to give the District a vote in Congress for decades, and backers are not giving up.

Some supporters are optimistic that it can win approval next year when Democrats take control of Congress. The House speaker-elect, Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), is a co-sponsor of the measure, and Democrats have generally been more amenable to the issue.

In his statement, Williams said he hoped that the new Congress will revisit the issue next month.

Mayor-elect Adrian M. Fenty, who met with Norton and Pelosi last week, echoed that view. "I look forward to working with all stakeholders to ensure passage of the bill and enfranchisement for District residents," he said.

But Ilir Zherka, executive director of DC Vote, an advocacy group that had been promoting the bill, said he worries that lawmakers will be too busy with budget bills and other priorities to consider the measure early in 2007.

"We're very skeptical about what might happen next year," he said.

District officials were jubilant after the voting measure was approved last May by the House Committee on Government Reform, chaired by Davis. The bill then moved to the Judiciary Committee, where it was held up over its plan to make Utah's new seat at-large, an arrangement some legislators considered unconstitutional.

To resolve that concern, the Utah legislature met in special session Monday to approve a redistricting map that would include a fourth congressional seat for the state. But the move came too late to propel the bill to a full House vote.

House Doesn't Allow D.C.- Vote Decision (WT)

By Gary Emerling

The Washington Times, December 6, 2006

Congressional leaders decided not to allow a House vote this week on a measure that would give D.C. residents a vote in Congress for the first time.

Sponsors of the bill said last night that Republican leaders won't bring the measure to the floor during the lame-duck session that ends this week.

D.C. Delegate Eleanor Holmes Norton, a Democrat, and Rep. Thomas M. Davis III, Virginia Republican, expressed their disappointment that the measure won't be voted on until after the new Congress is sworn in next month.

"It's tough to take after we, along with D.C. residents, had created so much momentum for this bipartisan bill," Mr. Davis and Mrs. Norton said in a joint statement. "We got it farther than anyone anticipated. We're disappointed not for ourselves but for residents of the District and Utah and all those who joined this fight for justice over the past four years."

The D.C. Voting Rights Act would give the overwhelmingly Democratic District a full vote in the House and create a fourth House seat for predominantly Republican Utah.

Mrs. Norton and Mr. Davis said they will reintroduce the measure in January. Under current House rules, Mrs. Norton only has a vote in committee and cannot vote on final legislation.

"The main problem is time," Mrs. Norton conceded earlier this week.

Mayor Anthony A. Williams, who leaves office Jan. 2, said it was "unfair and unreasonable" for the Republican-controlled Congress to shelve the issue.

"I'm disappointed because District residents have waited long enough for basic voting rights, and we shouldn't have to wait one day longer," Mr. Williams said.

Mayor-elect Adrian M. Fenty met with House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi last week to discuss the bill's prospects.

Jennifer Crider, a spokeswoman for the California Democrat, said the bill would be a priority for Democratic lawmakers next session when they are in control of the 110th Congress.

The Utah Legislature on Monday approved a map dividing the state into four congressional districts instead of three. The redistricting map was required by lawmakers to move the bill forward.

The two additional seats would expand the House permanently from 435 to 437 members.

House Republicans Stop Plan For District Of Columbia Seat (NYT)

By Kirk Johnson

The New York Times, December 6, 2006

SALT LAKE CITY, Dec. 5 — A day after the Republican-led Utah Legislature approved a package aimed at creating two new seats in Congress, one for Utah and one for the District of Columbia, Republican leaders in Congress said the plan was dead and would not be voted on this session.

A spokesman for the chief backer of the plan, Representative Thomas M. Davis III, Republican of Virginia, said Mr. Davis would push for reconsideration. Failing that, the spokesman said, Mr. Davis would reintroduce the package in the next Congress, which the Democrats will lead.

A spokesman for Gov. Jon Huntsman Jr. of Utah, a Republican, said Mr. Huntsman had not given up either and was making calls on Tuesday to Washington in an effort to keep the idea alive.

"We're disappointed, but we view this as a temporary setback, not by any means a final decision," said the spokesman, Mike Mower.

A Utah-Washington axis, with one side heavily Republican here in Utah and the other overwhelmingly Democratic in Washington, was clearly an odd-duck creation from the beginning.

The plan emerged out of an effort to gain voting representation on Capitol Hill for Washington residents, who have never been a voting voice in Congress. Utah was enlisted as a partner because it has its own grudges about representation. An undercount in the 2000 Census robbed Utah, leaders in both parties say, of a fourth Congressional seat that they believe they are due.

Utah fulfilled its part of the pact on Monday, calling a one-day legislative session at a cost of $15,000 to create a redistricting map for the proposed fourth seat, almost certainly to be held by a Republican.

A new Republican seat for Utah was meant to ease the way through the House and Senate by the Washington bill, the District of Columbia Fair and Equal Voting Rights Act.

That measure would allow residents to elect a voting member of Congress. That new representative would presumably be a Democrat. Thus, one new seat on each side of the aisle balancing the other.

Some Republicans in the Utah Legislature balked, saying that the Constitution authorized representation only to the states and that unless the status of the District of Columbia was changed or the constitutional language about statehood was changed, the courts would probably strike down the plan.

The bill's fate in the Senate was also questionable, especially if an allowance for representation in the House for the District of Columbia might lead to calls for a Senate seat, too.

GOP's Big Plans Yield Little Gain (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey And Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — Twelve years after Republicans stormed into power on Capitol Hill with ambitious plans for action on energy exploration, abortion and other key issues, the GOP wraps up its run at the helm this week with a legislative whimper.

One of the few bills that may emerge from Congress before it adjourns for the year would expand oil drilling in the Gulf of Mexico. Yet even if the GOP succeeds in pushing the measure into law, it will be a more modest and much less controversial plan than party leaders envisioned just months ago.

In the House, a GOP-backed bill may pass that would require abortion providers to tell patients that fetuses feel pain. But the measure not only falls far short of initiatives Republicans once hoped to enact that would rein in abortions, it stands virtually no chance of taking effect — the Senate has no intention of considering the bill before leaving town.

The energy and abortion bills are examples of the last gasps of an expiring GOP wish list.

With Democrats slated to take control of Congress in January, proposals to expand oil drilling and reduce abortions are unlikely to see the light of day during the next two years. Instead, they will join other mainstays of the Republican agenda — such as abolishing the estate tax, limiting medical malpractice lawsuits and banning gay marriages — on the legislative sidelines.

GOP lawmakers express resignation as they contemplate seeing many of their cherished goals consigned to oblivion, replaced by priorities near and dear to the hearts of Democrats.

"It's going to be a challenge … and I say that tragically," said Rep. Christopher H. Smith (R-N.J.), whose bill on fetal pain will come up today for what almost assuredly will be its last vote in the foreseeable future.

A cornerstone of the Republican agenda was a pledge to control federal spending. But the party's congressional leaders have faced mounting criticism from their own rank-and-file members on this front as the federal budget deficit has grown in recent years. And in the final days of this congressional session, the GOP is making little effort to pass a series of bills to fund the federal government next year, much less implement any long-term budget restraints.

"There is a sense that the Republicans ultimately … said, 'Let the Democrats sweep up after the elephants, " said Ross K. Baker, a congressional scholar at Rutgers University in New Jersey.

As of Tuesday, Congress had cleared just two of 11 spending measures for the government — one that provides money for the Pentagon, the other for the Department of Homeland Security. Rather than grapple with tough spending decisions for the array of other agencies, the Republicans plan instead to pass a stopgap funding measure, leaving it to the Democratic-controlled Congress to adopt new funding bills early next year.

G. William Hoagland, the top budget aide to outgoing Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), chalked up this scenario to "a dispirited GOP."

The abortion bill pending before the House has been a second-tier priority for anti-abortion activists, said Douglas Johnson of the National Right to Life Committee.

Under it, women whose pregnancies are 20 weeks past fertilization would have to be informed that "substantial evidence" existed that fetuses experience pain as an abortion is performed. The bill's supporters hope this requirement could dissuade some women from following through with an abortion.

The measure's assertion that fetuses feel pain is in dispute. But in a sign of the relatively low importance attached to the measure, it is not being actively opposed by NARAL Pro-Choice America, one of the nation's leading abortion rights groups.

Republicans scored some successes in the battles over abortion during their years in power. One of the most prominent was the 2003 passage of a bill banning so-called "partial-birth abortions," a procedure often used to end pregnancies during the second trimester.

The measure has yet to take effect, however, pending a U.S. Supreme Court ruling on its constitutionally. And this year, anti-abortion activists suffered a setback when Congress deadlocked on a measure that would have toughened parental-consent laws involving minors who crossed state lines for abortions.

Republicans have similarly had to scale back their hopes for expanding oil drilling off the nation's coastline.

House leaders had been holding out for a far-reaching measure that would have relaxed a decades-long ban on drilling in most coastal waters, including those in the Pacific Ocean. But pro-drilling industry groups lobbied the leaders to accept the more limited Senate bill that focuses only on the Gulf Coast.

"We want to take what we can get" before Democrats take over Capitol Hill, said Rep. John E. Peterson (R-Pa.). "This is about a fraction of what we really wanted to do, but it's helpful."

Panel Turf Wars Looming (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, December 6, 2006

Incoming Democratic House committee chairmen among themselves are edging toward a turf war and tricky talks with the Senate by pressing to reverse structural changes made to their panels by former Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) and other Republican leaders.

Rep. John Dingell (D-Mich.), who for years struck fear in executive-branch officials and industry bosses as chairman of the Energy and Commerce Committee, is arguing that his panel should be given back important jurisdictions that Republicans stripped from it.

He is at odds with incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), who has opposed him in the past. She has said there will not likely be any changes of jurisdiction between committees. “I don’t think we’ll be changing jurisdictions but we’ll have to take a look at it,” Pelosi told The Hill.

Rep. Dave Obey (D-Wis.), the presumed next chairman of the Appropriations Committee, is also seeking changes of jurisdiction and is haggling with Sen. Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.) over reversing changes the GOP made to his panel’s jurisdictional structure.

But while Pelosi, keen to avoid turf battles, does not support changing committee jurisdictions, she has given Obey a green light to change the structure of his panel because the reforms would be internal.

Obey, a close ally of Pelosi’s, plans to add at least one new appropriations subcommittee and make Rep. Jose Serrano (D-N.Y.) a subcommittee chairman, according to House Democratic sources. That would allow at least one member of a racial minority to wield a gavel on the panel.

Obey is going to restore the Legislative Branch subcommittee and give the Defense Appropriations subcommittee headed by Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.), another Pelosi ally, control over military healthcare issues, a big defense account, said a senior Democrat.

Dingell is one of a few House committee ranking members who have approached the Democratic leadership about jurisdictional issues, said a Democratic aide. The Small Business Committee is also pressing jurisdictional concerns.

Dingell says his panel would be more effective than Financial Services in presiding over securities, insurance and accounting, areas that Republicans carved away from Commerce. Republicans added those powers to the old Banking Committee and turned it into the Financial Services Committee.

"The Commerce Committee has always functioned very well with that jurisdiction. There were no scandals in the financial world whatsoever," said Dingell. "Since they carved up the jurisdiction we have a seen a number of scandals. I think rectification of those problems includes returning jurisdiction to where it was exercised well and where it properly belongs."

When asked whether he would press leaders to make those changes, Dingell responded: "We're still working on that."

Rep. Henry Waxman (D-Calif.), the second-most senior Democrat on Commerce, supports Dingell.

"I've heard his arguments and they're very persuasive to me as a member of the Energy and Commerce Committee," said Waxman.

But Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.), incoming chairman of Financial Services, said there would be no jurisdictional realignment between his panel and Commerce. Frank noted that Rep. Mike Capuano (D), chairman of the Committee on Organization, Study, and Review, which is reviewing changes to House rules, is a fellow member of the Massachusetts delegation.

Frank said his staff and the staffs of other incoming chairmen would form a working group to ensure jurisdictional cooperation between committees.

Several senior members of the House Appropriations Committee said Obey and Byrd, the incoming chairman of the Senate panel, would implement reforms to align the Senate and House.

At the beginning of the 109th Congress, House Republicans eliminated the VA, HUD and Independent agencies subcommittee as well as the District of Columbia and Legislative Branch subcommittees.

In the Senate, Republicans managed to reach agreement on eliminating only the District of Columbia subcommittee, creating a misalignment between the two chambers. The Senate Appropriations Committee has 12 subcommittees while its House counterpart has 10. Because each is responsible for crafting a spending bill funding a portion of government, the mismatch created a headache for Senate and House negotiators seeking compromises between significantly differing versions.

Several senior members of the House committee said Obey and Byrd would restructure their respective subcommittees to create alignment.

Democrats have only agreed to add one new House subcommittee. But to create a match with the Senate another would be needed, or a Senate sub-panel would have to be eliminated, something almost impossible in light of how protective Senate subcommittee chairmen are of their fiefdoms.

"I'm told they're trying to get the House Appropriations subcommittees to match the subcommittees in the Senate," said Rep. Ed Pastor (D-Ariz.).

Pastor said the creation of at least one new subcommittee would create "a possibility for Serrano to be made whole."

Serrano, who had served as the ranking Democrat on the old Commerce, Justice, State and Judiciary subcommittee, lost his chance to become a subcommittee chairman because of the Republican alignment. He has since argued in private meetings with his colleagues that he should be given a new position because it's important to have at least one racial minority member wield an Appropriations gavel. Serrano is Hispanic.

One of the other Democrats to lose an Appropriations subcommittee two years ago was Rep. Chaka Fattah (D-Pa.), who is black. All Appropriations subcommittee ranking Democrats are white.

"I think it's important to have diversity," said Pastor.

Obey said he would not discuss changes until he is officially made chairman this week.

Democrats Stick With Seniority In Round One (HILL)

By Josephine Hearn

As expected, seniority ruled the first round of selections for House committee chairmen yesterday afternoon, despite Democratic leaders' repeated insistence that seniority would be only one of many factors weighed in choosing panel leaders.

In the first of what will be many decisions the Democratic Steering and Policy Committee will make in coming weeks, the panel met to select the chairmen of four "exclusive" committees: Appropriations, Ways and Means, Energy and Commerce and Financial Services. The leader of the fifth exclusive committee, Rules, is appointed by House Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.).

Although the results of yesterday's meeting were expected — Rep. Dave Obey (D-Wis.) will chair Appropriations, Rep. Charles Rangel (D-N.Y.) Ways and Means, Rep. John Dingell (D-Mich.) Energy and Commerce and Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.) Financial Services — the gathering raised an obvious question among House Democrats: whether committee chairmen would cooperate with Democratic leaders or whether some would chart their own course on certain issues.

Frank said he did not foresee any differences.

"We've almost always worked together for the past two years, so I don't see why it will be any different," Frank said. "We have great cooperation, a lot of collegiality. We'll work together."

Pelosi was expected to appoint Rep. Louise Slaughter (D-N.Y.) as Rules Committee chairwoman and Rep. John Spratt (D-S.C.) as Budget Committee chairman last night, with plans for the full caucus to ratify them today.

"We don't have any problems with that," Slaughter said, responding to a question about potential friction.

"Whatever message or direction leadership wants to move forward with, I'm comfortable with that," declared Rep. Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.), expected chairman of the Homeland Security Committee.

All incoming committee chairmen have fulfilled their member dues requirements to the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, some paying much more than obligated. The two members vying to chair the Veterans Affairs Committee, Reps. Bob Filner (D-Calif.) and Mike Michaud (D-Maine), paid their $125,000 requirements. Veterans Affairs is the only disputed committee. The Steering Committee is expected to decide that contest by the end of the week.

Nearly all of the chairmanships will go to the Democratic member with the most seniority. Democrats have long held seniority in high regard and these decisions are unlikely to change that. In such an atmosphere, a member's dues payments or his or her overall political activity is less important. Frank said that dues were no factor at all in awarding chairmanships. More important, he said, was how a member had weighed in on key votes.

"There's more concern about voting record than giving record," he said.

But several years ago, Rep. Collin Peterson (D-Minn.) nearly missed becoming the ranking Democrat on the Agriculture Committee in part because he had failed to pay all his dues.

This year, Peterson paid all $200,000 of his requirement.

Democratic leaders hope to finish awarding chairmanships by week's end. The sooner they can dispense with the task, the better, Democratic sources said, since Democrats plan a flurry of activity when they formally take control of the chamber on Jan. 4.

"I have bad news for you. Those trips you had planned in January, forget 'em," joked House Majority Leader-elect Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) to reporters yesterday. "We will be working almost every day in January, starting with the fourth."

Hoyer said the House would conduct business Monday through Friday.

"Most weeks, yes, we will be working Monday, we will come in Monday at 6:30 [p.m.] and be working on Friday … until about 2 o'clock in the afternoon to give people time so they can get home," he said.

Black Caucus Ready To Flex Political Muscle (WT)

By Brian Debose

The Washington Times, December 6, 2006

The Congressional Black Caucus today will announce its leadership team and agenda for the 110th Congress with Rep. Carolyn Cheeks Kilpatrick, the group's chairman, expected to refocus on urban and poverty issues.

The Michigan Democrat, whose son Kwame Kilpatrick is mayor of Detroit, could be one of the most effective CBC chairman in 20 years because many caucus members are likely to lead key House committees -- Judiciary, Homeland Security, Administration, and Ways and Means.

Almost every piece of legislation that Democrats bring to the House floor will have to pass the approval of a CBC member. The group, composed of Democrats, also will benefit from almost 17 subcommittee chairmanships and former CBC Chairman James E. Clyburn, South Carolina Democrat, as the House majority whip.

"The black caucus has an opportunity to raise the ante on its label as 'the conscience of the Congress' and will have the strength to deal with poverty issues; developing a better, more friendly relationship with Africa; criminal-justice issues; and the overwhelming work to be done in the Gulf region," said Rep. Sheila Jackson-Lee, Texas Democrat, who is expected to be elected as CBC whip.

Reps. Barbara Lee of California and Emanuel Cleaver II of Missouri will serve as the vice chairmen, and Rep. Danny K. Davis of Illinois, will be the secretary, said staffers and members who spoke with The Washington Times yesterday.

Mr. Cleaver said his top priority will be to push for an end to state election laws that require voters to present state-issued identification to vote, an issue that will be taken up by his CBC colleague, the next chairman of the House Administration Committee, Rep. Juanita Millender-McDonald of California.

"Congressman Ike Skelton who lives in my metropolitan area couldn't vote because he showed up at the polls and didn't have a driver's license -- Ike has polio and can't use his arms and has no need for a license," Mr. Cleaver said, adding, "That kind of foolishness has to stop."

He said the public should expect the CBC leaders to move Democrats to address several issues, such as police misconduct, HIV/AIDS, mandatory minimum jail sentences and other issues that have been "ignored now for decades."

Mr. Cleaver said he soon expects the group to announce its legislative agenda for the first 100 hours of Congress to go in tandem with the issues House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi of California has said will be done in that time.

The agenda is not likely to change much under the new leadership because almost every caucus member supported the agenda of the outgoing chairman, Rep. Melvin Watt, North Carolina Democrat, to end racial disparities in access to education, employment, incarceration rates and health care.

"He has created a wonderful platform for them and they are well-positioned to address issues that in many instances are considered privileges to some but for us in the CBC we consider civil rights," said Rep. Elijah E. Cummings, Maryland Democrat and a past CBC chairman.

However, both he and Mr. Watt said the black caucus would be only as strong as its bonds with the leadership and the congressional Hispanic and Asian and Pacific Islander caucuses.

Mr. Cummings said that when he was chairman, the agendas of the black and Hispanic caucuses were identical with the exception of immigration.

"It was not on our core agenda when it started to gain resonance in the public debate, because it wasn't something that we really had to deal with," Mr. Watt said.

He said the group in the past year decided to work toward a common set of principles on immigration policy with the other minority caucuses that he expects the new leadership to advance.

"One of the primary tenets is a living wage for all workers, legal, illegal or otherwise," Mr. Watt said.

Rep. Bennie Thompson, Mississippi Democrat, who will be chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, said the second issue would be crafting an entry policy that is neither discriminatory based on race nor arbitrary based on country of origin.

House GOP Fixes Panel Term Limits (HILL)

By Patrick O'connor

The Hill, December 6, 2006

Republicans renewed their six-year term limits on top committee posts yesterday, dealing a blow to three outgoing chairmen who lobbied for a rules change to head their respective panels in the minority.

Rep. Dana Rohrabacher (R-Calif.) also withdrew his amendment to the party's internal rules that would allow ranking Republicans who are term-limited out of those posts to retain the chairman's gavel if the GOP returns to the majority.

During the closed-door session in the Longworth House Office Building, Minority Leader-elect John Boehner (R-Ohio) instead agreed to create a review task force to study the impact of that change, members and staff present said.

Boehner agrees in principle with Rohrabacher's amendment, GOP leadership aides said, but would like to study it further before implementing the change.

Republicans are set to decide which members will head select panels during Steering Committee meetings today and tomorrow, and members of the conservative Republican Study Committee (RSC) will also decide their next chairman in a bruising race between Reps. Jeb Hensarling (R-Texas) and Todd Tiahrt (R-Kan.).

Tiahrt is the choice of the group's three remaining founders, but Hensarling scrambled to continue building support for his own campaign on the eve of today's election. One of the founders was rumored to be questioning Hensarling's record on immigration yesterday in calls to other members using misleading information, GOP aides said yesterday.

With Republicans set to decide the top committee posts this week, GOP leaders are not expected to decide individual committee slots until Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) determines the ratio of Republicans to Democrats on each panel. Her office has not yet notified the leaders of those ratios, and Republicans this week have not heard any timeline for those decisions to be made.

"No decision has been made yet," Pelosi spokeswoman Jennifer Crider said.

The biggest question regards members on the so-called "A" committees, with Energy and Commerce most likely to shed Republicans.

Republicans lost nine seats on the Ways and Means Committee and at least six on the Appropriations panel to either retirement or the election whereas three GOP lawmakers lost their reelection or retired from Energy and Commerce.

Meanwhile, there have been rumblings that incoming Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman John Dingell (D-Mich.) would like to increase the size of the panel, according to lobbyists with work before the committee. A number of Republicans will soon make their case to the leaders and Rep. Joe Barton (R-Texas), the presumed ranking Republican on that panel.

Republican rules prohibit members on an "A" committee from serving on any other panel, but at least eight Energy and Commerce members currently do, including Veterans Affairs Chairman Steve Buyer (R-Ind.) and Reps. Barbara Cubin (R-Wyo.), Vito Fossella (R-N.Y.), Paul Gillmor (R-Ohio), Ralph Hall (R-Texas), Charles Norwood (R-Ga.), George Radanovich (R-Calif.) and Cliff Stearns (R-Fla.).

Barton moved to force Rep. Heather Wilson (R-N.M.) off his panel a couple of years ago. But Wilson, a former Air Force officer, opted to resign from the Armed Services Committee and retained her spot on Energy and Commerce.

Boehner and a spokesman for the committee both said Barton and the leadership have not discussed enforcing the prohibition and will not address the issue until Pelosi determines the ratios.

Steering Committee members allowed Buyer to hold his seat on Energy and Commerce when he was named chairman two years ago, and he expects the committee to make a similar decision this year.

At the time, Rep. John McHugh (R-N.Y.) asked Buyer if he would stay on Energy and Commerce if he assumed the Veterans Affairs chairmanship, but Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), who had just forced Rep. Chris Smith (R-N.J.) to retire his gavel on that panel in favor of the Indiana Republican, told committee members there would not be a problem with Buyer retaining his membership on the powerful A committee, Buyer said yesterday.

Stearns also would like to remain on Veterans Affairs and believes his status as a veteran along with waning interest in the committee itself should allow him to hold both posts.

"I would like to retain my seniority on the Veterans Affairs Committee and to continue to build upon my successes for veterans, and I will make that case to Mr. Barton," Stearns said in a statement e-mailed by his office.

The closest decisions during this week's Steering Committee meeting should be in the races to determine the top spots on Budget, Financial Services, International Relations and Transportation and Infrastructure. Republicans have been campaigning for these slots for much of the last Congress because each panel's chairman was set to be term-limited out of the top spot.

The committee will also decide the ranking slots on Judiciary, Resources, Science, Small Business and Ways and Means.

Outgoing Judiciary Chairman James Sensenbrenner Jr. (R-Wis.), who had lobbied to retain the top spot on that committee, will make his case to the Steering Committee this week to once again be the top GOP member on the Science Committee. He served as chairman for four years before winning the Judiciary gavel.

House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee Chairman Don Young (R-Alaska) and House Small Business Committee Chairman Don Manzullo (R-Ill.) had also pushed to retain their senior Republican posts.

Republicans want to settle these committee decisions as soon as possible so that the ranking members can determine their staffs in time to combat Democrats during the rollout of their priority legislation during their first 100 hours in power.

"Anytime there is a transfer of power, you have a challenge in continuity," Buyer said, adding committees need to staff up in an attempt to stifle Democratic momentum.

Dems Split On Extent Of Ethics Changes (USAT)

By Fredreka Schouten

USA Today, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — A senator and spouse spend several days in Asia, their airfare, meals and hotel bills paid for by a trade association. Former lawmakers who work as lobbyists use a taxpayer-owned gym reserved for members of Congress. Several House members catch a ride on a corporate jet, avoiding long airport lines but paying only a fraction of the flight's cost.

These are the kind of perks enjoyed by current and former members of Congress that could end under a package of ethics changes Democratic leaders intend to push when they assume control of Congress in January. But less than a month after sweeping into office on the promise of a major ethics overhaul, Democrats are divided over just how much change is needed.

Several Democrats, citing the corruption scandals that beset Congress in the past year, want tougher standards than their leaders have proposed. The major points of contention: Whether lawmakers should police themselves and how much to clamp down on earmarks, the special projects that lawmakers, often anonymously, insert into spending bills to benefit hometown or special interests.

Sen. Joe Lieberman, D-Conn., said there's no doubt an ethics bill will pass Congress. "The question is: Will it be as strong and comprehensive as it should be?"

Lieberman was among a small, bipartisan coalition of lawmakers who on Tuesday promised a broad array of changes. Specifically, they backed the creation of an Office of Public Integrity to launch and carry out ethics probes. That power now resides with the House and Senate ethics committees, which the lawmakers slammed as failing to act on corruption charges.

Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., has proposed an ethics enforcement commission with similar powers.

Getting an independent watchdog will be a "very tough battle," said Fred Wertheimer, president of Democracy 21, a non-partisan group pushing ethics changes. But "if they don't address the ethics enforcement process, they will have failed in a major way to address the ethics problems in Congress."

Incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., has pledged to make changes to ethics rules the first order of business when the new Congress convenes. Under a proposal she unveiled this year, Democrats would eliminate a wide array of lobbying practices — from banning lobbyist-funded travel and gifts to barring former lawmakers-turned-lobbyists from the House floor and the members-only gym. The proposal would require greater public disclosure of some earmarks.

The stakes are high for Democrats and Pelosi, who pledged to deliver "the most honest, most open and most ethical Congress in history" in the wake of corruption scandals that led to investigations of several lawmakers and prison terms for Rep. Duke Cunningham, R-Calif., and disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Polls show widespread concern. In a USA TODAY/Gallup national poll taken Oct.6-8, 86% of adults said corruption in government would be "extremely" or "very important" in their votes for Congress. Only 46% of adults polled after the election (Nov. 9-12) said Democrats were likely to curb corruption. The polls had a margin of error of +/-3 percentage points.

In a recent memo to colleagues, Rep. Rahm Emanuel, D-Ill., who oversaw campaign efforts for House Democrats, said failing to deliver ethics reforms "would be devastating to our standing with the public and … jeopardize some of our marginal seats."

Emanuel and Rep. Chris Van Hollen, D-Md., are pushing for an outright ban on earmarks that would benefit lawmakers or their families or the companies and lobbying firms that employ the relatives of House members.

The existing Pelosi bill does not go that far. It requires lawmakers to disclose their sponsorship of earmarks in their congressional districts and to declare in writing whether they have a financial interest in the project.

Emanuel, a member of the Democratic leadership, predicted that the final proposal would require earmarks "to have a public purpose, not a private or personal gain."

Creation of an independent body to investigate ethics is more controversial. "Members are almost paranoid about letting anyone else into the (ethics) process," said Thomas Mann of the Brookings Institution.

Pelosi spokeswoman Jennifer Crider said an independent panel is part of discussions, but said, "the ethics committee when it functions, does do its job overseeing members."

Jan Baran, a Washington lawyer and ethics expert, said he believes that ethics reform will pass in the new Congress. "The issue is how will people behave two, three, five years from now," he said.

Liberal Coalition Eyes First Hundred Hours (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

A large group of liberal organizations is planning to wage a national lobbying and public relations campaign to press for passage of the House Democrats' legislative agenda next year, taking a page from longtime corporate practices.

The Change America Now coalition, or CAN, met yesterday at AFL-CIO headquarters to outline the many methods it will use -- including the release of research papers and e-mail and phone bombardment of Congress.

The goal is to persuade on-the-fence lawmakers in more than 80 congressional districts to vote for the "Hundred Hours" agenda, a list of legislation that Democrats hope to approve in the first 100 legislative hours of the new Congress. The agenda includes an increase in the minimum wage and an effort to reduce the cost of Medicare prescription drugs.

The campaign will largely target Republican moderates and Republicans who were narrowly elected in November. The group's leaders said they hope to increase the margin of victory for each plank of the platform in the House to boost the measures' prospects in the Senate -- a much harder place for them to succeed. In addition, they said early wins will make it easier for each organization to persuade Congress later to approve other elements of their own legislative wish lists.

"Groups on the progressive side support the priorities that are represented in the Hundred Hours agenda and we want to see them enacted," said Bill Samuel, the AFL-CIO's legislative director.

Robert L. Borosage, co-director of the liberal Campaign for America's Future, said that approval of the Hundred Hours agenda would also help the public better understand what the incoming Democratic majority stands for. "We are still too undefined," he said, and the Hundred Hours agenda "begins that process" of redefinition.

The 40-member coalition's other major organizers are Americans United, USAction, and labor unions led by the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees, he said.

Yesterday morning, at a regular, biweekly meeting of liberal organizations called the Tuesday Group, about 100 people packed a conference room to hear the coalition's strategy. Representatives of many groups that were instrumental in electing Democrats to Congress this year were there, including the Sierra Club, the League of Conservation Voters, the Association of Trial Lawyers of America, the Center for American Progress and several women's organizations.

The effort they discussed was reminiscent of the elaborate business-backed lobbying campaign 12 years ago that pushed the "Contract With America," which was the then-Republican majority's legislative agenda. Conservative groups including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the Christian Coalition banded together then to lobby the House to pass the GOP's 10-part program.

The meeting was also an echo of a conservatives' gathering that started in 1993 and continues to this day, hosted by Grover G. Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform. Norquist's weekly "Wednesday Meeting" routinely attracts 150 people and is a forum for discussing ways to bolster conservative policies.

Hickey said the liberals' Tuesday Group was designed to counter a government "dominated by the special interests." In response, Norquist said: "So says the guy from the trial lawyers, the labor unions and the radical environmentalists. The Democratic Party is a collection of special interests."

Culture Shock On Capitol Hill: House To Work 5 Days A Week (WP)

By Lyndsey Layton

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

Forget the minimum wage. Or outsourcing jobs overseas. The labor issue most on the minds of members of Congress yesterday was their own: They will have to work five days a week starting in January.

The horror.

Rep. Steny H. Hoyer, the Maryland Democrat who will become House majority leader and is writing the schedule for the next Congress, said members should expect longer hours than the brief week they have grown accustomed to.

"I have bad news for you," Hoyer told reporters. "Those trips you had planned in January, forget 'em. We will be working almost every day in January, starting with the 4th."

The reporters groaned. "I know, it's awful, isn't it?" Hoyer empathized.

For lawmakers, it is awful, compared with what they have come to expect. For much of this election year, the legislative week started late Tuesday and ended by Thursday afternoon -- and that was during the relatively few weeks the House wasn't in recess.

Next year, members of the House will be expected in the Capitol for votes each week by 6:30 p.m. Monday and will finish their business about 2 p.m. Friday, Hoyer said.

With the new calendar, the Democrats are trying to project a businesslike image when they take control of Congress in January. House and Senate Democratic leaders have announced an ambitious agenda for their first 100 hours and say they are adamant about scoring legislative victories they can trumpet in the 2008 campaigns.

Hoyer and other Democratic leaders say they are trying to repair the image of Congress, which was so anemic this year it could not meet a basic duty: to approve spending bills that fund government. By the time the gavel comes down on the 109th Congress on Friday, members will have worked a total of 103 days. That's seven days fewer than the infamous "Do-Nothing Congress" of 1948.

Hoyer said members can bid farewell to extended holidays, the kind that awarded them six weekdays to relax around Memorial Day, when most Americans get a single day off. He didn't mention the month-long August recess, the two-week April recess or the weeks off in February, March and July.

He said members need to spend more time in the Capitol to pass laws and oversee federal agencies. "We are going to meet sufficient times, so the committees can do their jobs on behalf of the American people," he said.

For lawmakers within a reasonable commute of Washington, longer weeks are not a burden -- although they are likely to cut into members' fundraising and campaigning activities. But for members from Alaska and Hawaii, the West Coast, or rural states, the new schedule will mean less time at home and more stress.

"Keeping us up here eats away at families," said Rep. Jack Kingston (R-Ga.), who typically flies home on Thursdays and returns to Washington on Tuesdays. "Marriages suffer. The Democrats could care less about families -- that's what this says."

Time away from Washington is just as important to being an effective member of Congress as time spent in the Capitol, Kingston added. "When I'm here, people call me Mr. Congressman. When I'm home, people call me 'Jack, you stupid SOB, why did you vote that way?' It keeps me grounded."

Rep. Elton Gallegly (R-Calif.), who had intended to retire this year, only to be persuaded to run again, wondered whether the new schedule was more than symbolic. "If we're doing something truly productive, that's one thing," he said. "If it's smoke-and-mirrors hoopla, that's another."

Senate leaders have not set their schedule, but the upper chamber generally works a longer week than the House, though important votes or hearings are usually not scheduled on Mondays or Fridays.

House Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.), one of the architects of the lighter workweek, put the best Republican face on Hoyer's new schedule.

"They've got a lot more freshmen then we do," he said of the Democrats. "That schedule will make it incredibly difficult for those freshmen to establish themselves in their districts. So we're all for it."

The new schedule poses a headache for Rep. Debbie Wasserman Schultz (D-Fla.), who runs her 7-year-old daughter's Brownie troop meetings on Monday afternoons in Weston, Fla. "I'll have to talk to the other mothers and see if we can move it to the weekend," she said.

Setting a calendar that satisfies 435 members is impossible, said the current majority leader, Rep. John A. Boehner (R-Ohio), who will become minority leader in January. "Between the travel issues, the members' work schedules, the family and district issues, it was a Rubik's cube," he said.

But most Democrats, some still giddy from their election victories, seemed game.

"It's long overdue," said Rep. Mike Thompson (D-Calif.), who lives in Napa Valley and will have to leave his home at 3 a.m. on Sundays to catch a flight to Washington in time for work Mondays. "I didn't come here to turn around and go back home."

Inside Politics (WT)

By Greg Pierce

The Washington Times, December 6, 2006

Bonior and Edwards

Former Rep. David E. Bonior, a one-time leader in Congress who has close ties to labor unions, has signed on to manage a future John Edwards presidential campaign.

Mr. Edwards hasn't announced a repeat of his 2004 presidential bid yet, but an Edwards adviser said last week that Mr. Bonior will manage the effort if Mr. Edwards decides to run. In the meantime, Mr. Bonior has signed on as a senior adviser to Mr. Edwards' leadership PAC, the One America Committee, the Associated Press reports.

Mr. Bonior represented Detroit's northern suburbs for 26 years in the House, rising to be the No. 2 Democrat before stepping down in 2002 for an unsuccessful campaign for Michigan governor. Mr. Bonior was a leading advocate for labor unions, a constituency that Mr. Edwards has aggressively been courting.

No mercy

With Republicans on Capitol Hill trying to spend like Democrats and Democrats trying to be as tough as Republicans in the war on terror, the grand difference between the two parties may come down to a matter of scheduling, reports Charles Hurt of The Washington Times.

Republicans prefer to keep lawmakers out of Washington, since that's usually where they do all the damage, and Democrats want members chained to their desks so they can churn out innumerable pages of new federal laws.

"It is appropriate that the do-nothing Congress is ending by doing nothing," incoming House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer said yesterday, discussing this final week's slim agenda.

"I have bad news for you," the Maryland Democrat said. "Those trips you had planned in January? Forget 'em. We will be working almost every day in January."

In a roomful of reporters who have grown accustomed to short workweeks and bankers' hours under Republican rule, the groans were audible.

Then, he laid out the Democratic vision for five-day workweeks as far as the eye can see.

"Monday through Friday?" asked one stunned reporter.

"You will not be excited about it," Mr. Hoyer observed.

"You sound like the principal," complained another reporter.

"I know," Mr. Hoyer said. "It's awful, isn't it? I presumably have some authority over the schedule, and I don't like it."

Faux centrists

"Here comes the 2008 presidential cycle, and on cue, Associated Press reporters are finding 'centrists' in the race whose voting records are NOT a 50-50 mishmash of conservative and liberal," the Media Research Center's Tim Graham writes at www.mrc.org.

"This cycle's 'centrist' contenders are Hillary Clinton (actually strongly, staunchly liberal) and Evan Bayh (liberal most of the time.)

"In a Monday dispatch, AP reporter Beth Fouhy stressed that Hillary Clinton won 'even the most conservative areas of her adopted home state of New York,' but there are drawbacks: 'Despite her centrist six-year Senate voting record, Clinton's reputation remains deeply rooted in her polarizing eight years as first lady.' "

"AP does the same for Sen. Evan Bayh ... 'The 50-year-old senator has charted a centrist's course throughout his political career, including two terms as governor and eight years in the Senate.'

"But the American Conservative Union's voting index doesn't match these assessments. Sen. Bayh's lifetime ACU rating is 21 percent conservative, so he votes the liberal position about four of every five Senate votes they've counted. Hillary Clinton has a lifetime ACU rating of 9 percent, or 91 percent liberal. In 2005, Bayh was a 20. Hillary was a 12.

"Or consult Americans with Democratic Action, the liberal vote-counters. Did they find Evan and Hillary in the center? On their 2005 tally, Hillary Clinton is one of 22 'Senate Heroes' who scored a perfect 100 percent with the liberal group. Evan Bayh scored a less-than-centrist 95."

Still spending

The Senate Budget Committee chairman yesterday chastised his party for trying to tack big-ticket spending items onto end-of-the-year legislation, even though November's election sent a clear message about the need for fiscal discipline, reports Amy Fagan of The Washington Times.

"One of the messages out of the last election was that they expected Congress to be fiscally responsible, especially Republicans," said Sen. Judd Gregg, New Hampshire Republican and outgoing budget panel chairman. He said he hopes Republicans can stick to responsible budgeting in these waning days of their majority rule. "If we can't have it now, when can we have it?" he told reporters in a briefing yesterday.

Specifically, Mr. Gregg is concerned that Republicans are adding a $4.8 billion disaster-relief package for farmers to the agriculture spending bill, without cutting agriculture spending in other areas -- a move he called "excessive, inappropriate" and "a payoff" to farm groups.

He also said there is talk of adding extra items to a popular package of tax-cut extensions that lawmakers are trying to approve this week. Among the items that could catch a ride on the tax-cut bill is a proposal to overhaul the program that provides health care benefits to retired coal miners, which would cost about $4 billion in extra spending, Mr. Gregg said.

Viguerie's lament

Richard A. Viguerie, author of "Conservatives Betrayed: How George W. Bush and Other Big Government Republicans Hijacked the Conservative Cause," yesterday bemoaned the resignation of John R. Bolton as U.S. ambassador to the United Nations:

"There are only a mere handful of conservatives in significant policy-making positions in the Bush Administration. The withdrawal of Ambassador Bolton means there is one less," Mr. Viguerie said. "This is very discouraging to conservatives. Instead of fighting for Ambassador Bolton's confirmation, the Bush administration has once again thrown in the towel."

Bayh's step

Sen. Evan Bayh, Indiana Democrat, announced yesterday that he has formed a presidential exploratory committee.

Mr. Bayh filed federal papers that allow him to raise money and hire staff for a White House run. He is the second Democrat to take a formal step toward a run, after Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack's official announcement of his candidacy last week.

Mr. Bayh, who has been traveling to states with early nominating contests and gauging support for a presidential run for more than a year, said he would make a final decision early next month.

'Full-scale' Sam

Sen. Sam Brownback, Kansas Republican, billed himself as a "full-scale conservative" yesterday as he courted activists in the state that holds the nation's first caucuses, the Associated Press reported.

Mr. Brownback said the lessons Republicans should take from their November election defeats is that they face enormous trouble when the party's conservative base isn't energized.

"Our ideas weren't repudiated; our execution was," he told Linn County Republicans in a trip to Iowa. "Our base was lethargic because of too much spending and the Washington corruption cases."

Mr. Brownback filed papers Monday creating an exploratory committee allowing him to travel the country and raise money for a possible 2008 White House run.

Trio From Hill Ask GSA Head Not To Shift Audit Burden (WP)

By Scott Higham And Robert O'harrow Jr.

DOJ_NMG_0103074

Three federal lawmakers yesterday called on the new administrator of the General Services Administration to halt her plan to replace government auditors in the agency's inspector general's office with private auditors, saying in a letter that the change could lead to less oversight of contractors.

The letter to GSA Administrator Lurita Alexis Doan followed a report in The Washington Post on Saturday that described Doan's plans to cut $5 million in spending on audits and shift responsibility for contract reviews to small, private contractors.

Doan, a former government contractor, recently compared GSA Inspector General Brian D. Miller and his staff to terrorists, according to notes of a meeting taken by GSA officials. Doan has said vendors and government workers reported that Miller's investigators and auditors exerted "undue pressure" on them.

Yesterday, Reps. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.) and James L. Oberstar (D-Minn.) and Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton (D-D.C.) asked Doan to provide a description of her plans and a "detailed analysis of its potential effects" before she moves forward with any changes or budget cuts that would affect the inspector general's work.

"You seem to be reversing the commitments of your predecessor, contradicting the recommendations of GAO, and tampering with a system that works well, all to alleviate the 'stress' of corporations that have attempted to overcharge the taxpayer," the letter said.

Kudos For Those Who Do Good Works Overseas (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

Back in the day, there was naught for a diplomatic spouse to do but bake and complain. But that was then: Yesterday, five State Department employees and spouses were recognized for charitable works abroad -- and two of them were men.

Every year, beside the holiday trees in the stately Benjamin Franklin Room on the department's eighth floor, Associates of the American Foreign Service Worldwide present the Secretary of State's Awards for Volunteerism Overseas, a mouthful of a prize for State employees and spouses whose pro bono goodwill benefits their host countries.

The awardees "symbolize the very best of our American diplomats and their families," said State Department Director General George M. Staples, on hand to present the awards. "They are a tribute to the generosity of the American spirit."

The AAFSW, whose "W" used to stand for "women," was founded in 1960 to advocate for better conditions for diplomatic spouses. (In a clue to those conditions, one of its publications was titled "What Do I Do Now?") Today the group sponsors educational programs, scholarships, online resources and the awards.

This year's uber-volunteers included spouses, full-timers or both.

Steven Carroll, posted to Kabul for a year, dove into Afghanistan's refugee community. After collecting clothes and money from American children for the city's orphanages, he delivered the loot in an armored car.

In Seoul, Kathy Hansen, an employed diplomatic family member, worked for a long list of schools and churches and seemed bent on providing blankets for babies. She also helped finance the adoption of Korean, Chinese and Vietnamese children.

Marian McGowan is a diplomatic spouse and a pillar of Jackie's House, a home for 36 abused, neglected and abandoned children in Santo Domingo, Dominican Republic. Beyond food and supplies, McGowan and her volunteers taught the children to write, speak English and mentor the youngest among them.

A full-time embassy employee in Swaziland, where AIDS affects more than 40 percent of the population, Nelda Villines found time to visit scores of schools and hospitals, distributing food, supplies and 3,000 teddy bears made by U.S. volunteers.

Thomas Yazdgerdi, a political officer in Athens, used his time and clout to help Greece's needy immigrants, who are often subject to discrimination by in-country assistance groups. Yazdgerdi also helped renovate a multicultural day-care center and organized a benefit concert in Greece that raised $100,000 for those left homeless by Hurricane Katrina.

A Commission Made In Heaven (WP)

By Ruth Marcus

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

Forget the Baker-Hamilton commission. I have high hopes for the Clinton-McCain Commission to Fix Social Security. Haven't heard of it? Actually, neither have Hillary Clinton and John McCain. It's my long-shot scheme for tackling the problem.

First, if not now, when? Third-rail political issues such as Social Security benefit from -- maybe even require -- divided government, to share the blame. They can't be touched in an election year. They're difficult to do during a president's first term, if he -- or she -- wants a second. So 2007 offers the last, best hope for some time.

Second, if not Social Security, then what? The political system right now is too broken, and relations between President Bush and congressional Democrats too frayed, to deal with the truly daunting entitlement issues, Medicare and Medicaid. Social Security is entitlement reform on training wheels.

Third, if not them, who? As the front-runners for their parties' presidential nominations, Sens. Clinton (D-N.Y.) and McCain (R-Ariz.) have a shared interest in getting Social Security off the presidential plate before January 2009.

Clinton and McCain have a track record of bipartisan cooperation; working together on Social Security would only serve to burnish a credential that voters seem to crave. By teaming up, they could neutralize Social Security as a general election issue -- neither could use it as a cudgel against the other. Both have expertise in this area without having burrowed into a rigid ideological framework.

Wouldn't each risk attack from rivals for the nomination? Yes, but the counter-argument is that voters will reward gutsiness and bipartisanship. So the short-term political benefits could offset -- if not outweigh -- the potential costs.

For McCain, the political peril is probably less than for Clinton, since his party hasn't made it a near article of faith that benefits can't be cut, retirement ages raised, payroll taxes diverted to private accounts, etc. He has more leeway to embrace alternatives.

For Clinton, the stakes are admittedly higher, but so is the upside. Sure, it's easy to imagine the ominous narration, "Hillary Clinton wants to slash checks for seniors," over the picture of a crying grandma. But some of Clinton's potential opponents serve in the Senate and might be swept along with the momentum of a bipartisan plan. And Clinton could use boldness on Social Security to combat her image as an overly careful, overly poll-driven calculator.

A bigger-tent commission -- Clinton-McCain-Romney-Obama? -- would be just fine, too.

So how to launch? The president should issue an order creating the commission, announce, LBJ-style, that he wants Clinton and McCain at the helm, and impose a tight deadline -- six months at most. That sounds short, but the potential fixes and trade-offs are well known, and, politically, there's little time to spare.

Then he should set up the commission in a way that's doubly tilted against him.

For one, he should forswear any preconditions, which seems to be where the administration is already heading. There's no harm to the administration in dropping its focus on private accounts funded out of payroll taxes--that's the political reality. On taxes, similarly, there's not much to fear: The president's already opened the door to increasing the ceiling on payroll taxes, and the new Democratic majority will be wary of looking like rabid tax-hikers.

More than that, Bush should give Democrats a structural advantage. In a twist on the Greenspan Social Security commission, the president would appoint five members from the executive branch or private life; the Senate majority leader would pick five from among sitting senators or private citizens; and the speaker of the House would similarly name five. But, as with the Greenspan commission, two out of each five would have to be from the opposite party. This would create a commission of eight Democrats and seven Republicans, and drive the membership in a centrist direction.

Why would the president stack the deck against himself? Because he'd be giving Democrats an offer they couldn't afford to refuse -- or be perceived as refusing. Democrats couldn't complain about being rolled by a Republican-dominated panel. Given the toxic level of distrust between the administration and congressional Democrats, it may be the only way to get action. And Bush could protect himself against Democrats Gone Wild by requiring a supermajority of the panel to agree on recommendations.

As it happens, the 25th anniversary of the executive order creating the Greenspan commission is Dec. 16. That would be a nice touch, too. And, Mr. President, senators, consider this headline that ran in The Post 16 months after the Greenspan panel was created: "President, on a Note of Bipartisanship, Signs Social Security Bill." Not a bad end to a troubled presidency -- or a bad launching pad for a new one.

Dark Ages Disclosure (WP)

THR EE YEARS AGO we wrote an editorial using the headline above. It decried the senseless and costly loophole under which people running for the Senate -- alone among federal political candidates and committees -- aren't required to file campaign finance reports electronically. In an age when such reports can be filed with the click of a mouse, Senate candidates submit their disclosures on paper, with weeks of delay before they are transferred to a form available and searchable on the Internet. As a result, in the final stretch of campaigns, anyone interested in learning who is bankrolling Senate candidates or how they are spending the cash has to go page by page through voluminous reports. This delay is so obviously unjustified that we expected the legal glitch to be quickly fixed.

Naive us. Three years later, the situation remains unaddressed. According to the Campaign Finance Institute, as late as the week before Election Day, in all 10 of the most closely followed Senate races, no detailed information was available online about contributions between Oct. 1 and Oct. 18, the last filing period before the election. For six candidates in those races -- Democrats Ned Lamont (Conn.), Claire McCaskill (Mo.) and Sheldon Whitehouse (R.I.), and Republicans Mike DeWine (Ohio), Rick Santorum (Pa.) and Thomas H. Kean Jr. (N.J.) -- the only financial information available was from before June 30.

It would be easy to change the rule, and the Senate should do so in the final days of the 109th Congress. More than 20 senators, of both parties, have signed on to S.1508, the Senate Campaign Disclosure Parity Act. If any senator opposes requiring electronic filing, none is willing to say so. Majority Whip Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.), who was rumored to be opposed to the change, says he is for it. Senate Rules Committee Chairman Trent Lott (R-Miss.), whose panel has jurisdiction in this area, said three years ago that it was "part of honesty in elections, I think. Make it accessible." Now what's needed is for Mr. Lott to get committee members' approval to speed the matter to the Senate floor.

To put it bluntly: Republicans, why let the new Democratic majority get credit for making this obvious fix? Do it now, while you're still in charge.

Take The Schumer Train (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 6, 2006

You would think the last thing Senate Republicans would want to do in their final lame-duck days this week is approve a new $682 million subsidy gift to Senator Chuck Schumer, the New York Democrat who just cleaned their electoral clocks.

No hard feelings. GOP tax writers are preparing to award Mr. Schumer this money for "transportation infrastructure projects." One of the projects to be funded: a new train from Manhattan to John F. Kennedy Airport. Why people in Oshkosh or Olympia should have to pay for this urban choochoo is a mystery.

What makes this project especially objectionable is the creative financing conjured up to pay for it. This earmark hangs like a Christmas ornament from a must-pass bill to extend certain annual tax credits. And how's this for a misnomer? The subsidy is called the "New York Liberty Zone Tax Credit." Here's how it would work: New York would receive up to $2 billion over 10 years (about $1.3 billion of which is September 11 money, for a net new subsidy of $682 million).

Of course, New York City doesn't pay federal taxes, so this bill allows the Big Apple to retain the employer share of the payroll taxes that the city collects on behalf of its public employees. And through some accounting sleight of hand, Treasury would reimburse the Social Security trust fund for the missing dollars. The result: a new $2 billion hole in the budget. Our Congressional sources say this is the first time this kind of tax credit has been provided for a city or state to pay for infrastructure pork.

Imagine the precedent this sets for Democrats preparing to take over the subsidy levers next year. Congressmen in both parties are already lining up to adopt the "New York model" for securing tax pork. Get ready for the Des Moines "Freedom Tax Credit" for wheat and corn production. The whole process is so underhanded that Senator Jim DeMint of South Carolina has declared he will hold up the tax bill if the credit isn't removed. Just what Congress needs: new forms of chicanery to raid the Treasury.

OTHER NEWS:

Where Is The Economy Headed? (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

The U.S. economy can't seem to make up its mind.

It keeps showing strength and weakness, with fresh data yesterday providing still more mixed signals -- and fueling a debate over whether the housing slump is dragging the nation into a recession.

The conflicting data could be a sign that the economy is turning, with what was at first a mild growth slowdown about to give way to a harsher downturn, some analysts said. But others echoed the Federal Reserve, countering that the worst news is still coming from businesses involved in housing and automobile production while the rest of the economy is holding up.

The situation has left many investors confused and queasy; stock prices rose yesterday after falling Friday, as did the dollar.

"No question, housing is in a recession," said Nariman Behravesh, chief economist for Global Insight, an economic research and forecasting firm. "The big question, and where people part ways, is how much effect is this going to have on consumer spending and business spending? . . . Yes, there are scary parts of the economy, but there are other parts that are doing okay."

The pessimists could point yesterday to the Commerce Department's report that new orders to U.S. factories fell 4.7 percent in October, the steepest decline in six years. Much of that reflected falling demand for home-building equipment and materials, as well as automakers' production cuts, analysts said. That echoed a report released Friday showing that manufacturing declined in November.

But optimists noted that the much larger service sector of the economy -- which includes health care, finance, education, travel and entertainment, accounting for 87 percent of the nation's economic output -- grew more briskly in November than in the month before, according to an index published yesterday by the Institute for Supply Management.

Stocks rose yesterday because of that report's "favorable implications for the overall economy," said Stuart Hoffman, chief economist with PNC Financial Services Group.

The economy also headed into the last three months of the year in better health than previously thought, the Labor Department said yesterday, raising its estimate of productivity growth in the July-through-September period.

Growth in productivity -- output per hour of labor -- still slowed sharply from the second quarter, to a weak 0.2 percent annual rate in the third quarter, the department said. But that was higher than its earlier estimate of no growth.

The recent figures all confirm that the economy has lost momentum this year, expanding at a rapid 5.6 percent annual rate in the first three months, at a moderate 2.6 percent pace in the second quarter and at a 2.2 percent pace in the third.

Many economists, including those at the Fed, think growth will be even weaker in the last three months of the year. For example, Macroeconomic Advisers, a St. Louis forecasting firm, predicts that the economy will expand at about a 1.5 percent annual rate in the October-through-December period.

The disagreement is over what comes next.

Fed Chairman Ben S. Bernanke said last week that he foresees moderate economic growth over the next year. Analysts peg that somewhere between a 1 and a 2.6 percent pace, which would be slower than the economy's long-term average.

Bernanke sounded "a little over-optimistic" but not far off, Behravesh said.

"I don't think there is going to be a recession next year," Behravesh said, noting that housing accounts for only about 6 percent of the economy -- enough to slow growth significantly but not stop it.

On the contrary, he said, consumers are spending more because of low 4.4 percent unemployment, decent income growth, rising stock wealth and lower fuel prices. And businesses are exporting more goods to faster-growing economies overseas.

"All the bad signals coming out have to do with housing, and to a lesser extent autos," he said. "Basically, the rest of the economy is giving out reasonably good signals."

Others foresee a darker picture next year, in which consumers pull back more sharply on spending because of rising unemployment, heavy debt and falling home prices.

"I do think in the first part of next year we'll have a recession, and it could be a difficult one," said Charles W. McMillion, chief economist at MBG Information Services, an economic consultancy.

McMillion pointed to the Labor Department's drastic lowering of its estimates of workers' wages and benefits in the spring and summer. According to the figures released yesterday, hourly compensation rose at a 2.6 percent annual rate in the third quarter, down from its earlier estimate of 3.7 percent growth. And the department said compensation fell at a 1.2 percent pace in the second quarter, a reversal of its earlier estimate of 6.6 percent growth.

To financial markets, those figures looked like good news because stronger productivity growth and weaker compensation gains mean less inflationary pressure. That bolstered expectations that the Fed will hold interest rates steady at its policymaking meeting next week, and maybe lower them next year.

But McMillion said consumers and the economy are likely to buckle in coming months. "Stagnant productivity and falling wages is not a healthy combination," he said.

Service Sector Aids Economic Outlook (WT)

The Washington Times, December 6, 2006

From combined dispatches

Economic growth in the vast service sector picked up last month, while productivity growth and labor costs performed better this summer than earlier estimated, according to economic reports out yesterday.

Activity in services accelerated in November, indicating that the economy was able to shake off the effects of a deep housing slump more easily than many economists expected, according to a report from the Institute for Supply Management.

The rise in the institute's service index to 58.9 from 57.1 in October contrasted with a fall into recession territory in the organization's closely watched manufacturing index reported on Friday, and provided a positive offset to a spate of weak economic news last week.

"The reports of the economy's demise may have been premature," said Joel Naroff, president of Naroff Economic Advisors. "It still does not look as if the problems in housing and motor vehicles have spread into the general economy."

Many economists had expected the services index to decline to 55.5. Readings above 50 indicate an expansion in industries such as retailing, banking and construction.

In a reminder that manufacturing remains a question mark, the Commerce Department reported yesterday that orders to U.S. factories plunged 4.7 percent in October, the third decline in the past four months, and the biggest drop in more than six years. The manufacturing sector is experiencing the fallout from this year's slowdown in the overall economy and slumps in auto sales and home construction.

"The overall economy is nowhere near as weak as the manufacturing sector," said John Ryding, chief U.S. economist at Bear Stearns Cos. "It is worth noting that this index is not just a services index, but also includes construction. The improvement in conditions, therefore, took place despite pressures on residential construction and sales."

On another upbeat note, growth in worker productivity was better than previously reported, growing at a 0.2 percent pace rather than staying flat in the third quarter, according to the Labor Department.

Labor costs, including wages and benefits, were lower during the quarter -- rising 2.3 percent rather than 3.8 percent, as earlier reported, the department said.

While rising wages are good news for workers, the increases could fuel unwanted inflation when they outstrip the growth in productivity, or the output per hour of work.

Economists said the productivity news is likely to ease inflation worries at the Federal Reserve, where officials had cited the Labor Department's earlier reading showing a big jump in labor costs as a reason the Fed must be vigilant against inflation.

"Based on these numbers, the Fed can rest easy about the threat of inflation," said Nariman Behravesh, chief economist at Global Insight, a private forecasting firm. "The only debate now seems to be about when the Fed will cut" interest rates.

If inflation remains benign and the overall economy continues to show weakness, the central bank might move as soon as March to start cutting rates, he said.

Despite frequently voiced concerns about stubborn inflation pressures, the Fed paused in its two-year rate-raising campaign in August and has left rates unchanged since then. Most analysts expect the Fed to stay on hold at a meeting of its rate-setting committee next week. Speculation in the financial markets has centered on whether the Fed will have a change of heart and start cutting rates early next year.

The hope that yesterday's better inflation news will help quell the Fed's concerns combined with the unexpectedly strong reading on the service economy to spark a rally on Wall Street yesterday. The Dow Jones industrial average rose 47.75 points to 12,332.

Labor Costs, Revised Downward, Point To Less Inflation Pressure (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, December 6, 2006

U.S. labor costs have been rising at a much slower rate this year than previously thought, suggesting the nation's tight labor market is less likely to stoke inflation in the months ahead.

The Labor Department reported yesterday that unit labor costs in the nonfarm business sector -- a measure of how much employees are paid to produce a single unit of output -- rose at an annualized rate of 2.3% in the third quarter, considerably less than its earlier estimate of 3.8%. In addition, the department said unit labor costs fell at a 2.4% rate during the second quarter, rather than growing at the originally estimated 5.4% pace.

The changes reflect a decline in employee compensation in the second quarter and a much slower rate of compensation growth in the third quarter, indicating that businesses are feeling less pressure to raise prices. That is particularly good news, many economists said, because the competitive labor market has recently emerged as the biggest driver of cost increases.

"With energy and commodity prices having receded from their peaks, labor costs now represent the most significant source of potential inflation pressures for the U.S. economy," said Stuart Hoffman, chief economist of PNC Financial Services Group.

That is especially true now, with the unemployment rate at an unusually low 4.4%, but many economists expect inflationary pressures from the labor market to weaken in the months ahead because of slower economic growth.

Yesterday's report showed that nonfarm business-sector productivity is also ebbing. Productivity, or output per hour worked, increased at an annualized rate of 0.2% in the third quarter, slightly above the initial estimate of no change but down from a 1.2% gain in the second quarter. The economy's current weak patch is largely the result of the slumping housing market and auto sector, which is also damping overall manufacturing activity. A separate report from the Commerce Department yesterday found that factory orders plunged 4.7% in October, the sharpest fall in six years.

In other areas, however, the economy is humming along. Another indication of its vigor came in a report from the Institute for Supply Management, a private group of corporate purchasing managers, that said the nonmanufacturing portion of the economy continues to expand at a rapid clip. The ISM's index of nonmanufacturing activity rose to 58.9 in November from 57.1 in October. Readings over 50 indicate expansion. The ISM said last week that its manufacturing index for November indicated the sector is contracting for the first time in more than three years.

Fed Is Hampered By Past In Effort To Sound Warning (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Federal Reserve officials -- unlike bond investors -- think the economy is a lot sounder today than at the end of 2000 and in early 2001, when the Fed abruptly reversed course and began a string of interest-rate cuts.

Yet Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke's effort to convey the message that today's conditions are different is hampered by the Fed's lack of candor back in 2000.

Fed officials, who have universally voiced concerns about inflation, are expected to keep short-term interest rates steady at 5.25% at their policy meeting next Tuesday. But bond markets have priced in a small chance of a rate cut next week and three one-quarter percentage-point cuts over the next 12 months.

Markets anticipate those cuts in part because they see parallels to 2000. A technology-stock and investment bust began to unfold in the summer of that year, yet in November the Fed still said its principal concern was inflation, not economic growth. Seven weeks later, with stock prices tumbling and businesses canceling investment plans, the Fed made the first of 13 interest-rate cuts.

Like stock prices then, housing prices today are turning down after a long run-up. But there is little sign the decline has spilled over into the rest of the economy. Stock prices are up, not down. Officials acknowledge recent data have been weak, especially for manufacturing and commercial construction, and they are expected to closely scrutinize the November jobs report, to be released Friday.

The weak data, however, haven't been corroborated by anecdotal evidence from the Fed's extensive business contacts. The Fed's recent "beige book" roundup of regional business conditions found "moderate growth" and "tight" labor markets.

Fed officials thus appear content with a forecast of moderate growth over the next few quarters, then a rebound in mid-2007. "I don't think that the data we have seen are out of line" with that forecast, Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago President Michael Moskow said Monday on CNBC.com.

The Fed has viewed the housing pullback as the principal threat to growth. The slump prompted Fed Vice Chairman Donald Kohn to say two months ago that the risks to growth were "skewed a bit to the downside."

Since then, as the decline in housing sales has moderated and shown little sign of damping consumer spending, officials' concerns have eased. Last week Mr. Bernanke indicated he saw the risks to growth as balanced.

In late 2000, the Fed's business contacts were getting worried, and the stock market was crumpling as profit warnings proliferated. "Everything was pointing up and, all of a sudden, everything started pointing down," recalls Edward Gramlich, a Fed governor at the time. Today, "the key thing is whether the weakness in housing -- and now autos -- feeds over into consumption at large, and as I understand it, it really hasn't."

Unemployment has been lower than expected and wage gains are picking up. That has tempered the comfort Fed officials drew from a recent moderation in inflation and inflationary psychology. At 2.7%, excluding food and energy, it is still higher than they would like. That is why they continue to say inflation is their principal concern.

Skeptics think that is bluster. "They're paid to worry about inflation, which means that until the slowdown is obvious and undeniable, they will stick to their forecasts," Ian Shepherdson, chief U.S. economist at High Frequency Economics, said in a report last week, citing the similarity to late 2000.

"The Fed has a mission to put a good spin on things," says Paul McCulley, an economist and fund manager at Pacific Investment Management Co. "They think they need to continue sounding hawkish...to burnish their anti-inflation credentials and also to temper" downward pressure on bond yields.

Transcripts of the Fed's November 2000 meeting offer grist for the skeptics. Fed officials at the time saw ample reason to shift from their assessment that higher inflation represented a greater risk to the economy than did weaker growth, to a view that the two risks were balanced. "The balance of risks has shifted quite noticeably," then-Vice Chairman Roger Ferguson said.

Mr. Kohn, then a staff adviser, said a balanced assessment of risks might well be merited, but could turn stock and bond markets frothy again. Then-Chairman Alan Greenspan agreed: "Were we to go to balance today we would almost surely end up tomorrow with financial conditions that would be too easy."

Mr. Gramlich, the former Fed governor, said the Fed "is now populated by people who are pretty humble" about their ability to verbally steer the markets.

More so than Mr. Greenspan, Mr. Bernanke thinks it is dangerous for the Fed to slant its words to elicit a particular market reaction. Indeed, he was burned in April when markets misinterpreted his hints about a pause in interest-rate increases as complacency about inflation. That suggests he means his recent warnings on inflation to be taken at face value.

Dow Near New High As Stocks Rise Again (USAT)

USA Today, December 6, 2006

NEW YORK — The Standard & Poor's 500 index scored its second-consecutive six-year high Tuesday after a report showing unexpected strength in the key services sector renewed optimism about corporate profit growth.

The benchmark S&P added 5.64 points, or 0.4%, to 1414.76 for its highest close since Nov. 7, 2000. The S&P now is up 13.3% this year. The Dow Jones industrial average rose 47.75 points, or 0.4%, to 12,331.60, which is just 11 points from a new all-time high. The Dow is up 15.1% this year. The Nasdaq composite remained the relative laggard, rising 3.99 points, or 0.2%, to 2452.38 for an 11.2% 2006 gain.

The Institute for Supply Management reported Tuesday that its index of activity in the service sector rose to 58.9 in November from 57.1 in October. Analysts were looking for a reading of 55.5. A reading above 50 indicates expansion, and November marked the 44th-consecutive month of expansion in non-manufacturing industries. The service sector accounts for about two-thirds of the nation's economic activity.

"The service sector is really what is holding the whole economy together and providing the impetus for growth," says Michael Metz, chief investment strategist at Oppenheimer & Co.

Highlights:

The beleaguered home-building sector got a lift, led by Toll Bros., which rose 96 cents to $32.87. Although the luxury-home builder reported a 44% drop in fiscal fourth-quarter earnings, it said it sees some signs of stabilization in the slumping housing sector and raised its forecast for first-quarter home deliveries. That sparked a rally in other home builders, with Hovnanian Enterprises up $1.24 to $37.39, KB Home up 75 cents to $52.17, Pulte Homes up 62 cents to $33.97, Beazer Homes up $1.19 to $46.34, Centex up 95 cents to $56.76 and NVR up $36.57 to $665.07.

·Prudential Financial advanced $2.04 to $84.28. The life insurance and investment giant said its 2007 earnings should range from $6.60 to $6.80 a share. Analysts had expected $6.64 a share, Thomson Financial says.

·Bandag jumped $5.46, or 12%, to $50.50. Tiremaker Bridgestone Americas Holding is buying Bandag, which makes retread tires, for $1.1 billion, or $50.75 a share, in cash.

·Kroger gained $1.16 to $23.49. The USA's largest traditional grocery chain posted 16% higher fiscal third-quarter earnings and said full-year profit would be higher than earlier forecasts.

Upbeat Data Lift Street's Spirits; Stocks Climb (WSJ)

By E.s. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, December 6, 2006

After slumping late last month on rising oil prices and uncertain economic data, the Dow Jones Industrial Average is almost back to a record as economic news has improved.

Following bullish news on the service economy and a reassuring report on labor costs, the Dow industrials rose 47.75 points, or 0.39%, to 12331.60. The Dow is up 15% this year, 11 points below the record close of 12342.56 on Nov. 17.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index hit a six-year high, rising 0.4%, or 5.64 points, to 1414.76, up 13% this year, but not near a record.

The service economy grew faster than expected last month. That offset Friday's news that manufacturing output shrank for the first time in three years.

A Labor Department report showed a measure of labor-cost inflation at 2.9% for the 12 months through the third quarter, compared to a previously estimated 5.3%.

The Federal Reserve watches labor costs closely as it sets interest rates. Investors now await Friday's report on payrolls and labor costs for November. The next Fed rate meeting is next Tuesday, and policy makers are widely expected to leave rates unchanged.

"A lot of people missed the autumn rally, because it caught everyone by surprise," said Tim Smalls, head of U.S. stock trading at Greenwich, Conn., brokerage firm Execution. "There is a lot of money on the sidelines that still has to be put to work. If you are a manager and you have a lot of cash...you have a lot of explaining to do."

The Nasdaq Composite Index rose 0.16%, or 3.99 points, to 2452.38, up 11.2% this year. The Russell 2000 small stock index finished at another record, 797.42, up 18% this year.

Gasoline and heating-oil futures fell, which was good news for stocks linked to consumer spending.

Home builders rebounded after Toll Brothers said the housing slump may be nearing bottom.

Outside the U.S., stocks advanced in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, rose 0.4%, or 0.95 point, to 238.09, a record. In major U.S. market action:

Stocks rose1. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.79 billion shares, as 2,074 stocks rose and 1,216 fell.

Bond prices declined2. The 10-year Treasury note fell 5/32, or $1.56 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.448%. The 30-year bond was down 16/32 to yield 4.575%.

The dollar was mixed3. Late in New York, it traded at 114.82 yen, down from 115.33, while the euro fell against the dollar to $1.3326 from $1.3328.

The Sliding Dollar: Both Boon And Bane (CSM)

By Mark Trumbull

The Christian Science Monitor, December 6, 2006

An ominous indicator has moved to center stage for world financial markets: the US dollar's plunging value relative to other currencies.

How this dollar drama unfolds could end up affecting more than just the price of T-shirts at Wal-Mart or the number of German tourists visiting Yosemite National Park.

A weaker dollar, over time, could help the world economy become better balanced - with America less reliant on borrowing and Asia less dependent on exports to fuel development. But currency realignment also holds risks. It would impose some hardship on Americans, and on the many nations that sell goods to them. A sudden shift could jolt US consumers with higher prices at a time when some economists worry about a possible recession.

But down is exactly where the dollar's value has been headed of late. After a quiet summer, the greenback has fallen since mid-November by 4 percent against the euro. It is also down by lesser amounts against the Japanese yen and Chinese yuan.

"Most economists agree that in the long term the dollar has to go down," to help shrink the mammoth US trade deficit, says Axel Merk, who manages the Merk Hard Currency Fund in Palo Alto, Calif. Yet in the short run, "it's in nobody's interest in the world for the dollar to go down."

The current slide may or may not persist. But when the dollar falls relative to other currencies, it tends to make US exports cheaper and, thus, more attractive on world markets. And it makes foreign imports more expensive to American consumers.

That doesn't mean the dollar's value is a magic fix for the US trade deficit, which has reached unprecedented proportions in the past few years. But many economists see it as part of the answer to this dangerous imbalance in global trade.

The dollar's recent weakness continues a pattern that began early in 2002. Why now and will it continue?

Currency watchers see a range of factors propelling the dollar now and possibly in the months ahead. Among them:

· Interest rates are shifting. The European Central Bank is expected to raise its benchmark interest rate on Thursday, boosting what investors can earn in the euro. European economies seem to be strengthening even as US bond yields have fallen on signs of weakening in the US economy.

· Inflation threats linger. Currencies tend to lose value when a central bank fails to tame inflation. Some experts worry that the Federal Reserve will cut interest rates next year - in a bid to prevent a recession - before the job of squelching easy monetary conditions is really done.

· Politics has an effect. A newly elected Democratic Congress could lean toward protectionism or higher taxes, either of which could dampen foreign interest in dollars. Perhaps more important is the situation in Iraq. A loss of US prestige as a military power can also affect the dollar.

· The yuan has edged up. China has allowed its currency to rise a bit this year. Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke will visit China this month, and will push for still more currency flexibility. But some analysts say a major shift may be unlikely before of 2008, when Beijing hosts the summer Olympics.

· China is diversifying. With some $1 trillion in foreign reserves, Beijing has said it won't put as much of its reserves into dollars as in the past.

"Foreign exchange traders are speculating at what point are Asian nations going to stop accumulating US assets," says Charles Engel, an economist who studies currency issues at the University of Wisconsin in Madison.

A weaker dollar would affect the purchasing power of Americans when they buy goods or services from other countries. The shift wouldn't be noticed at the supermarket as much as it would be at stores like Target or Best Buy.

"It would mean those things that are so unbelievably cheap at Wal-Mart would be a little bit more expensive," Dr. Engel says. "The flip side of that is that workers ... might move back toward some sort of export industries. That adjustment's going to happen over time." Digging out of a deficit

To some degree, the trade deficit and the buoyant dollar in recent years are signs of US economic strength. Imports often surge in an expanding economy.

Still, many economists say that at some point - and sooner might be better than later - the trade deficit needs to fall.

America's deficit in the current account, a broad measure of cross-border commerce and payments, has surged to more than $800 billion a year - an amount equal to about 7 percent of the gross domestic product. That's up from 1.7 percent of GDP a decade ago.

There's no precedent for a major economy to maintain this level of imbalance. In effect, the US is borrowing more than $2 billion a day to finance its spending on imports. The higher the imbalance goes, the greater the risk of a hard adjustment, if foreigners decide they can earn better returns by taking their dollars elsewhere.

Exchange rates are one piece of a larger puzzle. Another key factor is that the US has an unusually low rate of savings, thanks to federal deficits and consumer borrowing. The trade deficit mirrors this.

Trade barriers in other nations are another factor.

Still, a lower dollar could play a role in resolving the imbalance.

"If China did its part," by allowing the yuan to rise, "the dollar would also fall against most Asian currencies," says Peter Morici, a University of Maryland economist.

Falling imports would push up the US savings rate, he says.

Martin Feldstein, a Harvard University economist, has pointed out that the late 1980s offer precedent for a currency- driven easing of the trade deficit. Then, as the dollar fell, the trade gap closed without fanning inflation or causing a recession.

In a March speech, he said that America should have a "competitive" (lower) dollar abroad alongside a "strong" dollar at home - a currency whose purchasing power is not eroded by domestic inflation.

When The Dollar Talks Back (NYT)

Talking up the dollar is a tradition among government officials, who always want to prevent an exchange-rate swing from accelerating into a dollar plunge — an economic nightmare that would be marked by spikes in prices and interest rates. As the dollar fell over the past two weeks, Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson Jr. played his role, saying that “a strong dollar is clearly in our nation’s best interest.” And Ben Bernanke, the Federal Reserve chairman, gave a speech in which he was cautiously optimistic about economic growth and signaled that he would not cut interest rates anytime soon.

Growth and relatively high rates — if they came to pass — would be a good combination for the dollar. But as of yesterday, the dollar hadn’t moved up much from its recent lows against other major currencies. Investors remain largely focused on economic weakness in the United States and gathering strength in Europe — which portend a weaker dollar, no matter what anyone says.

A weaker currency is inevitable for a country as indebted as the United States is. During the Bush years, deficits have mushroomed — in the federal budget and in trade. Anything that affects foreign investors’ willingness to finance enormous deficits pushes the dollar down — including better investment opportunities elsewhere, as there are now.

The great unknowables are the timing and steepness of a sustained dollar decline. Over the past few years, investors who bet on a weakening dollar have lost money. But the current swoon is a reminder that no nation, even the United States, can borrow forever without facing up to economic consequences.

The government has been assuming — correctly, so far — that the United States is too big to fail. Administration officials seem confident that the Chinese, in particular, will continue to finance the nation’s deficits, because doing so helps their exports. They also assume that China and other countries won’t sell off chunks of their huge dollar holdings, lest they drive the dollar down, and with it, the value of their remaining dollar-based assets.

That’s more like a standoff than stability, and it puts way too much of the nation’s well being in the hands of foreign central bankers. But it’s the best the Bush crowd has had to offer, because true stability in global finance is grounded in fiscal responsibility at home, something the administration lacks.

Global balance requires cooperation. When Mr. Paulson travels to China this month, he will no doubt seek ways to adjust American and Chinese currencies in an orderly fashion. But there is no substitute for getting one’s own financial house in order.

Race For Fla. 13th Heads To House (RC)

By John Mcardle

DOJ_NMG_0103083

Roll Call, December 6, 2006

It could be well into the 110th Congress before a Member from Florida's 13th district is seated by the House — and the next several weeks could prove to be explosive as the fight plays out in the courts and on Capitol Hill.

The Democratic candidate in the highly contentious race, bank executive Christine Jennings, is in Washington, D.C., this week, meeting with party leaders and drumming up financial support as she continues to dispute the results that appeared to hand auto dealer Vern Buchanan (R) a 369-vote victory.

Although Jennings already has filed suit in a Florida circuit court seeking a revote, she said in an interview Tuesday that she also intends to contest the result with the House Administration Committee — which has oversight over federal elections — by the Dec. 20 deadline. Jennings and her attorneys already have met with Democratic staff members from the committee to discuss the filing process.

"I would not want to pass up on that opportunity," Jennings said, adding that she still held out hope that the Florida courts might order a revote for the entire 13th district or just in Sarasota County, where Jennings insists malfunctions with the electronic voting machines produced 18,000 undervotes — and changed the outcome of the election.

Filing an official protest with the House Administration Committee will automatically make the Jennings/Buchanan case one of the first indicators of just how partisan the 110th Congress will be, and observers won't even have to wait until the new year to begin to see the fissures.

Here's why: The House of Representatives as a whole is responsible for seating its own membership. Buchanan supporters argue that since he holds a certificate from the Florida Elections Canvassing Commission showing that he won the race, he should be installed as the Representative of Florida's 13th district on Jan. 4, when the 110th Congress convenes.

But in her lawsuit, Jennings has asked the court to order that state officials decertify Buchanan's victory, and Republicans are concerned that the incoming Democratic House leadership might not seat anyone until the House Administration Committee finishes its review and issues a recommendation on the matter.

It is not unprecedented for neither candidate to be seated by the House until a contested election is resolved. Perhaps the most notable example in recent years is the infamous 1984 race between the late Democratic Rep. Frank McCloskey and Republican Richard McIntyre in Indiana's 8th district — where it took until the following May to swear in a Member for that seat. McCloskey eventually was seated by a Democratic House.

It's unclear yet whether Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) is planning to fill the seat or leave it vacant until Jennings' appeals have run their course.

One House leadership aide said Tuesday that "we're continuing to watch this situation very closely, but of course we have some time ahead of us before we need to really make decisions on this. Obviously the court case that is developing may not be resolved before" Jan. 4.

The Florida dispute could get widespread attention because it involves electronic voting machines, which have come under heavy fire from many good government groups and clean elections advocates.

On Tuesday, Buchanan's spokeswoman, Sally Tibbets, called on Jennings "to put the best interests of the people ahead of her own political ambitions and do the right thing for the people of Florida's 13th Congressional district and to concede. And we would also call on the U.S. House of Representatives to put partisan politics aside and seat Vern Buchanan, who has been certified by the state of Florida as the Congressman. That's what democracy is all about and anything else would totally disrespect the will of the voters of Florida's 13th Congressional district."

The eventual winner will replace departing Rep. Katherine Harris (R) — who, ironically, as Florida secretary of state in 2000, was a major player in the disputed presidential election.

But as both sides speculate as to what will happen on Jan. 4, the process for determining the eventual winner after the Jennings' formal protest is filed with the House also could be controversial.

The House Administration Committee will receive Jennings' challenge at the tail end of the Republican-controlled 109th Congress and the outgoing majority could immediately begin the investigation or hold hearings on the case.

Traditionally when an election contest is filed, a panel of two majority and one minority committee members is put together to review the case, including reports gathered by both Democratic and Republican committee observers who are sent to districts whenever contests seem likely. That panel makes a recommendation to the full committee on how to proceed, and that recommendation is voted on and, if passed, sent to the floor of the House and treated like any other piece of legislation.

But House Administration spokeswoman Salley Collins said Tuesday that the committee will not make any decisions on how it will proceed with its investigation until Jennings' paperwork is filed. When asked if the committee would be holding hearings after Congress adjourns, she said it is "not out of the realm of possibility."

However, as House Administration Democratic Staff Director George Shevlin pointed out, "should she file, no formal action affecting the outcome of the contest could be taken until the next Congress is seated."

So while the House office lottery pool ended weeks ago, Room 1516 of the Longworth House Office Building — which was set aside for the winner of the Florida contest — is currently vacant, and appears likely to remain that way for a while longer.

Jennings Ignores Setbacks, Calls For Revote In Florida (HILL)

By Aaron Blake

The Hill, December 6, 2006

Democrat Christine Jennings was in Washington over the last two days renewing her call for a revote in her race against Rep.-elect Vern Buchanan (R-Fla.), as government and independent reviews failed to support her case.

Jennings said she would do everything she could to see the legal challenge through. She set up shop at Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee headquarters and was to meet with lawmakers including Reps. Allen Boyd (D-Fla.), Ellen Tauscher (D-Calif.) and Rush Holt (D-N.J.). She was also asking for financial support and continuing to push her case to the news media.

Jennings's visit came as state officials continued their audit of the touch-screen voting machines in Sarasota County, where an abnormally high number of ballots cast were "undervotes," meaning they failed to register votes in the congressional race for the 13th District.

The audit has yet to produce any evidence of machine errors, and a review by a local newspaper published Tuesday points to ballot design as the leading cause of the undervotes.

The undervotes numbered about 18,000 in Sarasota County, or 13 percent. That rate is several times higher than the district's other counties, suggesting something skewed the results on Election Day.

Jennings's camp says the voting machines malfunctioned and failed to record the votes. It has filed suit to obtain the source codes for the voting machines and is offering hundreds of witnesses who say they experienced problems as they were trying to vote for her.

Members of her team have expressed discontent with the state's recount, which gave Buchanan a 369-vote win, and now with the audit, and they say the review needs to be independent and include the source codes.

Jennings won Sarasota County 53-47, which suggests that the 18,000 ballots could well swing the election.

"Our experts have to be capable of getting the hardware and the software so that they can tear it apart — just literally tear it apart," Jennings said. "All I'm concerned about, at this point, is that our voters get an answer and that I get an answer as to what really happened with those machines."

Jennings said Tuesday that the witnesses include a former governor of Maine.

On Tuesday, the state was reviewing videotape of tests conducted on Friday in which two discrepancies occurred in other races, but not the House race. The machines worked properly during the test, though, and the problems were expected to be attributed to human error.

The Jennings team said that this diagnosis was premature and has been critical of how the tests were conducted, saying they did not mimic actual voting conditions.

"We've gone from rubberstamp recount to preordained audit, and now with those events behind us, it's time to get to some forensic testing that's meaningful, by outside experts," Jennings lawyer Kendall Coffey said.

Yesterday, a court date was set for Dec. 15, though it's too early to tell when a trial might begin. Buchanan is set to be sworn in with the rest of the freshman class on Jan. 3.

Jennings's case was also undercut by a review of every Sarasota County ballot conducted by investigative reporters at the Sarasota Herald-Tribune and published Tuesday. The review concluded that the format of the ballot probably contributed to the large undervote, and a number of election experts are now also saying ballot design was probably the leading factor.

The Herald-Tribune review found that three other counties experienced similar undervotes in the two-candidate attorney general race. The attorney general race was on the same page as the gubernatorial race in those counties, just like the two-candidate House race was in Sarasota County.

The gubernatorial race featured seven options and therefore dominated the screen in the four counties, which all used the same touch screens. The four cases all led to undervotes of more than 10 percent and account for four of the five highest undervotes in federal and statewide races in Florida, according to the Herald-Tribune.

A poorly designed ballot would not be sufficient for a revote, but some experts say the discrepancy is so big that it might not be the only factor.

Jennings lawyer Sam Hirsch said it could contribute to a machine malfunction by having too many options on one page. The screens that included Jennings's race had more options than any he has seen, he said.

"It's quite possible that, like with anything else that's computer-based, if you press it to its maximum capacity, you're more likely to trigger some kind of glitch or bug," Hirsch said.

Buchanan spokeswoman Sally Tibbetts said the mounting evidence continues to discount Jennings's assertions.

"Christine Jennings has built her entire legal case on the premise that the machines malfunctioned," Tibbetts said. "So she has no case. Her case has been shattered."

It's Time For The House To Pick Up The Pieces In Florida's 13th District (RC)

By Richard L. Hasen

Roll Call, December 6, 2006

Remember the infamous "butterfly ballot" of Palm Beach County, Fla., in the 2000 presidential election? Back then, poor ballot design appeared to have caused many supporters of Democrat Al Gore to vote for conservative third-party candidate Pat Buchanan for president, effectively allowing George Bush to win Florida's electoral votes and the presidency. The courts said there was nothing that could have been done about the problems with the ballot even though there was strong evidence that more Florida voters came to their polling places intending to vote for Gore than for Bush.

The elections last month brought us the 2006 version of the butterfly ballot. This time, it appears that poor ballot design or machine malfunctions with electronic voting machines caused thousands of voters to skip the race for Florida's 13th Congressional district, leading to a 369-vote victory by the Republican candidate over the Democratic one. Once again the matter is in court, and once again the courts are not likely to give a remedy.

But this time there's another option. The House can — and should — declare the seat vacant, requiring the seat to be filled by a special election.

First, a bit of background. In the 13th, Congressional district lines don't coincide with county lines, so voters in all or parts of five Florida counties voted either for Republican Vern Buchanan or Democrat Christine Jennings. There was an unusually high number of "undervotes" — that is, an absence of a recorded vote in the race for this seat — with the vast majority coming from Sarasota County.

About 13 percent of Sarasota County votes cast using electronic touch-screen voting machines showed no vote in Florida's 13th contest. This rate was much higher than the undervote rate among Sarasota County voters who voted using absentee ballots, and it was much higher than the undervote rate in the other four counties in that district — including one, Charlotte County, that uses the same type of electronic voting machines that Sarasota uses.

What accounts for the high undervote rate in Sarasota County, in a hard-fought Congressional race in a swing district? Machine malfunction remains a possibility, but based on the evidence available thus far, the most likely culprit appears to be poor ballot design. In Sarasota County — but not in Charlotte County — the 13th district race appeared on the second electronic "page" of the electronic ballot, right at the top of the page above a larger heading for state races. A number of voters appeared to have missed the race because of its placement on the page.

A recent academic analysis by Laurin Frisina, Michael Herron, James Honaker and Jeffrey Lewis notes that in Charlotte County, the undervote rate in the state attorney general race was huge. In Charlotte — but not in Sarasota — the attorney general race was paired with another contest on the same electronic ballot page, mirroring the placement of the House race on the Sarasota County ballot. Fortunately for Floridians, the race for attorney general was not close.

A separate analysis recently completed by the Sarasota Herald-Tribune bolsters the poor ballot design hypothesis. Looking at every ballot cast in the county, the newspaper found that the people you'd most expect to vote in the House race — loyal party voters who voted Republican or Democrat throughout the ballot — were the ones most likely to have skipped voting in the race.

If it turns out that Florida courts concluded that poor ballot design caused the high undervote rate in the Congressional race, it is unlikely that there will be a judicial remedy. Overturning an election in the courts is tough, absent proof of fraud or proof that legal votes were not counted.

But there is another option. The Constitution provides that "Each House shall be the Judge of the Elections, Returns and Qualifications of its own Members ... ." The House has resolved disputed elections before. For two reasons, the House should declare the seat vacant, triggering a special election.

First, the House is not bound by the restrictive rules for ordering new elections that courts are. Assuming that the problem was poor ballot design, why should voters be victims of the design incompetence of election administrators? The fair thing to do — even if it is not legally compelled — is to hold a new election where everyone in the district gets to vote.

This case is unlike the butterfly ballot situation, where it would have been unfair to hold an election for a national office — president — in only one county in one state. A side benefit will be that the controversy will focus attention on problems with election administration, and get Congress and the country thinking more about the problems with how we administer our elections.

This course is not without risks. In 1984, the House, then controlled by the Democrats, waded into the bitter contest between incumbent Rep. Frank McCloskey (D-Ind.) and his Republican challenger, Rick McIntyre. The decision by the majority to seat McCloskey, which prompted widespread disgust within the House Republican Conference, is now cited as a contributing cause in the widening partisan divide in Congress.

In addition, some argue that it would be bad precedent to let the House make this decision on extralegal grounds.

But just like the House makes a political judgment as to what constitutes grounds for impeachment, it can make decisions about new elections on a political basis as well. A Democratic House's decision to grant a revote in these circumstances is a lot less likely to contribute to partisanship in Congress than was the Republican House's decision to impeach then-President Bill Clinton.

More importantly, such political judgments are self-limiting. If the Democratic House started overturning election results for no good reason, voters would see such moves as illegitimate and vote the Democrats out of office.

We cannot rerun the 2000 election in Palm Beach, but the House can provide some justice to this year's voters in Sarasota County without triggering a national crisis.

The Election Is In The Mail (NYT)

By Ruth Goldway

The New York Times, December 6, 2006

Washington

LAST Election Day, voters encountered myriad difficulties, from the unexplained glitch that temporarily halted Montana's vote count to the 18,300 undervotes in Florida's 13th Congressional District, to long lines, bad weather, inadequately trained workers, delayed or missing absentee ballots and complicated new identity forms. There was, however, one state where all went well: Oregon, where everyone votes by mail.

Since Oregon adopted Vote by Mail as its sole voting option in 1998, the state's turnout has increased, concerns about fraud have decreased, a complete paper trail exists for every election, recounts are non-controvertible and both major political parties have gained voters. Moreover, in doing away with voting machines, polling booths, precinct captains and election workers, the state estimates that it saves up to 40 percent over the cost of a traditional election.

Vote by Mail could offer real advantages if it were adopted nationwide. Voters would not need to take time off from work, find transportation, find the right polling station, get babysitters or rush through reading complicated ballot initiatives. The country's 35,000 post offices could provide information, distribute and collect voting materials and issue inexpensive residency and address identifications for voting purposes.

Perhaps most important, given the concerns about voting machine security, mail ballots cannot be hacked. Tampering or interfering with mail is a federal crime, and the United States Postal Service has its own law enforcement arm, which works closely with a variety of enforcement authorities including the F.B.I. Trained election clerks can take the time to check signatures without delaying or discouraging voters. And the advantages of a paper trail outshine the glitter of black box electronic gadgetry.

States that have adopted measures like "no excuse necessary" absentee ballots find that the public is eager to avail itself of the opportunity to vote by mail. As many as 30 percent of voters didn't use the polls in November. In Washington State, where 34 of 39 counties vote entirely by mail, 70 percent of November's votes were cast by mail; in California, the number is near 40 percent.

The Postal Service has set up a Vote by Mail preparation Web site and a traveling workshop. But out of 750,000 employees, it has only a handful who work part-time on mail balloting issues. The 110th Congress should direct it to expand these efforts. Senators Ron Wyden, John Kerry and Barack Obama recently sponsored a bill to grant funds to states that adopt Vote by Mail. That legislation should also give the Postal Service money to coordinate a national program.

For a small fraction of the sums spent on unreliable voting machines, the Postal Service could work with state and local governments to design standard ballots and develop processes for sorting and delivering them (like those that already exist for overseas military personnel). It could coordinate its own address database with the database of registered voters, set postmark deadlines and devise language prompting voters to affix correct postage.

Already, in order to help businesses that send out big mailings, the Postal Service uses bar-code scanning to inexpensively track large volumes of mail from origin to destination. With minor but careful modifications, this technology can be adapted for use with ballots — allowing voters to check on their location and status by entering a tracking number on the Internet or by phone.

Public confidence in the accuracy of vote counting is at an all-time low. The Election Assistance Commission estimated that as many as 850,000 votes were not counted in the 2004 elections, and a recent report warned that electronic voting machines cannot be made secure. Fortunately, a remarkably sophisticated and effective technology exists for solving these problems, and it is “old-fashioned” mail.

The founders conceived of a national postal service as a force to “bind our nation together.” Other technologies may now spread the news and help families stay in touch, but the Postal Service should be called upon to meet this latest challenge to our democracy. <NYT_AUTHOR_ID>

Iowa Governor: Smart Campaign Can Beat Clinton Juggernaut In '08 (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON

Tom Vilsack, soon to be ex-governor of Iowa, is not on many voters' radar screen as a possible next president. Even Iowans, who elected him twice to run their state, placed him fourth in a June poll rating possible Democratic candidates.

As he finishes the announcement phase of his candidacy for the 2008 race - including a Monitor breakfast Tuesday with reporters - he knows he's a long shot. He says so. But he has an answer to the inevitable question: How does an obscure Midwestern governor get past the Hillary Rodham Clinton juggernaut and now "Obama-mania," as the junior senator from Illinois, Barack Obama, also considers a run?

"You have to work longer, and you have to work smarter, and that's what we intend to do," Governor Vilsack told the group Tuesday, his wife at his side.

There's nothing flashy about Vilsack, a Pittsburgher by birth who came to Iowa to meet his then-fiancée's family and who now considers Mt. Pleasant, Iowa, his second hometown. When asked about Obama-style charisma, he countered with his own version: "There is a quiet charisma," he said, a charisma that causes voters to say "he's authentic and real and has done well."

Vilsack also notes that among the dozen or so other Democrats who may run for president, only two are candidates from west of the Mississippi River and are governors: himself and Bill Richardson of New Mexico. In 2004, Democratic nominee John Kerry did not win any Plains or Mountain West states, including Iowa and New Mexico. Most recent presidents have been governors first - positioning themselves as outsiders and as chief executives. Vilsack compared himself with former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner (D), who was succeeded last year by another Democrat - a rare feat in the South.

"My record as governor certainly matches Governor Warner's, and we did not raise taxes; we actually have cut taxes every year I've been governor," he said. "We not only elected a Democratic governor, which will be the longest period of time we've had a Democratic governor in consecutive years in the history of our state, we also as a result of efforts of the last four years elected a [Democratic] House and Senate - the first time that combination has occurred in 42 years.... We have turned a red state to blue."

A signature issue for Vilsack will be energy security. He plans to focus on conservation, renewable fuels, and using traditional materials in ways that are "cleaner and greener." He says energy and conservation can unite the country, bringing together right and left.

Vilsack Kicks Off '08 Run Touting Energy Security (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack pitched energy independence as a path to security, jobs and health Tuesday, as a rival presidential prospect from the Midwest filed papers to raise money for the Democratic nomination.

Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh said he is moving toward a 2008 race because America needs to "get back on the path to greatness." The former two-term governor will be in Minnesota, Illinois, Ohio and New Hampshire this week.

Vilsack, a two-term governor who helped elect a Democratic successor last month, declared his candidacy on Thursday. He is one of several Democrats staking their cases on executive experience, appeal beyond the usual Democratic states and voters, or both.

At a lunch with journalists from USA TODAY and Gannett News Service, Vilsack struck themes meant to help him stand out in a group that includes Bayh, son of former senator Birch Bayh; former North Carolina senator John Edwards; and New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, a former Energy secretary.

Vilsack described his "interesting" childhood as an orphan adopted by a woman who was an alcoholic. She used to disappear into the attic for weeks to drink, he said, and he'd hear the liquor bottles hit the floor above his bedroom.

"You don't have the notion that tomorrow is necessarily going to be brighter than today," he said. "I wouldn't want youngsters to go through what I went through."

Vilsack said energy security is a cause "with extraordinary opportunity to unite this country." Benefits from conservation and new energy sources, he said, would include a more innovative economy; fewer cases of asthma; reduced reliance on hostile sources of foreign oil; a smaller trade deficit; and a chance to "reclaim the moral high ground" on global warming.

In Iowa, Vilsack said, tax credits have led to increased sales of ethanol, new ethanol production facilities and new jobs. He said Iowa would be the first state to have a biorefinery when it opens in 2009. He also said two manufacturers of turbines and blades for wind power have decided to locate in Iowa.

It's unclear how Vilsack's bid will affects the Iowa caucuses, which launch the nominating season. Other Democrats skipped them when Iowa Sen. Tom Harkin ran in 1992.

Bayh isn't ceding Iowa to anyone. He's been there 10 times this year, most recently on Monday. He's also competing hard for money. He has $10.7 million he can transfer from his Senate account to his new exploratory committee.

Vilsack Back Of Pack, But On Track (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, December 6, 2006

Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack said he doesn't fear any of his fellow Democrats considering a run for president in 2008 and is happy to run as an underdog, even in his home state's important caucus.

"I respect everyone who is running," Mr. Vilsack said. "but I don't fear anyone."

Last week, he became the first to officially announce his candidacy for the Democrats' 2008 presidential nomination.

In a meeting with reporters in Washington yesterday, however, the governor most frequently returned to criticism of Sen. John McCain and the Arizona Republican's call for increasing troop levels in Iraq.

"I don't believe he's exercised particularly good judgment," Mr. Vilsack said.

Mr. Vilsack was in Washington to work on his presidential campaign and meet with reporters. Afterward, he traveled to New York to attend a campaign fundraiser.

The two-term governor, who is retiring from his post in January, also questioned Mr. McCain's credentials as a White House contender. "He has never been a governor. He's never had to make specific decisions."

A poll released yesterday by Rasmussen Reports shows Mr. McCain leading Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat, in a potential White House match-up, 48 percent to 44 percent. Most polls show Mr. Vilsack near the back of the pack of potential Democratic candidates.

"I've always been the underdog," he said.

When asked what plan for Iraq he'd favor as commander in chief, Mr. Vilsack said U.S. forces should redeploy from Baghdad and the more contentious southern regions of the country to the northern region, which has experienced less violence.

"We've given them this opportunity," he said, citing the ouster of Saddam Hussein. "It's a little bit of tough love."

In response to concerns that a redeployment would embolden insurgent and terrorist forces, Mr. Vilsack said, "If there's a bloodbath, how much different is that from the situation today?"

Later, he bristled when asked if, in hindsight, he still would have supported removing Saddam from power. "Tell me why this is important?" he asked. "I was reading three newspapers and watching [local TV] news. I don't know that I had sufficient information and knowledge to make that decision."

Mr. Vilsack estimates he will need to raise between $20 million and $40 million in order to compete with Mrs. Clinton and other Democrats in the primaries. He also rejected suggestions that a primary victory in his home state would have less than its usual significance.

"Whoever wins Iowa wins Iowa," he said. "I expect to win Iowa."

Mr. Vilsack also said that he would run on a record of success and competence he thinks will be important to voters. "We've turned a red state blue," he said of his eight years in office.

Mr. Vilsack described his tenure as that of a centrist executive with a record that included tax cuts and improved employment numbers. He said that record, along with his connections to rural America, make him an appealing candidate for western and "small town" voters.

Hillary Clinton's Early Moves (WP)

By Dan Balz And Chris Cillizza

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) is taking a series of concrete steps toward a likely campaign for president in 2008, settling on key members of her campaign team, recruiting potential new additions to her staff, and calling Democratic activists in states with early primaries and caucuses.

No final decision on running is expected before the end of the year, according to sources knowledgeable about her thinking, as Clinton works methodically through a checklist of preparatory steps. But she and her inner circle are already ramping up for what could be a history-making bid for the White House.

The latest move is the choice of longtime adviser Patti Solis Doyle as campaign manager. That follows the recent recruitment of three seasoned political operatives who, if she runs, would play key roles on what is now a rapidly expanding Clinton campaign organization.

The three are Jonathan Mantz, who has been working for New Jersey Gov. Jon S. Corzine (D), as finance director; Phil Singer, who was communications director for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, as a communications strategist; and Karen Hicks, who ran former Vermont governor Howard Dean's New Hampshire operation in 2004, to oversee organizing, particularly in the early states.

Clinton is operating on a model she used before she decided to run for the Senate in 2000. "If you want to understand the process she is going through now, you need only look at the process she went through in 1999," said Clinton spokesman Howard Wolfson. "In that race, she reached out to elected officials, to potential donors [and] to policy experts and had lengthy serious meetings about whether she should run, the issues before the country, [and] what a campaign would look like."

In this case, her first step was to secure her New York political base, reaching out to the state's elected officials, including Gov.-elect Eliot L. Spitzer, labor leaders and prominent African Americans and Hispanics. Most of that activity took place last week.

This week's schedule includes phone calls to Iowa, New Hampshire, Nevada and South Carolina, the four states with the earliest contests in 2008. Other prospective candidates have made numerous trips to the early states, but Clinton avoided such travel during her reelection campaign this year -- even forbidding her advisers to begin discussions around the country on a possible campaign.

"She's obviously very knowledgeable already," said JoDee Winterhof, a former chief of staff of Iowa Sen. Tom Harkin (D), who spoke with Clinton yesterday. "We had a good talk about how to run a campaign there. . . . She understands that this will take a significant amount of hard work and campaigning and getting to know Iowans more up close and personal."

Aides expect that, in addition to the phone calls, Clinton will hold a series of meetings in Washington with state activists and others as she nears a final decision. This morning she is scheduled to have breakfast with Harkin in Washington. Harkin is publicly committed to supporting the candidacy of Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack (D), but he said he and other Democrats in the state want the process there to be "fair and open."

Clinton has also spoken with former senator Bob Kerrey (D-Neb.), who ran against her husband, Bill Clinton, for the Democratic nomination in 1992. Kerrey is now president of the New School, a university in New York. He would not discuss the nature of that conversation.

Some Clinton advisers view the activities of other prospective Democratic candidates, particularly the mushrooming interest around Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, as a spur to the New York senator to accelerate her timetable. Others say she will not be hurried into a decision until she has completed her soundings and preparations. "She's going to do this at her own pace, and what anyone else does is not going to affect her decision-making," said Lorraine Voles, her Senate communications director.

But her presidential campaign preparations will be done on a far more compressed timetable than her decision to run for the Senate, made when she was first lady and living in the White House.

"It was a much longer process in 1999," said one Democratic strategist. "There she was not at all sure-of-foot politically. She had the carpetbagger aspect to deal with. She had no understanding of the intricacies of New York politics. So it took her a much longer time. Here there's not the luxury of a lot of time. This is a very fast-moving situation."

Clinton advisers also recognize that they must move swiftly to recruit new staff members, in part because of competition from other candidates for operatives to manage key states, to fill communications assignments and to provide the support and assistance necessary to manage an enterprise the size of a presidential campaign. This "talent primary" is seen by her advisers as critically important to her success.

The second early challenge is fundraising. Clinton spent much of the past two years using her Senate reelection campaign to build a national fundraising infrastructure to support such a candidacy. Through mid-October, Clinton had spent $36 million on her reelection race, which she went on to win with 67 percent of the vote. A large portion of those expenditures went into an extensive direct-mail program aimed at beefing up Clinton's small-dollar donor lists.

Clinton advisers are also beginning to prepare for her first travels to states such as Iowa and New Hampshire as a prospective candidate, although there is no timetable for such appearances.

Jerry Crawford, a prominent Iowa Democrat and Vilsack supporter, said yesterday that he and Clinton traded voice-mail messages during the past two days. He said that she and her staff have been "very respectful" toward Vilsack and his candidacy. But he added: "It's clear she's looking to come to Iowa, and it seems clear she's giving serious consideration competing in Iowa."

Speculation Rife Over Hillary Bid (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, December 6, 2006

Speculation about the presidential plans of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton has reached a fevered pitch this week as newspapers and Web sites scramble to be the first with the big headline that the former first lady will run.

"I'm In," blared the front page of yesterday's New York Post. "Hill 'really going' for prez run."

The Des Moines Register, always a close observer of presidential nominating contests, went microscopic with its own "exclusive" on its Web site Monday: "Hillary Clinton begins calling Iowa Democrats."

Throughout the weekend, the Drudge Report had rolling exclamation-punctuated headlines: "She is thinking about it," "She Is" and "Hello, Iowa."

Certainly, said a spokeswoman for Mrs. Clinton, the New York senator is actively weighing whether to run for president in 2008.

"After her election, she said she was going to look at this," Lorraine Voles, Mrs. Clinton's communications director, said yesterday. "As part of that process, she has been making some phone calls."

After calling friends and supporters around New York, she also called a handful of key Democrats in Iowa, which will host the first caucuses of the Democratic primary in 13 months. She has not, however, made plans to travel to Iowa, Ms. Voles said.

Mrs. Clinton's moves come after several other Democrats have sent signals in recent days that they are either running for the nomination or seriously considering it.

Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack last week announced that he would run. Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh filed papers yesterday to officially create a presidential exploratory committee.

"I will talk to my family over the holidays and make a final decision and an announcement after the first of the year," Mr. Bayh said.

And former vice presidential nominee John Edwards continues to heavily court Iowa voters and hire political staff.

In June, a Des Moines Register poll found that among likely caucusgoers, Mr. Edwards led the pack of likely candidates with 30 percent. Mrs. Clinton trailed slightly with 26 percent. Sen. John Kerry, the Massachusetts Democrat who was the 2004 nominee, took third with 12 percent, and Mr. Vilsack won 10 percent.

In addition to reaching out to Democrats in New York and Iowa, Mrs. Clinton also has hired some new political staff recently. She's brought on board Phil Singer, who is just off a major victory, working for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC). Mrs. Clinton also has hired Karen Hicks, who served as Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean's New Hampshire field organizer when he ran for the Democratic nomination in 2004. Also, she's picked up national finance director Jonathan Mantz, a well-regarded operative who has worked for the DSCC and the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

But, as she has throughout her six years on Capitol Hill, Mrs. Clinton isn't taking anyone in her adopted home state for granted. Among those she called this week was Rep. Joseph Crowley, New York Democrat.

"I don't think she ever outright said it, but there's no doubt in my mind that she's going to run," he said. "It was a very exciting and exhilarating conversation. I don't know how often it happens in a lifetime when someone calls you up and says, 'I want you to know I'm doing this and I want your support.' "

Hillary Can Win But Mustn't (HILL)

By Dick Morris

Now that Hillary has dropped the coy pretense of indecision that she used to justify her reelection to a Senate seat she no longer wants and has told friends that she plans to run for president, two questions present themselves: Can she win? And what kind of a president would she be?

She definitely can win … and probably will. She is uniquely able to expand the electorate to bring in millions of women, mostly single, who will vote overwhelmingly for a female Democrat. The feminization of poverty, long decried by the left, will finally lead unmarried women to show up at the polling place and vote their short-term economic interest and vindicate their gender bias. In 2000, only 19 million single women voted. By 2004, their turnout rose to 27 million. With Hillary in the race, the single-female vote will probably go up to its proper ratio of the adult population — 33 million votes.

Can white men outvote single women? Despite the intensity with which white men tend to oppose Hillary, they can't vote twice.

The enthusiasm that will grip many Americans — women in particular — at the cultural implications of a woman president will probably sweep through the primaries and cause many to overlook Hillary's flaws and dismiss her defects. The generic of a woman candidate will prove so attractive that millions of voters will overcome their objections to the specific person who is running.

Her mastery of the establishment of the Democratic Party, her vast lead among ex-officio delegates — many of whom have received campaign contributions from her coffers — and the celebrity draw of her ex-president husband will prove hard for a mere mortal to overcome.

But should she win? No way!

Those who know both Hillary and Bill well and are willing to speak frankly in public realize the fundamental differences between the two and grasp how his abilities are the counterpoints to her defects.

He is intensely creative, constantly turning issues over in his mind seeking new solutions. She rarely has a new idea but specializes in advocacy — the rote recitation of talking points.

He has an instinctual feel for people and an uncanny ability to read a room and know what everyone in it is thinking. She is obtuse in her understanding of people and ham-handed in her approach.

He cares deeply about being loved. She seeks popularity as a means to the goal of getting elected but otherwise marches to the beat of her inner, liberal drummer.

He distrusts ideology, and his innate perfectionism finds all belief systems flawed. She swallows the ideological line of the guru du jour hook, line and sinker. During the healthcare years, it was Ira Magaziner who pushed her buttons. When she decided to back the Iraq War, it was the generals who paraded before her committee. She is vulnerable to a cultish adoration of the guys with all the answers.

He lets the give and take of politics wash off his back. A critic is a potential convert whom he hopes to charm over to his side. She has a rigidly dichotomized view of friends and enemies, demanding total loyalty and public silence from the former and maintaining a ruthless determination to destroy the latter. She is a Democratic Nixon to those whom she perceives as her enemies.

He is a moderate by instinct, seeking incremental change. She devotedly and deeply believes in a European-style socialism in which government takes much more of our national income and offers a far wider array of services and benefits.

He'll raise taxes when he has to. She'll increase them just to redistribute income.

He's most like Eisenhower, Kennedy and Bush Sr. — feeling his way, acting with caution, and skeptical of all advice. She is more like LBJ, Nixon or Bush Jr. — determined to charge ahead and do what she thinks needs to be done, the torpedoes be damned.

And finally, he knows who he is and, except for his private shortcomings, is not ashamed to let it show. She constantly seeks to reinvent herself and rigidly maintains an almost totally inaccurate image in public of what she is really like in private. He has little discipline. Hers is iron. His caution is innate. Hers is a learned response to what happens when people see who she really is.

He made a very good domestic-policy president. She would be a disaster at home and abroad.

Mom's A Maverick, Too (RC)

By Mary Ann Akers

Roll Call, December 6, 2006

The most popular guest at Sen. John McCain's (R-Ariz.) bustling media-and-money holiday party Monday night wound up in the hospital. Roberta McCain, the Senator's 94-year-old mother, fell as she was walking out of the star-studded bash at the Corcoran Gallery of Art and injured her hip.

After driving herself (as usual) to the party and hobnobbing for two hours with her fans in the media and supporters and guests of her son, the fiercely independent Mrs. McCain took a tumble on the front steps of the Corcoran as she was walking to her car.

Luckily, some friends who had just gotten in their car spotted the elegant lady in red and rushed to her aid. They drove her to the Naval Medical Center in Bethesda, Md., where doctors discovered she had a "hairline fracture below the joint," according to a senior McCain aide.

At press time, the slight fracture did not look like it would require surgery, the McCain aide told us. It was unclear when Mrs. McCain would be released from the hospital, where she spent Monday and Tuesday nights.

We hear the Senator — as much as he could ever possibly "make" his spitfire mom do anything — is going to strongly encourage her to come spend a few weeks in Arizona with him and his wife, Cindy.

We wish him luck. Because, if this is any indication of who's the boss in that mother-son relationship, Mrs. McCain firmly told the Senator and would-be president to "turn around and go home" during a phone conversation as he headed up to the hospital after hearing the news and leaving his party early.

And yes, you guessed it, he followed Mom's orders.

More Straight Talk. McCain's bash, paid for by his Straight Talk America political action committee, sure looked like a dry run for potential future White House Christmas parties.

Complete with an orchestra, flashbulb-splashed red carpets, a receiving line, catered gourmet food and two full open bars — and conspicuously located across the street from the Old Executive Office Building — the party drew an A-list of the media and politicos. Guests instinctively formed a receiving line to greet McCain and get a photo. (Even McCain's mother stood in the long line with others until CNN's Judy Woodruff politely said, "Mrs. McCain, you don't have to stand in this line!")

Notable primary- and caucus-state Senators who attended the bash: John Sununu (R-N.H.) and Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), who reiterated his devotion to McCain's probable presidential bid while Sununu continued to play coy.

McCain's party at the Corcoran conveniently fell on the same night as the White House Congressional holiday party, which, of course, drew plenty of star power from 1600 Pennsylvania Ave., where, by the way, defeated House Resources Chairman Richard Pombo (R-Calif.) and ousted Sen. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.) were seen dancing with their wives to Kool & the Gang's "Celebration."

Nothing that zany at McCain's party. Just GOP Sens. Trent Lott (Miss.), Richard Burr (N.C.), Saxby Chambliss (Ga.) and Mel Martinez (Fla.) working a crowd that included former GOP Sens. Phil Gramm (Texas) and Peter Fitzgerald (Ill.).

Other Members included hair-of-their-chinny-chin-chinners Reps. Tom Reynolds (N.Y.), chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, and Christopher Shays (Conn.). The only Democrat we saw: Rep. Mark Udall of Colorado. Outgoing Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman was there, as was Homeland Security Adviser Frances Townsend, among many, many others.

The Royal Rep. Sabo. In one of those times when it pays to have a really cool middle name, retiring Rep. Martin Olav Sabo (D-Minn.) last night was slated to be tapped Commander of the Royal Norwegian Order of Merit.

The coronation was appointed by His Majesty King Harald V of Norway, though the king himself was not expected to attend last night's ceremony at the residence of Norwegian Ambassador Knut Vollebaek and his wife, Ellen.

The order came as a complete surprise for Sabo, who was expecting only to attend a dinner at the ambassador's house. He received the honor for his "outstanding work for Norwegian-American relations over many years."

Sabo, whose parents both immigrated to the United States from Norway, co-founded the Friends of Norway Caucus in the House, which now has more than 50 members. "Sabo" actually means "farm by the sea" in Norwegian.

Members who were expected to attend the ceremony last night included Sens. Mark Dayton (D-Minn.), Kent Conrad (D-N.D.) and Byron Dorgan (D-N.D.), as well as Reps. Rick Larsen (D-Wash.), James Oberstar (D-Minn.), David Obey (D-Wis.), Dale Kildee (D-Mich.) and Hal Rogers (R-Ky.).

Expected on the menu Tuesday night: What else? Lutefisk.

Cry Baby. As Tom Kahn acquires the word "majority" in his title after spending 11 years as minority staff director of the House Budget Committee, his whole world changes with him. He doesn't just have a new job, he has a new baby to boot.

Benjamin Eugene Kahn was born late on Nov. 21, weighing 8 pounds, 11 ounces. Baby Ben is the first child for Kahn and his wife, Susana Sanchez, an economist at the World Bank.

You might think a new father isn't getting much rest. But so far, Kahn says he's been sleeping like a baby. "I wake up every two hours and I cry!"

Anticorruption Whistle-blower Takes Alaska's Top Job (CSM)

ANCHORAGE, ALASKA

Sarah Palin has toppled two giants.

The former mayor of Wasilla, a rapidly growing bedroom burg north of Anchorage, crushed Gov. Frank Murkowski in the Republican gubernatorial primary. Then in the general election she defeated former Democratic Gov. Tony Knowles, a political veteran who was seeking a return to the office he held for two terms.

Monday at her swearing-in in Fairbanks, she simultaneously became Alaska's first female governor, Alaska's youngest governor, and the state's only beauty-queen-turned-chief-executive.

Not bad for a suburban mother of four with a relatively thin résumé that critics claimed marked her as a lightweight. Not only that, she won during an election in which Republicans in general lost big, including at governors' mansions. The party dropped six states, leaving Republicans in control of just 22 governor's seats. Governor Palin is one of three female Republicans to be running a state.

Her victory stems partly from the fact that her campaign bore little connection to the rest of the US. "It was a revolt within the Republican Party against the leadership of the party and the sitting governor," says Gerald McBeath, a political scientist at the University of Alaska in Fairbanks.

A one-time "Miss Wasilla" and a former high school basketball star, Palin turned her relative lack of political experience into an asset. She presented, according to campaign slogans, a "fresh face" offering "new energy for Alaska." That resonated with an electorate that was in a decidedly antiestablishment, anti-incumbent mood.

"This is a good, healthy position Alaskans are in to have a person who's truly an independent. Perhaps we've lacked that in the past," said Palin in an interview.

She is a self-described "hard-core conservative" who opposes abortion and gay marriage, looks favorably on teaching creationism in public schools, and considers the Republican platform "the right agenda for Alaska." Nonetheless, Palin says she sees her victory as part of the national antiestablishment wave that resulted in Democratic control of Congress. She has pledged to run a nonpartisan administration, but sees herself as being on a housecleaning mission, with her own party as a target.

"I am convinced that Alaskans want positive change, and I've taken that to mean in the party itself," she says. Tougher on Big Oil

High on her priority list is a plan to take a tougher line with the oil industry, which she says has been "making mind-boggling profits" from Alaska's resources.

"The oil companies, the executives, are doing exactly what they're supposed to do. You take as much as possible and leave as little as possible behind," she says. The governor needs to ensure that the citizens get as much benefit as possible, "which includes more than just looking out for the bottom line."

Also a top priority, she says, is restoring a sense of ethics to a state where citizens are weary of government scandals.

Palin gained much of her prominence as a whistle-blower. After she was appointed by Governor Murkowski to the Alaska Oil and Gas Conservation Commission, she started bucking the Republican Party leadership over ethics lapses. She blew the whistle on state GOP Chairman Randy Ruedrich when he was a fellow oil and gas commissioner. In 2003, he was forced to resign his regulatory post and pay a record $12,000 fine. She and a Democratic state lawmaker filed an ethics complaint against the state attorney general, Gregg Renkes, who resigned under fire.

"The Randy Ruedrich thing was a huge deal. I think that's when her popularity really started to increase," says Ivan Moore, an Anchorage-based pollster who generally works for Democrats.

Although she campaigned for Murkowski in 2002, she became his consistent critic after he was elected. She was outspoken about the financial deal he negotiated with the three major oil producers for a $20 billion natural-gas pipeline. She and others derided the deal - never ratified by the legislature - as a giveaway to the oil industry.

Palin has paid a price for her outspokenness. Mr. Ruedrich, still party chairman, seldom talks to her, and the state party gave her no money during the general election. Criticized as a 'lightweight'

During the campaign, opponents criticized her for being vague on the issues, and one even took a jab at her intelligence. "I don't hear an answer to my question, so I'm going to repeat it to you, and I'll say it slower," independent Andrew Halcro told her during one debate.

Palin says she has faced the "lightweight" charge before. She was greeted with similar skepticism when, at 32, she was elected mayor of Wasilla. During her tenure, she sometimes worked with an infant daughter asleep under her desk in a car seat.

But voters this year welcomed her outsider status as a former "hockey mom" who spent part of each summer working as a commercial fisherman in Bristol Bay. That stood in sharp contrast to both Murkowski, who served as a US senator for 22 years before becoming governor, and Mr. Knowles, who served two terms in Palin's new job.

A Public Servant To The Last (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

In 1961, Ed McGaffigan Jr. was a seventh-grader from Boston watching the inauguration on television when a president told him to ask what he could do for his country.

DOJ_NMG_0103094

The son of an Irish immigrant laborer, McGaffigan had a ready answer, as did many of his generation: He could work for his country.

That inspired a three-decade career that included stints at the State Department, the White House, the U.S. Embassy in Moscow, Capitol Hill and the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, where last month McGaffigan became the agency's longest-serving commissioner.

McGaffigan, who turns 58 on Friday, would normally have many more years of service ahead. Instead, he is fighting an illness that threatens to vanquish him, and he is taking on one last assignment: closing his career in a way that inspires others to consider public service.

"I do what I do out of a deep sense of appreciation for the opportunities that this country gives people like my father and me," he said. "I'm proud to have been there, and proud to serve with a bunch of people as dedicated as I am.

"I hope there's another generation."

One recent rainy morning, McGaffigan, a physicist with thick gray hair and a runner's build, took his place at the front of the NRC's conference room for a celebration of his career. A line of masking tape on the carpet showed him where to stand, and he placed the toes of his shoes precisely on it.

There were jokes, gifts and tributes. "He can quote the most obscure regulations and give exact details on how they were written," said fellow commissioner Pete Lyons. He presented McGaffigan, a serial marathoner, with a specially produced audiobook to listen to while he runs: a recitation of 10 CFR 3240, "tests required for tritium-powered auto lock illuminators," a reg so obscure it stumped even McGaffigan.

Then it was McGaffigan's turn. "As long as I'm here," he said, "I'm going to be dedicated to making you all improve."

He wept a little. But he did not take his shoes off the tape.

McGaffigan was the first in his family to attend college, earning a physics degree, with honors, from Harvard, and master's degrees from the California Institute of Technology and Harvard's Kennedy School of Government. Since his education was underwritten by taxpayers, he decided, he said, to give them the benefit of the technical expertise they paid for.

While at Cal Tech, he took the foreign service exam, and in 1976 he joined the State Department. During that time, he served in the White House Office of Science and Technology Policy, overseeing international scientific programs, and worked for two years in the U.S. Embassy in Moscow, reporting on science, technology and atomic energy.

"I'm sort of an omnivore when it comes to scientific knowledge," he said. "That gave me an advantage."

In 1982, he married Peggy Weeks, whom he met through a friend. Through his former boss at State, Kennedy School professor Joseph Nye, he met Sen. Jeff Bingaman (D-N.M.), and for the next 14 years he advised the senator in his work on the Senate Armed Services Committee.

The McGaffigans had a son, Edward, in 1984, and a daughter, Margaret, two years later. Soon after, Peggy McGaffigan developed Huntington's disease, a degenerative disease of the nervous system. Bingaman reduced McGaffigan's workload, giving him time to care for his wife and children.

"He was always very organized, always making lists," said Margaret, who goes by Meggy. Grocery lists, family appointments, the annotated Christmas shopping list his children found -- for a decade, his reams of routine have kept his household on task.

Meggy McGaffigan, a physics student, has begun an internship at the NRC, where, at least for a time, she'll work alongside her father.

"He's always told me and my brother that we can do what we want" as a career, she said. But it has been her father's dedication to public service "that kind of makes you wonder if that's something that we want to do."

Her father hopes other young idealists follow his path.

"With Kennedy, serving government was a noble cause," he said. "Now Republicans and Democrats alike bash government when it serves their purpose.

"We are going to need a massive influx of young people. The answer is not contracts." Outsourcing the work of government technicians, he said, means "there are agencies where they can't do the calculations themselves any more. "

When McGaffigan was appointed to the NRC in 1996, his government experience helped the commission unravel a tangle of poor policies "one by one."

Today, he says, the NRC is "much more efficient, much more timely, more fair I believe and more transparent." At the height of this effort, in 1999, McGaffigan was diagnosed with melanoma and underwent extensive surgery. The following year, Peggy McGaffigan died. The day after her funeral, Ed McGaffigan was testifying on the Hill. "What we do is we go on," he said. "It's part of the duty thing."

Throughout his illness, McGaffigan has rarely spent more than a few days off the job.

"The odds are very, very stacked against me," he said. "But I'm going to remain commissioner as long as I'm of use."

Jeff Sharkey, McGaffigan's chief of staff, calls his boss "one of my heroes."

"He invests his entire character in this mission," he said, pausing to compose himself. "You want to do your very best for him."

A few weeks ago, McGaffigan asked his staff to help him write his obituary.

Filled with detailed instructions and proud anecdotes, "it shows what's important to him," Sharkey said. "He continues to be someone who shows others the way, . . . how to deal with things honorably, with grace and with dignity."

Today, Ed McGaffigan and his daughter will drive together to work. He's showing her the ropes, because too soon, Meggy McGaffigan will be working there alone.

"It's one of those things that goes unsaid," she said. Anyway, she knows what her father would tell her.

"Just go on to work like any other day," she said. "Just go on."

Potential Employees Express Lukewarm Interest In Working For The Government (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Many people the government wants as employees are interested in working for Uncle Sam, but they don't see the government as being as innovative and creative as the private sector, according to a Gallup survey released yesterday.

While survey respondents gave the government high marks on job security and compensation, only 3 percent said they see the government as more innovative and creative than the private sector, only 5 percent think it is better at recruiting the best and brightest, and only 6 percent viewed the government as providing a more competitive work environment.

The survey focused on young Americans from 18 to 29, known as Generation Y; professionals in such fields as engineering, law and the social sciences; and mid-career managers who work for nonprofit groups and in the private sector.

"The study makes a strong case that there is a significant disconnect to what targeted workers value in a job and the perception of what government offers compared to the private sector," said Patricia McGinnis, president of the nonprofit Council for Excellence in Government.

It is the latest in a series of efforts aimed at helping the government cope with a wave of baby-boom retirements predicted to set off a "war for talent" with the private sector. The government is particularly vulnerable because substantial numbers of federal employees are projected to retire in 2008 and 2009 and because many young Americans do not view the government as their employer of first choice.

Respondents said they understood the duties of many federal agencies but that those agencies didn't necessarily strike them as interesting places to work.

For example, most said they knew the "key responsibility" of the U.S. Postal Service, Internal Revenue Service and Social Security Administration, but that did not translate into interest. However, respondents found the Defense Department, NASA and the CIA interesting and were clear on their missions. Two agencies, the State Department and the National Science Foundation, got mixed results -- respondents said that they were interesting places to work but that they had relatively little awareness about their key responsibilities.

F. Warren Wright, a managing partner at the Gallup Organization, and Darby Miller Steiger, a senior research director for Gallup, presented the survey results at a breakfast forum sponsored by the Council for Excellence in Government and The Washington Post. The forum's audience included several dozen federal officials, including Linda M. Springer, director of the Office of Personnel Management, who said she planned to bring the survey to the attention of top federal management officials.

The findings were based on responses from 2,596 participants from Sept. 20 to Oct. 2. The council and Gallup plan to partner on more efforts to collect data and views on federal workforce issues, Wright said.

The survey offered some reassurance that the government should be able to tap into Generation Y. Thirty-four percent of Gen Y respondents reported an interest in working for the government, which Wright called "very positive." Steiger said the response suggested that perhaps as many as 15 million young Americans might have an interest in a federal career, more than enough to fill openings in the federal workforce.

Gen Y respondents said they value workplaces that provide intellectual stimulation and opportunities for growth and advancement. But 77 percent said the private sector does a better job of providing an innovative and creative workplace; 58 percent said it does better at hiring the best and brightest. Fifty-five percent said the private sector pays better than the government.

The survey also targeted a segment of the population that McGinnis dubbed "Government-Go-Gets" because their occupations are vital to the future federal workforce. This group consisted of scientists, engineers and computer science professionals and people who work in law, public policy and the social services.

Thirty percent of the Gov-Go-Gets said they have an interest in working for the government, another encouraging response given that there will be "global competition" to hire from this group, Wright said.

Mary Cheney And Partner Are About To Be Moms (WP)

By Amy Argetsinger And Roxanne Roberts

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

Mary Cheney, the vice president's openly gay daughter, is pregnant. She and her partner of 15 years, Heather Poe, are "ecstatic" about the baby, due in late spring, said a source close to the couple.

It's a baby boom for grandparents Dick and Lynne Cheney: Their older daughter, Elizabeth, went on leave as deputy assistant secretary of state before having her fifth child in July. "The vice president and Mrs. Cheney are looking forward with eager anticipation to the arrival of their sixth grandchild," spokesman Lea Anne McBride said last night.

Cheney, 37, was a key aide to her father during the 2004 reelection campaign and now is vice president for consumer advocacy at AOL. Poe, 45, a former park ranger, is renovating their Great Falls home.

News of the pregnancy will undoubtedly reignite the debate about gay marriage. During the campaign, Mary Cheney was criticized by gay activists for not being more publicly supportive of same-sex marriage. Her father said people "ought to be free to enter into any kind of relationship they want to" but deferred to the president's policy supporting a constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriages. Cheney herself called the proposed amendment "a gross affront to gays and lesbians everywhere" in her book, "Now It's My Turn: A Daughter's Chronicle of Political Life," which was published in May.

Cheney has described her relationship with Poe -- whom she took to last year's White House dinner honoring Prince Charles and Camilla-- as a marriage. The two met in 1988 while playing ice hockey and began dating four years later. They moved from Colorado to Virginia a year ago to be closer to Cheney's family. In an interview with the Post six months ago, when asked if she and Poe wanted children, Cheney said that was a "conversation I think I should have with Heather first."

In November, Virginia voters passed a state constitutional amendment banning gay marriage and civil unions; state law is unclear on whether Poe could have full legal rights as a parent of Cheney's child. The circumstances of the pregnancy will remain private, said the source close to the couple. This is the first child for both.

Baltimore's Channel 13, Preempted by Channel Faux

Poor Michael Richards. Seems people are willing to believe anything about him these days!

On at least two of its Monday evening news broadcasts, Baltimore's Channel 13 reported that the disgraced "Seinfeld" comic had apologized for yet another racial uproar, when he showed up in blackface at a celebrity roast for Whoopi Goldberg.

What, you didn't hear about that one? Yee-e-e-ah, well, see, that's probably because it's not true. A WJZ staffer ripped the story off the Web -- without realizing that the source, DatelineHollywood.com, is a purely satirical site, which invented the completely bogus item as a riff on Richards's real-life racist outburst at an L.A. comedy club last month.

"This was an error in judgment by one of our producers who did not follow our established policy," said station spokeswoman Liz Chuday. "She failed to verify a story from a publication we were not familiar with before it aired." The station caught the error in time to issue a correction by the 11 p.m. broadcast.

The producer missed some pretty obvious tipoffs-- like the line about Richards pouring Aunt Jemima pancake syrup over Goldberg's head. Also: The links to other "articles," including " Kid Rock Seeks Physical Custody of Pamela Anderson's Twins" and " Rupert Murdoch Found Dead Next to Bloody Glove."

"Get out!" laughed Dateline: Hollywood creator Ben Fritz when we told him his fake news made the real news. The former political writer -- a recent transplant from Adams Morgan to L.A. -- said this wasn't the first time the site's satire cut too close to the bone.

"Last year we had an article about how Pat Robertson said Katrina happened because they picked Ellen DeGeneres to host the Emmys."

No, of course he never said that, but "a lot of people thought that was real."

HEY, ISN'T THAT . . . ?

? Laura Bush doing some Christmas shopping at Brooks Brothers Saturday morning. The first lady and a handful of pals dropped by the Connecticut Avenue store, where she picked up (spoiler alert, Mr. President!) cashmere sweaters and socks -- just before D.C.'s tax-free shopping week came to a close.

? John McCain scarfing down a two-pound lobster. The former Navy pilot attended the Army-Navy game in Philly Saturday, then celebrated Navy's 26-14 victory at the Old Original Bookbinder's restaurant. Impressive, but still well short of the four-pound crustacean that GOP rival George Pataki tackled at the Palm earlier this fall.

? David Gregory buying a cartful of Jell-O pudding snacks in the Cleveland Park Giant on Sunday. The NBC White House correspondent's 4-year-old son knocked out a tooth on the playground, and his doting dad was loading up soft-food treats.

U.S. Offers North Korea Aid For Dropping Nuclear Plans (NYT)

By Helene Cooper And David E. Sanger

New York Times, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 5 — The United States has offered a detailed package of economic and energy assistance in exchange for North Korea's giving up nuclear weapons and technology, American officials said Tuesday.

But the offer, made last week during two days of intense talks in Beijing, would hinge on North Korea's agreeing to begin dismantling some of the equipment it is using to expand its nuclear arsenal, even before returning to negotiations.

It is unclear whether North Korea will accept the offer, which is more specific — in both the details and the timing — than a vaguely worded statement of principles that the North signed in September 2005, a year before its first nuclear test.

The combination of incentives and demands was the focal point of three-way meetings on Nov. 28 and 29 involving Assistant Secretary of State Christopher R. Hill; North Korea's vice foreign minister, Kim Kye-gwan; and Chinese officials at the Diaoyutai State Guesthouse in Beijing. The incentives offered by the United States include food aid from the United States, Japan and South Korea, a senior administration official said.

The offer is significant because the administration has resisted making clear to North Korea exactly what kind of aid it would receive if it agreed to begin taking apart facilities like the plutonium reprocessing facility that turns spent fuel into weapons, and to provide a list of all its nuclear facilities. Hawks in the administration, particularly in Vice President Dick Cheney's office, have long opposed what they call "rewarding" North Korea for its nuclear test.

But State Department officials have argued that while the argument has gone on in Washington, the North has produced fuel for six or more weapons. They say the only successful strategy will be one that results in the beginning of dismantlement.

The incentives package also includes a pledge by the United States to work with North Korea toward finding a way to end the financial restrictions placed last year on a Macao bank, Banco Delta Asia, that was a main hub of the North's international financial transactions. The Bush administration accused Banco Delta Asia of helping North Korea to launder money from drug smuggling and other illicit activities and to pass counterfeit $100 bills manufactured by the North's government.

While the United States remains unwilling to lift the sanctions until the counterfeiting issue is resolved, a senior administration official said American officials had told the North Koreans they would work with them on the issue. "We would help them to help themselves," the official said. "We would expect them to come forward with what they know, and we'd work through the problem."

Describing the North Koreans' response to the entire package of incentives and demands, the official, who was in the room during the exchanges in Beijing, said: "They listened intently. They were clearly in a listening and probing mode, and they said they were glad to be hearing this from us."

The Beijing discussions took place in advance of planned six-country talks on the nuclear program. Diplomats from the other five countries — the United States, China, Japan, South Korea and Russia — are wary that the off-again, on-again talks risk irrelevancy; they began in 2003 and have yet to produce anything beyond the agreement in principle of dismantlement for eventual aid.

No date has been set for the official talks.

North Korea boycotted the six-party talks last year after the United States cracked down on Banco Delta Asia, and on Oct. 9, Pyongyang conducted a nuclear test. On Oct. 31, North Korea agreed to return to the six-party talks.

Since then, though, American officials have balked at scheduling a meeting until first receiving a commitment from the North to start dismantling the nuclear program.

World Powers Fail To Reach Iran Accord (AP)

By Angela Charlton

AP, December 6, 2006

Six world powers made "substantive progress" but failed to reach an accord Tuesday on a U.N. resolution to punish Iran for defying demands to halt its nuclear program, the French Foreign Ministry said after talks in Paris.

Tehran made a new threat of retaliation if the powers opted for sanctions.

"We made substantive progress on the scope of the sanctions targeting proliferation-sensitive activities. There remain several outstanding issues, upon which we will reflect over the coming days," the French ministry said in a statement. "We are now close to a conclusion of this process."

The talks brought together diplomats from the United States, Britain, China, France and Russia — the permanent members of the U.N. Security Council — as well as Germany and a representative of EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana.

After months of diplomatic wrangling, the United States and France had hoped Tuesday's talks would produce a resolution imposing sanctions on Iran for defying an Aug. 31 U.N. deadline to halt uranium enrichment. Western powers accuse Iran of seeking nuclear bombs, while Tehran insists it only wants nuclear energy.

The five permanent U.N. Security Council members plus Germany remained split over key questions of visa bans and asset freezes for Iranians linked to nuclear development, which Russia is resisting, according to a top European diplomat who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the talks.

The discussions now move to the United Nations in New York. The Americans and Europeans are pushing for a resolution by the end of the year.

"We are coming up to the time (when) the credibility of the U.N. is at stake," U.S. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said in Washington before the Paris talks.

Meanwhile, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad vowed Tuesday to stick by the nuclear program and issued a new threat to downgrade relations with the 25-nation EU if European negotiators opted for tough U.N. sanctions. He gave no details on how ties might be downgraded. The EU is Iran's biggest trading partner.

Illustrating the divisions that have tangled the negotiations, Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov said earlier Tuesday that imposing wide-ranging sanctions would be irresponsible.

"We believe that to impose these kind of sanctions would be ... disproportionate to the real situation. We will achieve the opposite results," Lavrov said in Brussels. "We believe this is wrong. We will work in a more responsible way."

Still, the high-ranking European diplomat said the Russians made some concessions at Tuesday's talks. The Russians agreed to a measure prohibiting financial transfers to "problematic" Iranians linked to nuclear or ballistic missile programs, the diplomat said.

Russia still opposes the broader asset freeze that the European players — Britain, France and Germany — proposed in a draft U.N. resolution presented in October, the diplomat said.

And the question of travel bans for those involved in Iran's nuclear and missile programs remains "blocked," he said. The Europeans and Americans support the bans and Russia opposes them.

The Russians also remain resistant to a measure expanding the powers of the International Atomic Energy Agency to monitor Iran's nuclear program, considering that a "provocation" to Iran, the diplomat said.

The draft resolution would exempt a nuclear power plant being built by the Russians at Bushehr in Iran, but not the nuclear fuel needed for the reactor. Russia wants to remove any mention of Bushehr.

Washington's patience appears to be wearing thin.

When asked earlier Tuesday when he expected Russia and China to join the others in supporting the resolution, the American participant in the discussions, Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns, replied: "This afternoon would be a good time."

No Deal On Iran Sanctions At Paris Talks (AFP)

AFP, December 6, 2006

Six world powers meeting in Paris said they had failed to agree what sanctions to impose over Iran's refusal to halt sensitive nuclear work, as diplomats said that Russia was blocking a deal.

Top diplomats from the five veto-wielding UN Security Council members -- Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States -- plus Germany and a European Union envoy, took part in the talks.

"We made substantive progress on the scope of the sanctions, targeting proliferation sensitive activities," the French foreign ministry, which hosted the meeting, said in a statement afterwards.

"We are now close to a conclusion of this process," it added, but said there were still "several outstanding issues".

"The next step will be in New York," it said, in a reference to the headquarters of the United Nations, without specifying when the next round of talks would take place.

The six powers are trying to agree what economic sanctions to impose on Iran for ignoring a UN deadline of August 31 to stop enriching uranium -- which outside powers fear could be used to make nuclear weapons.

Moscow and Beijing -- who have strong economic interests in Iran -- have tried to water down a draft UN Security Council resolution drawn up by France, Britain and Germany, while Washington wants to beef the text up.

The European draft would bar trade with Iran in goods related to its nuclear and ballistic missile programs and impose financial and travel restrictions on persons and agencies involved.

According to diplomats in Paris, Russia -- though willing to back the trade ban -- is still opposed to sanctions being applied to individuals.

Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov said earlier Tuesday that Moscow would support a ban on shipments of sensitive goods but said broader sanctions would be counter-productive.

"We believe it is necessary to approve the proposal on forbidding deliveries of technology, material and services in the field of uranium enrichment, chemical processing of radioactive fuel, and heavy-water technology to Iran from abroad," he was quoted as saying by Ria Novosti news agency.

He criticised "our Western partners" for supporting the adoption of wide-reaching sanctions that are "not proportionate" to the monitoring capacity of the International Atomic Energy Agency.

"Such a wholesale approach to banning cooperation with Iran in various spheres will only exacerbate the situation," he said.

The meeting in the French capital came after Tehran warned it would take any attempt to thwart its nuclear programme as an "act of hostility".

In Tehran, President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad warned Europe that international action over Iran's nuclear programme could endanger relations with Tehran.

"If you (Europeans) continue making efforts to halt the progress of the Iranian nuclear programme and if you take any step against the Iranian nation's rights, either in propaganda or international bodies, the Islamic republic will consider this an act of hostility," Ahmadinejad said in a speech.

"And if you continue with this, the Iranian nation will revise the direction of its path and its plans related to you," he said.

The six powers suspect Iran of trying to develop nuclear weapons under cover of a civilian power generation programme -- which Tehran strongly denies.

On Sunday, Israel approved the creation of a new ministry for strategic affairs, mainly to deal with Iran's nuclear ambitions.

Iran Tells Arabs To Oust U.S. (WT/AP)

By Jim Krane

The Washington Times, December 6, 2006

DUBAI, United Arab Emirates -- Iran's top national security official urged Arabs yesterday to expel the U.S. military from bases in the region and instead join Tehran in a regional security alliance.

The offer was a strong sign of Iran's rising assertiveness in its contest with the United States for influence in the region.

Persian Gulf countries, suspicious of Iran's intentions, are unlikely to respond to the call and push out the U.S. military or end U.S. security deals they view as offering them an umbrella of protection, many here said.

But smaller countries, such as Kuwait, do have to tread a fine line of not antagonizing either Washington or Tehran. Some Gulf countries refused to participate in recent U.S. Navy maneuvers in the Gulf so as not to offend Iran.

Iran's top national security official, Ali Larijani, apparently aimed to allay Arab concerns and raise suspicion about U.S. intentions in his speech yesterday. He told Arab business leaders and political analysts that Washington is indifferent to their interests and will cast them aside when they are no longer useful.

"The security and stability of the region needs to be attained and we should do it inside the region, not through bringing in foreign forces," Mr. Larijani said. "We should stand on our own feet."

Such words are a direct rejection by Iran of the "notion that it can be contained," said Vali Nasr, an Iran specialist with the New York-based Council on Foreign Relations, who attended the conference.

Speakers at the Arab Strategy Forum said they think Iran's rising clout came as a direct result of the faltering U.S. policy in Iraq that has put Iran's Shi'ite allies in control of the government in Baghdad.

Mr. Larijani's proposal outlines what analysts here describe as an attempt to split the Arab world into two camps: a U.S.-Israeli-Arab coalition that seeks to contain Iran and an anti-American, anti-Israeli alliance led by Iran.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has called for wiping Israel off the map and expressed doubts about the Holocaust. Yesterday, Iran's foreign ministry said it will hold a two-day international conference next week on the Holocaust to examine the event without any "preconceived ideas."

Most Arab governments remain firm U.S. allies, but Persian Iran's tough stance against Israel and the West has broad grass-roots appeal.

Saudi Arabia, Bahrain and other Sunni-dominated countries have expressed misgivings about the growing influence of Iran's Shi'ite-dominated government, which in the 1980s sought to export its Islamic revolution and topple neighboring governments.

"Nobody is asking the Americans to pack up and leave," said Abdulkhaleq Abdulla, a Dubai-based political analyst. "There are vital American interests here, and the smaller Arab countries need protection."

Mr. Larijani expressed annoyance at Arab fears about Iranian intentions, saying Iran and its Sunni-dominated neighbors have more in common with each other than with the United States or Israel.

He assured Arab leaders that Iran seeks "peaceful coexistence" and could replace the security umbrella of U.S. bases in the region.

Iran Invites Scholars To Assess Holocaust As History Or Fiction (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, December 6, 2006

TEHRAN, Dec. 5 — The Iranian authorities, who have frequently accused the Jews of distorting history to legitimize Israel, announced plans on Tuesday for an international conference on the Holocaust.

They said the conference, to be held in Tehran next Monday and Tuesday, would include more than 60 scholars from 30 countries and would examine a range of issues, including whether the gas chambers were actually used.

Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, stirred outrage in the West last year when he stated on several occasions that the Holocaust, in which six million Jews perished at the hands of the Nazis, was either greatly exaggerated or an outright myth. He also called more than once for Israel to be wiped off the map.

Deputy Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mohammadi said at a news conference here that the seminar flowed from Mr. Ahmadinejad's comments.

Beyond questioning the Holocaust, Mr. Ahmadinejad has said the Jews have used it as a propaganda tool to promote Israel's interests. Since several European countries make Holocaust denial a crime, he says scholars there are not free to do honest research on the subject.

Mr. Mohammadi said the conference would "provide the opportunity for scholars from both sides to give their papers in freedom and without preconceived ideas." He refused to give the names of the 67 scholars invited to attend the seminar out of fear that their countries would prohibit them from coming.

The conference does not mean that Iran "denies the crimes of Hitler," he added. "Since we are not accused and responsible for the Holocaust, we are an impartial judge."

The Foreign Ministry is sponsoring the event though its Institute for Political and International Studies, whose Web site says, "The word 'Holocaust,' which entered the political literature during the Second World War, turned into one of the most important propaganda tools used to politically justify the support for the Jewish People in the 20th century."

It invited participants to submit their papers on a range of nearly 30 subjects including the nature of anti-Semitism, Jews in Iran and Islam, Zionism, gas chambers, freedom of speech and how the law treats those who deny the Holocaust.

Mr. Mohammadi dismissed the notion that the seminar could promote anti-Semitism, saying anti-Semitism was a Western phenomenon. The proof for that, he said, was Iran's community of 25,000 Jews.

The announcement came as foreign ministers of the permanent members of the United Nations Security Council — Britain, France, China, Russia and the United States — plus Germany met in France to discuss possible sanctions on Iran for refusing to halt its nuclear program.

The United Nations had demanded that Iran suspend its uranium enrichment program by Aug. 31. <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

Military May Not Be Able To Halt Protests (WT/AP)

By Sam F. Ghattas

The Washington Times, December 6, 2006

BEIRUT -- Shi'ite Muslims yesterday buried a man killed in street clashes in a Sunni Muslim neighborhood as Lebanon's army commander warned that the military may not be able to contain further protests linked to the country's tense political standoff.

Army commander Gen. Michel Suleiman urged politicians to compromise, according to comments quoted in several Beirut newspapers.

After another night of unrest in the capital, Prime Minister Fuad Siniora warned the situation could get out of control.

"No one can impose control on the streets, and this has been proven," he told hundreds of supporters who converged throughout the day on his office complex, which was ringed by barbed wire, combat troops and riot police.

Outside, thousands of opposition protesters were gathered near Mr. Siniora's offices and in several other downtown squares in yet another evening of rallies aimed at bringing down the government. Many have been camped out near the prime minister's headquarters since Friday.

In a new tactic last night, they aimed two powerful floodlights at the government complex. Troops installed more barbed wire and other fortifications.

Lebanon's political confrontation breaks down along dangerous sectarian lines. The U.S.-backed government is supported largely by Sunnis, while the opposition -- led by the pro-Syrian Hezbollah -- has wide support among Shi'ites. Lebanon's Christians are split between the two camps. Hezbollah is demanding the formation of a new government giving it and its allies a larger share of power.

The standoff shows no sign of waning despite calls from the two sides for dialogue to resolve their differences. The Arab League secretary general has visited to try to help, as did Jordan's foreign minister. Egypt's Beirut envoy also has been making the rounds.

After several days of trading accusations in the media, rival Lebanese leaders opened direct channels. A Sunni scholar in the opposition went to the government headquarters to discuss ideas on resolving the crisis, and the government gave him its own proposals, including the possible expansion of the current Cabinet to satisfy opposition demands, Youth and Sports Minister Ahmed Fatfat told reporters.

Shi'ite leaders tried to put the lid on the boiling sectarian tension and prevent revenge attacks after the killing of 21-year-old Shi'ite protester Ahmed Mahmoud, who was shot while walking Sunday with other protesters through the Sunni neighborhood of Qasqas. Twenty-one persons were wounded in the violence.

In a Shi'ite district not far from the shooting scene, Mr. Mahmoud's comrades from the Shi'ite Amal party and relatives took turns carrying his coffin. About 2,000 people, many holding Lebanese and green Amal flags, marched behind. A band played martial music. Some of the Shi'ites beat their heads with their hands in a traditional sign of mourning.

The funeral march made its way to the Rawdat al-Shahidein cemetery, where a senior Shi'ite cleric led the prayer over the coffin amid wails of relatives and calls of "God is great."

With Street Protests, Hezbollah Gambles In Quest For Dominance (WP)

By Anthony Shadid

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

BEIRUT, Dec. 5 -- Hezbollah has entered territory uncharted in its 24-year history as armed militia, social welfare group and nascent political party, effectively seeking an unprecedented, decisive say in Lebanese politics to protect what it sees as its interests from foes at home and abroad.

The month-long political crisis that has roiled Lebanon, hurtling it dangerously close to the precipice of civil war, marks a revealing shift for the Shiite Muslim movement that for years, at least rhetorically, tried to stay above politics, entering the cabinet for the first time in 2005.

Now, by mobilizing its rank and file and pouring them into downtown Beirut to topple the government, the movement has framed that pursuit for political power in the same martial language of this summer's war with Israel.

The imagery is often blunt: "Just as I promised you victory in the past, I promise you victory once again," goes a recording by Hezbollah leader Hasan Nasrallah played over and over, igniting cheers each time. Banners on tents, housing thousands of supporters camped out in front of the government headquarters, display the slogan: "As with victory, change is coming, coming, coming."

"Everything is at stake for Hezbollah," said Amal Saad-Ghorayeb, an analyst on Hezbollah and a visiting scholar at the Carnegie Endowment Middle East Center in Beirut. "There is no way that Hezbollah would back down."

"They're putting this political struggle on a par with the military struggle to show how significant it is strategically," she added. "It's basically an existential struggle for Hezbollah. It's an extension of its war with Israel."

The protests that began last week continued Tuesday, part carnival, part show of force. The crisis has myriad dimensions: notably a contest over ideology toward Israel and a battle over whose patrons -- the United States and France on the government's side, Syria and Iran on Hezbollah's -- will have a greater say here.

And the protests are rife with irony. In pursuit of its political aims, Hezbollah has employed tactics praised by the Bush administration when mass demonstrations took place after the assassination of former prime minister Rafiq al-Hariri in February 2005 helped end Syria's 29-year military presence in the country.

In the street today is a somewhat unlikely coalition of Shiites loyal to Hezbollah and to the allied Amal movement, and Christian supporters of Michel Aoun, an influential former general. The protests themselves represent an unprecedented attempt at popular pressure by Islamic movements that often act, or are forced to act, clandestinely in the Middle East.

But there remains a relentless logic to today's demonstrations: an attempt by Hezbollah to resolve in its favor the political uncertainty that has reigned since the Syrian withdrawal from a country in which two camps contest nearly every aspect of Lebanese political life. At stake, almost everyone agrees, is the direction of the state.

"This is not about one more cabinet minister or one less for either them or us. It is a battle equally important for them and for us," said Samir Geagea, veteran of a civil war militia who supports Prime Minister Fouad Siniora's government.

Nayla Moawad, the minister of social affairs, was more direct. "This is a coup d'etat," she said.

"A balance of power within the government will be a guarantee for both sides," countered Amin Sherri, a Hezbollah member of parliament. "Before they were giving us a choice between bad and worse. We don't want to go on like this."

"We don't want to be merely witnesses to decision-making on important issues," he added.

Since Hezbollah's creation with Iranian patronage in the wake of the 1982 Israeli invasion, the group has often operated in different environments. During the civil war that ended in 1990, there were no rules. Afterward, Syria, long the kingmaker here, protected Hezbollah's interests, as well as determined the country's foreign policy. After the Israeli withdrawal from southern Lebanon in 2000, Hezbollah's popularity swelled, its militia credited with what most in Lebanon considered a victory.

But in the tumult and uncertainty of Lebanese politics today, once unasked questions are up for grabs: whether Hezbollah can keep its arms; its ties to Syria and Iran; the country's posture toward Israel and the United States; and the balance of power among Sunnis, Shiites and divided Christians. Underlying them is another question, sharpened by the contention of Hezbollah's foes that it started the latest war with Israel: Who has the right to make war and peace in Lebanon?

"The state, before the assassination of Hariri, was used to protect and embrace Hezbollah. The whole state served to protect it. And now this state has ended. So Hezbollah is looking for an internal role, to enter the political equation, and its entry into politics represents a huge upheaval," said Hazem al-Amin, an analyst of Shiite politics and writer for al-Hayat newspaper.

"Hezbollah wants to try its political training on us," he added.

Hezbollah's transformation over the years marks one of the most striking transformations of any Islamic organization in the Middle East. In its early years, it was notorious for imposing draconian restrictions in southern Lebanon -- banning mixed sunbathing and women's swimsuits at beaches, closing coffee shops, and prohibiting parties and dancing. Since then, it has evolved from a shadowy organization blamed for two attacks on the U.S. Embassy and the 1983 bombing of the Marine barracks here, killing 241 soldiers, into a sprawling movement that fields a crack militia, serves in parliament and delivers welfare -- from education to compensation for war damages -- for its Shiite constituency, Lebanon's largest community.

Through that evolution, the movement has adapted itself at turning points in Lebanon's history. It took part in parliamentary elections in 1992 after the civil war. After the Syrian withdrawal, it entered the cabinet for the first time. As pressure built for its disarmament, as called for by U.N. Resolution 1559, it struck its alliance with Aoun a year ago. Each turn can be read as defensive: protecting its weapons, preventing Lebanon from growing too close to the United States, and promoting the ambitions of the Shiite community, long disenfranchised and still sometimes perceived as second class.

But the protests underway mark a far less certain tactic for Hezbollah than past decisions to participate in parliament or the cabinet. The stakes are higher -- bringing down the government -- and the outcome for a group that prides itself on deliberation, caution and prudence is by no means certain. The implications for its Shiite constituency are similarly ambiguous. A debate remains in Lebanon over what precisely Hezbollah wants and how much the rest of Lebanon is willing to give.

"They sort of painted themselves in a corner, and it's very difficult to back out now," said Timur Goksel, a former spokesman and adviser to the U.N. peacekeeping force here. That strategy entailed risk in Lebanon's notoriously mercurial, even cynical politics, he said. "At the moment, they are spending a lot of the capital they made out of this summer's war. Getting involved in local politics can erode the party's popularity very quickly."

In some ways, he added, "fighting Israel is much easier."

In the protests themselves, canvas tents sprawling across downtown during the day, engulfed by crowds at night, Hezbollah has played down any sectarian ambitions. Rather, it has promoted the protests as a campaign for "national unity." "One, united," banners read at the protest and on the movement's television station, al-Manar. On a recent night, a Hezbollah guard discouraged a couple from bringing a Hezbollah banner to the stage. "Please, only Lebanese flags tonight," he said.

Another dominant theme is resistance to American influence in Lebanon. That message appeals to its constituency, bitter over U.S. support for Israel in this summer's war, and underlines the almost existential threat that Hezbollah, backed by Syria and Iran, perceives in a government too closely allied with the United States and its ambitions in the region.

"Hezbollah was extremely anxious where the country was heading. It seemed to be heading straight into the U.S. orbit. It was turning into a satellite state," said Saad-Ghorayeb, the analyst. "If they back down now, they will have effectively given up on Lebanon. That would mean Lebanon falls to their enemy, the United States and Israel."

Banners condemn Jeffrey D. Feltman, the U.S. ambassador in Lebanon, who is often a target of Nasrallah's speeches. "The government of Feltman," one slogan reads, "We'll bring it down." A homemade billboard was set up near Hussein Ismail, a 15-year-old protester from the southern town of Kafra. Under a picture of Siniora and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, it read, "Congratulations to the bride and groom." Another pictured the two shaking hands. "Peace with the enemies," it read.

"This is a struggle with a government that is not Lebanese but rather American," he said. "We want a Lebanese government that doesn't take its decisions from the Americans and the Zionists."

Behind Ismail was another poster of Nasrallah. "He promised a victory, and a victory is coming, just like he said."

Textbooks In Israel To Designate West Bank (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

JERUSALEM, Dec. 5 -- Maps in future Israeli public school textbooks will show the boundary that existed between Israel and the West Bank before the 1967 Middle East war, Israel's education minister announced Tuesday. The move drew sharp protest from lawmakers, settler groups and religious leaders who claim the West Bank as part of the Jewish state.

The minister, Yuli Tamir, is a member of the Labor Party and a founder of the advocacy group Peace Now, which opposes Jewish settlement in the occupied territories. Palestinians envision a future state in the West Bank, Gaza Strip and East Jerusalem, all of which Israel occupied in 1967.

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has stated that Israel should evacuate parts of the West Bank so as to define its borders around land with a solid Jewish majority. He has said that several large Israeli settlement blocs in the West Bank would be included as part of Israel in any final peace deal.

The Israeli government has frequently criticized the Palestinians and neighboring Arab states for using maps in classrooms that do not define the state of Israel, now 58 years old. The maps generally mark it as "Palestine."

Israel's policy of not marking the West Bank began soon after it captured the territory from Jordan in the 1967 war. Most school maps now evoke Jewish history by labeling the territory by the Biblical terms "Judea and Samaria."

In defending her order in interviews with Israeli reporters Tuesday, Tamir noted the difficulty in pressuring Arab countries to mark Israel on maps when the Jewish state does not designate the West Bank as a separate entity on its own maps. She told Israel's Army Radio that "if we don't show these borders, we will turn out very confused children."

"You cannot expect children to understand history if portions are excised from school texts," said Tamir, a professor of political philosophy at Tel Aviv University.

The order drew angry reactions from legislators affiliated with parties that claim the West Bank as part of "greater Israel," an area that they generally define as stretching from the Mediterranean Sea to the Jordan River.

Roughly 250,000 Jewish settlers live in the West Bank beyond Israeli-annexed East Jerusalem, amid approximately 2.5 million Palestinians.

"In general, I'm not against giving all the information there is to students," said Shaul Goldstein, head of the Gush Etzion settlement bloc south of Jerusalem. "On the other hand, it's obvious she is doing this for political reasons, to educate our youth that 'this land is not ours.' "

Israel Radio reported that a group of conservative rabbis issued a religious decree prohibiting the use of any textbooks whose maps show the "Green Line," the 1949 armistice line separating Israel and the West Bank.

Ronit Tirosh, a legislator from Olmert's centrist Kadima party and a former director general of the Education Ministry, told reporters Tuesday that Tamir "cannot decide for Israeli pupils what is part of Israel and what isn't." Israeli officials estimate it will take more than a year for new maps to reach Israeli classrooms if the policy proceeds.

Olmert, whose governing coalition includes Labor as its largest member, said after meeting with Tamir that "there is no reason not to mark the Green Line and where the borders of the country were in 1967," according to the Ynetnews Web site.

"But there is a duty to present the fact that the government's stance and the consensus in the country rule out returning to the 1967 borders," Olmert added.

Palestinian-al Qaeda Plans (WT)

By Louis Rene Beres And Clare M. Lopez

DOJ_NMG_0103104

Most Palestinian communities across the world were jubilant on September 11, 2001. This past June, these very same communities expressed outrage at the successful American assassination of terrorist leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi. For them, the murderous mastermind of al Qaeda in Iraq had been a great hero. Dead, he was now a "martyr."

But the Palestinian link to al Qaeda has become more than mere sympathy and friendship. Al Qaeda has now set its sights on Israel and on an incremental takeover of the Palestinian cause. This is the next phase of its campaign to dominate the Muslim world and re-establish an Islamic Caliphate.

In the wake of Israel's withdrawal from Gaza in August 2005, and Hezbollah's war with Israel in July 2006, al Qaeda perceives a unique opportunity. With chaos gripping both the Palestinian Authority and the Lebanese political scene, al Qaeda has precisely the opening it needs to counter Iran's radical Shi'ite expansionism and to acquire a necessary foothold in the region. Its direct entry into the Arab-Israeli conflict could produce major instabilities and war.

A common hatred of the United States and Israel facilitates networks of tactical cooperation between Palestinians and al Qaeda. These alignments have functioned for some time in Gaza, the West Bank, Jordan and Lebanon. Shadowy connections exist among clandestine cells that now stretch from the Sinai, across the border into Gaza, and on up to the refugee camps in Lebanon. They involve information sharing, weaponry, safe houses and scientific expertise. The overriding purpose of these alignments is future terror attacks against both Israel and the United States. These planned operations could include chemical, biological or even nuclear technologies.

None of this should be a surprise. Immediately after September 11, not only Hamas approached al Qaeda, but so too did Yasser Arafat's own forces. Fatah, formed as Mr. Arafat's personal movement to dominate the PLO, had openly embraced "martyrdom operations" against Israeli women and children as the al-Aqsa Intifada first unfolded in 2001. Although Palestinian terrorists hardly needed al Qaeda to prod them to commit further acts of cruelty, the example of September 11 seemed to offer them both comfort and resolve. For its part, al Qaeda has been more than pleased that its Palestinian collaborators now cite frequently to the sacred Hadith: "Oh, Allah, annihilate the Jews and their supporters."

The glorification of killing for Islam has infiltrated previously secular Palestinian terror groups by way of Iranian-influenced Hezbollah, just as it has affected al Qaeda. In addition to the usual sanctification of "suicide bombing," both also approve of certain religion-based killings within the Islamic community. Both term Muslims who allegedly collaborate with the United States murtaddun (apostates) and both prescribe the sentence of murtadd harbi; to wit, the "ally with Satan" is condemned with a fatwa that pronounces a death sentence. The pertinent Koranic verse is this: "The punishment of those who wage war against Allah and His Prophet and strive to make mischief in the land, is only this -- that they should be murdered or crucified, or their hands and feet should be cut off on opposing sides." There is no difference here between man and woman: "It is permissible to shed the blood of a woman who is a heretic [harbiyya] even if her fighting is limited to singing."

Despite these factors that first allowed al Qaeda to obtain a foothold within the Palestinian cause -- a cause that had been ignored by Osama bin Laden before his 1998 Declaration of War Against Crusaders and Jews -- such an alliance is not necessarily "natural." Nor are Palestinian groups such as Hamas automatically inclined to welcome al Qaeda's growing presence in the territories. In addition to tensions that exist between Sunni offshoots of the Muslim Brotherhood (such as Hamas and the Palestinian Islamic Jihad) and the Iranian Shi'ite proxy group Hezbollah, the international jihad mission of al Qaeda goes far beyond the essentially nationalist, territorial objectives of local groups that have been fighting Israel for decades.

Historically, al Qaeda has sought various security vacuums from which to operate -- e.g., Afghanistan, Somalia, Iraq and Pakistan's wild border region. It now seeks the Palestinian Territories. As far back as December 2002, al Qaeda first announced the establishment of the Islamic Al-Maida Organization in Palestine. This announcement declared "a vow of allegiance to the Emir of the Mujahedeen, the leader Osama bin Laden, by means of whom Allah strengthened the Nation of Islam." Calling for an end to regimes that "serve only the murderous Jews and the Great Satan," the announcement ended with a plea to "our brothers in Islam in Jordan, Egypt and Saudi Arabia to attack the American interests and the heretical institutions of apostasy... Death to the Jews and Zionism; death to America; strength to Allah, Allah is great, and victory to Islam."

It was Israel's 2005 withdrawal from Gaza that provided the first real opportunity for al Qaeda operatives to cross over newly opened border crossings from Sinai. Then, Iran's unleashing of its Lebanese Hezbollah proxy against Israel in the summer of 2006 alerted al Qaeda that a resurgent radical Shi'ism meant to stake its own claim to the Palestinian campaign against Israel. While Hamas' January 2006 electoral victory signaled the demise of Fatah, that terror group was not willing to go down without a fight. Hamas is not Fatah's only enemy, however, as a noose of hatred draws more tightly around Israel. In September, Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas lost his top intelligence officer and four bodyguards in a shooting ambush claimed brazenly by al Qaeda.

All sides now openly admit to al Qaeda's expanding presence. In Sinai, a mixed Bedouin-Palestinian wing of al Qaeda operates under the name "al Qaeda Organization in the Land of the Nile." In Gaza, a group calling itself "al Qaeda Organization in the Border Districts" has surfaced. In October 2005, Israel's military intelligence chief, Maj. Gen. Aharon Zeevi-Parkash, called al Qaeda's growing interest in Israel "a real threat." Retired Brig. Gen. Danny Arditi, who heads the counterterrorism department of the Israeli National Security Council, confirmed to Army Radio that al Qaeda had infiltrated Gaza from the southern Egyptian border after Israel's disengagement. In a September 2005 interview, Hamas spokesman Mahmoud al-Zahar confirmed the infiltration of al Qaeda members into Gaza, noting not only a physical infiltration, but claiming the existence of contacts from Gaza with al Qaeda centers in other countries. The wary working relationship between Hamas and al Qaeda notwithstanding, the Muslim Brotherhood has launched a propaganda campaign against al Qaeda throughout the Arab world. Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah is frankly antagonistic to al Qaeda's spreading influence in Lebanon, and has acknowledged al Qaeda's involvement there by terming it a "dangerous and unacceptable" situation.

Al Qaeda now operates secretly in the West Bank (Judea/Samaria) and openly in Gaza at the express invitation of Hamas. Relations with Fatah have deteriorated since Mr. Arafat first imported Hezbollah fighters to assist with terror attacks against Israel. Hezbollah and Iranian Revolutionary Guards have, in turn, helped to train a variety of Middle Eastern terrorists. Early on, Mr. Arafat had gathered together a diverse collection of Iranian Revolutionary Guards, Hezbollah, Popular Front-General Command and various Iraqi military intelligence units (Palestinian terrorists had always been extremely close to Saddam Hussein, even sending Palestinian Liberation Army units to help torture Kuwaitis in 1991). Also included were the pro-Iraqi Arab Liberation Front, and, since April 2002, al Qaeda.

Significantly, this same crosscut of Islamist terrorist groups presently exists in the United States -- although here they function "only" as fund-raising, propaganda, recruitment and sleeper-cell operatives. Al Qaeda's hatred of the United States has very little to do with American support for Israel. If Israel ceased to exist, its enmity for this country would continue unabated. This is because the United States is seen as the superpower leader of liberal democracy, wielding the ability to check al Qaeda's dream of a new global Caliphate. The unforgivable "sin" of American ties to "apostates and criminals" who rule in such Muslim countries as Egypt, the Emirates, Jordan, Kuwait, Pakistan and Saudi Arabia elicits the same implacable wrath as American support for Israel because both linkages weave a network of opposition to al Qaeda expansion.

Joint Palestinian-al Qaeda teams are planning coordinated mega-terror strikes against Israel and America. Simultaneously, a fight is taking shape among the major ideological factions of radical Islam. It follows that both Israel and the United States should immediately cease any and all assistance to the Hamas-controlled Palestinian Authority. Above all, it is time for Washington to stop sending American tax dollars to support archenemies of the United States.

Pakistani Says Concessions Could Produce Kashmir Pact (NYT)

By Somini Sengupta

The New York Times, December 6, 2006

NEW DELHI, Dec. 5 — The Pakistani president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, said in an Indian television program broadcast Tuesday that Islamabad could accept a solution to the festering dispute over Kashmir if New Delhi were to agree to greater autonomy and gradual demilitarization in the Indian-controlled swath of the territory.

“Inherently, both sides have to give up their positions,” he said in an interview with NDTV, a private television channel, according to a partial transcript of the interview on the station’s Web site.

General Musharraf’s comments are not entirely new. He has floated the idea of a Kashmir solution that makes borders “irrelevant” and gives the people of Kashmir self-rule, even as it keeps the two sides of Kashmir under the official territorial control of the two countries.

The remarks do signal, however, that even as official peace talks yield virtually no breakthroughs, the areas of disagreement between the rivals could well be shrinking.

Amitabh Matoo, the vice chancellor of the University of Jammu and a longtime observer of India-Pakistan negotiations, said General Musharraf’s comments had reflected “new flexibility in Pakistan’s Kashmir policy.”

“Clearly the back channels, which are active, have considerable space now to work with and arrive at, hopefully, a reconciliation of the two positions,” he said.

On what to do with the de facto border, the Line of Control, which divides the Indian- and Pakistani-controlled parts of Kashmir, no longer is there a sharp gulf in opinion. Prime Minister Manmohan Singh of India has also hinted at the notion of a soft border, one that would allow families to continue to cross with little hindrance, even as he has repeatedly articulated the traditional Indian line. In short, the map of India, which includes Kashmir, would not be redrawn.

Nor is there major disagreement over the idea of greater self-rule by Kashmiris on both sides. The sticky part is how to do it.

General Musharraf called for what the NDTV transcript called “a joint supervision mechanism” across the Line of Control. India is unlikely to accept anything like a joint Kashmiri provincial administration, on the grounds that it would dilute Indian claims over its portion of the province.

According to one person familiar with the proceedings of the closed-door talks, who was not authorized to speak publicly on the matter, India could be open to a “joint institutional mechanism” to regulate certain interstate issues like transportation, water and environmental management.

As for demilitarization, General Musharraf has repeatedly called on New Delhi to reduce the number of troops from its side of Kashmir, a demand that has met with an Indian retort to reduce the anti-Indian militant violence from across the border.

Hasan-Askari Rizvi, an independent political analyst in Lahore, saw both domestic and international motivation behind General Musharraf’s comments. At home, Mr. Rizvi said, General Musharraf faces elections next year and would want to present himself as the architect of a new India-Pakistan accord.

“If India rejects his ideas straight away, Musharraf can show to the international community, especially the U.S., that India’s inflexibility is the major obstacle to conflict resolution between the two countries,” he said.

Kashmir is their principal point of disagreement, the heart of two of the three wars fought since their violent synchronized births in 1947.

Pakistan has insisted on a plebiscite to allow Kashmiris to choose between joining India or Pakistan.

At least on Kashmir’s future, there is one area of agreement. “We are against independence,” General Musharraf said. So too, he pointed out, is India.

India Nuclear Bill To Be On President's Desk This Week: Frist (AFP)

AFP, December 6, 2006

US Senate leader Bill Frist assured India's Prime Minister Manmohan Singh that a major US-India nuclear energy bill is on track for completion this week.

"I spoke today by telephone with Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh regarding the pending legislation to authorize civil nuclear cooperation between the United States and India," Frist said.

"I assured Prime Minister Singh that one of my top priorities for the remainder of this Congress is to enact this legislation, and I told him I am confident that we will be able to complete congressional action on it this week," he said.

The Republican senator, in his final week in Congress after choosing not to stand for reelection, praised the groundbreaking US-India Civil Nuclear Cooperation bill, separate versions of which were approved in House and Senate.

Frist said negotiators from the two houses are at work merging the legislation into one streamlined bill, and expect to be able to send the bill to President George W. Bush this week for signing.

"The enactment of this legislation will lead to a much more friendly and robust relationship between the United States and India. I told him we share that objective and are working hard to produce legislation that would help our two nations achieve it," Frist said.

The Republican leader said that Singh expressed reservations about several provisions in the bills that are problematic for the Indian government because they depart from the understanding he reached with Bush in July 2005.

Frist said he assured the Indian leader that his concerns would be dealt with, saying that he has named himself to be one of the negotiators on the bill "in order to be able to participate personally in the process of refining the legislation."

Gedi: Somalia Troops Prepared For War (AP)

By Chris Tomlinson

AP, December 6, 2006

Somalia's troops are ready for an imminent and inevitable war with the Islamic militia that has taken over much of the country and surrounded the internationally backed government, the country's prime minister said.

Somali Prime Minister Ali Gedi told The Associated Press he believed the most radical leaders within the Islamic movement were in control and would not take peace talks seriously. The Islamic movement has overrun much of Somalia, including the capital, in recent months, increasingly sidelining the weak government and vowing to bring Islamic law to the whole country.

The radicals within the movement "are the decision makers now," Gedi said in the interview late Monday. "Those who believe that the situation in Somalia will be solved through dialogue and talks are wrong."

But he said his government will continue to take part in all peace efforts while preparing to defend itself against attacks by the Council of Islamic Courts, as the movement that has taken over most of southern Somalia is known.

"We have already mobilized our forces, we have trained a few thousand troops, they are ready," Gedi said during a visit to Ethiopia's capital. Ethiopia has backed Gedi's government, angering the Islamic movement which sees it as interference from Somalia's traditional rival.

Somali's rainy season is coming to an end and roads will be passable again for military vehicles in the next two weeks, he added.

The United States has said the Islamic movement has links to al-Qaida, an accusation Islamic leaders have repeatedly denied.

Gedi said the Islamic forces included more than 3,000 foreign fighters, echoing similar statements made by a U.N. panel investigating violations of an arms embargo that has been in place since 1992, when the last effective central government in Somalia collapsed.

Gedi's government is the 14th attempt to restore the rule of law in Somalia. But his parliament and Cabinet, made up of former warlords and civic leaders, has struggled to expand out of Baidoa, a key town 150 miles northwest of Mogadishu.

From within this power vacuum, a disparate group of Islamic leaders have banded together to create the Council of Islamic Courts, driving out warlords and installing clerical rule in the areas it now controls.

The militia declared itself in control of the southern town of Dinsor on Saturday, a seizure that effectively surrounds the weak, transitional government in its fortified base in Baidoa.

The international community has sponsored several rounds of peace talks to bring Gedi's government and the courts together. Gedi pointed out that after each round of talks, the Islamic courts returned to Mogadishu and dispatched troops to capture additional territory, despite promises to stop their expansion.

Ethiopia, a largely Christian country that fears the possible rise of Islamic fundamentalism on its borders, has acknowledged sending military advisers to Baidoa and has trained Somali troops to protect the government.

Gedi said several thousand Somali troops recently trained and equipped in Ethiopia had arrived and would able to defend Baidoa. The government has so far intentionally avoided any direct confrontation with the Islamic courts.

A confidential U.N. report recently obtained by The Associated Press said there were up to 8,000 Ethiopian troops in the country supporting the government. Ethiopia's parliament has authorized military action if attacked by the Islamic movement, which has declared holy war on Ethiopia over its troop incursions.

The U.N. report said Ethiopia's regional rival, Eritrea, had 2,000 troops in the country backing the Islamic movement, raising the specter of Eritrea and Ethiopia fighting a proxy war in Somalia.

On Friday, the United States introduced a U.N. resolution to partially lift the arms embargo on Somalia to allow for regional peacekeepers.

U.S. officials say that by providing the government with peacekeepers, the Islamic courts will have a greater incentive to pursue peace talks, rather than a military solution.

Gedi said his government needs international support in order to survive against what he calls the terrorist forces within the Islamic courts. He said the draft resolution should allow any country to provide troops to protect his government.

He said recent suicide bombings in Baidoa were contrary to Somali culture and proof that foreign fighters had come to Somalia.

"Suicide bombings was transferred to Somalia from elsewhere," Gedi said. "It will not stop in Somalia, it will spread out."

The United States has issued a travel advisory for Somalia's neighbors Kenya and Ethiopia, warning that extremists in Somalia could launch suicide attacks in those countries.

Rebels Threaten To Withdraw Peace Deal (AP)

By Alfred De Montesquiou

AP, December 6, 2006

The only Darfur rebel group to sign a peace agreement with the government threatened Tuesday to pull out from the deal if Khartoum-backed militias continue to attack civilians in the troubled region.

The ultimatum from Minni Minawi, head of the main branch of the Sudan Liberation Movement, came a day after the pro-government janjaweed paramilitary looted the central market in El Fasher, the capital of North Darfur, and clashed with SLM fighters, killing at least two.

The United Nations evacuated staff and international aid workers from El Fasher "as a result of increased janjaweed presence in the town and armed movements in the area," said Radhia Achouri, the spokeswoman for the U.N. mission in Sudan.

African Union peacekeepers warned that El Fasher could be attacked within the next day, saying they had reports that a coalition of rebel groups planned to launch an offensive to drive the janjaweed out of the town.

The AU force in Darfur said its headquarters — located in El Fasher — "could be a target" of the possible rebel attack.

DOJ_NMG_0103108

The Khartoum government is accused of unleashing the janjaweed militias, made up of Arab nomads, to help put down ethnic African Darfur rebels who rose up in 2003. The janjaweed are blamed in widespread atrocities against civilians.

More than 200,000 people have been killed in Darfur and another 2.5 million have been driven from their homes. Violence has only increased since the government and the SLM signed the Darfur Peace Agreement in May, which other rebel groups refused to accept.

"The government must disarm and neutralize the janjaweed by the end of this month," Minawi told The Associated Press. "Otherwise a bridge will be crossed, and no one knows what will happen," he said.

He did not say what steps the SLM would take if the government did not meet the deadline, but his spokesman suggested the group could pull out of the Darfur peace deal — a step that could lead to the collapse of the fragile agreement on which the United Nations and others have pinned hopes for bringing peace to the region.

The African Union warned that the National Redemption Front, a coalition of rebels who rejected the peace accord, was reportedly planning an assault on El Fasher along with other factions including some of Minawi's men.

Khartoum has opposed a U.N.-brokered deal for a joint mission of some 20,000 U.N. and African peacekeepers to deploy in Darfur.

The government denies backing the janjaweed, but agreed to disarm them as part of the Darfur peace accord. Observers however, say Khartoum instead reinforced the militia.

Top U.N. officials say janjaweed backed by the army have recently increased their attacks throughout Darfur and are specifically targeting civilians, including children.

Russia Won't OK Extradition In Spy Case (AP)

By Vladimir Isachenkov

AP, December 6, 2006

The top prosecutor said Tuesday that Moscow will not extradite possible Russian suspects to Britain in the poisoning of the former KGB agent Alexander Litvinenko and warned that British detectives would not be allowed to carry out interrogations in Russia.

Prosecutor General Yuri Chaika said that under Russian law, a Russian citizen who is accused of committing a crime abroad must face trial at home. "If they want to arrest citizens of the Russian Federation, it would be impossible because of the Russian Constitution," he told reporters.

Litvinenko, 43, died Nov. 23 in London, and toxicologists found the radioactive isotope polonium-210 in his body. On his deathbed, Litvinenko blamed President Vladimir Putin for the poisoning. The Kremlin has vehemently denied the accusations.

Putin met Tuesday with Italian Foreign Minister Massimo D'Alema, who had pledged to press Moscow about Litvinenko's poisoning, but neither man mentioned the case in their public remarks.

Chaika said his office would fully cooperate with a team of Scotland Yard investigators who arrived in Moscow on Monday to collect information on Litvinenko's death.

However, he said that all figures in the case would be questioned by Russian prosecutors in the presence of the visiting British officers. "It is we who are doing all the interrogating. They only attend that, it cannot be otherwise" in Russia, Chaika said.

The prosecutor also confirmed that Andrei Lugovoi, a former Russian agent who met with Litvinenko in London on Nov. 1 — the day Litvinenko fell ill — has been hospitalized.

Chaika said the British officers could be allowed to visit Lugovoi and listen to his interrogation by Russian prosecutors, if doctors permit it.

"He's being treated in a hospital," the prosecutor said. "Everything will depend on the doctors' opinion. If doctors allow a conversation with him, he will be questioned."

Lugovoi told the ITAR-Tass news agency that he was undergoing tests for possible radiation contamination, and the results would be ready in a few days.

He said he was prepared to answer the British investigators' questions.

"I intend to fully satisfy their interest and am waiting for an invitation from the law enforcement organs," he was quoted as saying. "Once I give all the necessary testimony to the law enforcement organs, I intend to publicly put an end to (speculation) about my supposed involvement in this story."

Lugovoi went to London in the month before Litvinenko's death and met with Litvinenko four times, according to Russian media. He said Litvinenko had contacted him about a year ago with some business proposals, and that they had met intermittently in London since then.

Chaika refused to say how many people British investigators hoped would be questioned in the case.

He said Mikhail Trepashkin, a former security service officer who is serving a four-year prison sentence for divulging state secrets, was not part of the initial British request and that British investigators would not be allowed to talk to him.

Trepashkin has claimed in a letter that he had warned Litvinenko several years ago about a government-sponsored death squad that intended to kill him and other Kremlin opponents.

Chaika dismissed the allegation, adding, "we aren't obliged to react to any stupidity."

He also shrugged off questions about the possible questioning of officials from the Federal Security Service, a KGB successor agency which some observers have accused of involvement in Litvinenko's death.

"Why should FSB officials be questioned? Why not question everyone here?" Chaika said, using the Russian acronym for the agency.

He also rejected allegations that the polonium-210 that poisoned Litvinenko could have been smuggled from Russia.

"It couldn't happen here," he said, adding that two Russian plants mentioned in the British media as possible sources of the polonium-210 do not produce it.

"It's all sheer nonsense," Chaika said of the allegations.

The case has strained already tense relations between Russia and Britain, which infuriated the Kremlin by giving asylum to Russian tycoon and Kremlin critic Boris Berezovsky, Chechen rebel envoy Akhmed Zakayev and Litvinenko, a former Federal Security Service officer.

Chaika dismissed suggestions that Russia could trade suspects in Litvinenko's murder for Berezovsky and Zakayev. He said British authorities, who have rejected Russian requests for their extradition, eventually would have to change their decision.

Russia Restricts U.K. Inquiry Of Spy Poisoning, Adding To Tensions (WSJ)

By Alan Cullison And Guy Chazan In Moscow And Carrick Mollenkamp In London

The Wall Street Journal, December 6, 2006

Scotland Yard's effort to solve the mysterious poisoning of a former Russian spy has added to mounting political tensions between Russia and the West, as Moscow placed limits on the international investigation.

Alexandar Litvinenko, a critic of the Kremlin, died Nov. 23 in London after ingesting a radioactive substance, polonium 210, triggering a massive investigation. Britain's home secretary, John Reid, recently said the probe would lead wherever necessary for the case to be solved.

But a day after investigators from London's Metropolitan Police, as Scotland Yard is formally known, arrived in Moscow to pursue their probe, Yuri Chaika, Russia's prosecutor general, set clear limits on their reach.

He said only Russian police would be able to question suspects, though British police can listen. He said no Russian could be brought to the United Kingdom for questioning or trial since the two countries have no extradition treaty. He ruled out questioning leaders at the FSB, Russia's state security service. "Why question the FSB leadership?" Mr. Chaika said. "We'll end up having to question everyone in Russia."

Mr. Litvinenko and his backers attributed the poisoning to his criticisms of the Kremlin. The Kremlin denies involvement.

British police haven't named any suspects. A person familiar with the probe said Scotland Yard won't be able to directly charge that any responsibility lies in Russia. Instead, the police are likely to seek softer information such as travel details to piece together Mr. Litvinenko's movements before he fell ill on Nov. 1. A Scotland Yard spokeswoman declined to comment.

Another former Russian spy British officials were keen to interview has been hospitalized in Moscow to be tested for possible radioactive contamination. The ex-spy, Andrei Lugovoi, was one of two people who met with Mr. Litvinenko Nov. 1 at a London hotel bar. Mr. Lugovoi said in an interview yesterday that he had told Scotland Yard he intended to cooperate. But Mr. Chaika said Mr. Lugovoi could now only be interviewed with permission from his doctors.

The Kremlin has provided assurances that it plans to cooperate with the British. The U.K. Foreign and Commonwealth Office said Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett met with her Russian counterpart Friday and that the Russian authorities pledged cooperation.

Still, Russia's response to Mr. Litvinenko's death is raising concerns. "It is my view...that the Russian side also must make its contribution" in clearing up the case, said German Chancellor Angela Merkel. And French President Jacques Chirac, meeting with Ms. Merkel in Germany, said Russia "must provide perfectly transparent cooperation."

Russia's relations with the West have cooled dramatically in the past several years as the Kremlin has become more assertive abroad and Western criticism of Kremlin domestic policies has sharpened. In one high-profile sign of friction, Moscow has continually frustrated Washington's efforts to impose tighter sanctions on Iran to curb that country's nuclear program.

Russia's efforts to convert its vast oil and gas resources into political capital have raised tensions and spurred European governments to look for alternative fuel sources. The Kremlin's efforts to pressure neighboring governments it views as unfriendly and support those it sees as allies have provoked harsh reactions in Europe and the U.S.

Italy's foreign minister, Massimo D'Alema, said after meeting with Russian President Vladimir Putin yesterday that he had received assurances that Russia was "open to cooperating" with British authorities and with prosecutors in Rome, who also are probing the activities of Mario Scaramella. Mr. Scaramella, an Italian security consultant who has tested positive for traces of polonium 210, lunched with Mr. Litvinenko the day he fell ill. Mr. D'Alema said Mr. Putin warned him that the case shouldn't be "politicized."

The U.K. also is home to some of Mr. Putin's fiercest critics and Russia has shown increasing frustration about Britain's reluctance to return some to Russia, including Russian businessman Boris Berezovsky, whom the Russian government alleges has committed financial crimes.

Indeed, Russia's state-run television began its prime-time newscast last night by saying that Russia had amassed enough evidence against British transplants Mr. Berezovsky and Akhmed Zakayev, an alleged terrorist, to prosecute them, but that Britain wouldn't extradite them to Russia. The newscast didn't specify their alleged crimes.

British Police Begin Investigating Poisoning Case In Moscow (NYT)

By Andrew E. Kramer

The New York Times, December 6, 2006

MOSCOW, Dec. 5 — As the British police investigating the poisoning of a former Russian spy began forensic work in Moscow on Tuesday, Russia's prosecutor general laid down strict ground rules and said no Russians would be extradited to Britain to stand trial, signaling the tension the case has created between the countries.

Beyond that, Scotland Yard investigators may not have an opportunity to question a key witness, a former K.G.B. agent who had tea with the poisoned man, Alexander V. Litvinenko, on the day he became sick, because that former agent has checked into a hospital for radiation tests himself.

"This will depend on his doctors," Yuri Y. Chaika, the prosecutor general, said at a news conference. "If the doctors say that they can talk to him, then I think he will be questioned."

The British authorities are investigating what has been classified as a "suspicious death," not a murder. So far they have not identified any suspects they want extradited.

For Russian law enforcement, the investigation has been a delicate one because President Vladimir V. Putin was blamed for the poisoning by Mr. Litvinenko on his deathbed in London, according to his family. The Kremlin spokesman has called the allegations nonsense.

The Russian authorities are striking a balance between cooperation and criticism of the investigation, which is causing a strain in relations between Russia and Britain.

In a sign of the widening scandal in Europe, Chancellor Angela Merkel of Germany and President Jacques Chirac of France, meeting in Mettlach, Germany, urged Russia on Tuesday to cooperate with the British investigators, who arrived in Moscow on Monday.

"It is my view that everything must be done, that the Russian side also must make its contribution, that clearing this up be supported," Mrs. Merkel was quoted by The Associated Press as saying.

The British forensic team will be allowed to be present while the Russian police question other witnesses, Mr. Chaika said, but they will have no formal authority to compel witnesses to meet with them.

"We will do the interviewing and they can only be present during the questioning," Mr. Chaika said. "Of course, they can ask us for permission to conduct interviews, which we may or may not grant."

A spokesman for the British Embassy said he could not discuss the ground rules for the investigation.

The crucial witness, Andrei K. Lugovoi, is a retired spy who owns a private security company and a brewery that makes mead, or honey wine, and other traditional Russian beverages. He met with Mr. Litvinenko in London on Nov. 1.

Mr. Lugovoi said Friday that he had been cleared of any traces of radiation, telling the newspaper Kommersant that he was "absolutely clean," but he returned for repeat tests late Sunday, his lawyer said, just before the British investigators arrived. He denied any involvement in the poisoning, in a radio interview in Moscow on Nov. 24, and has met once with British Embassy officials.

Mr. Lugovoi said Tuesday that the British team had not called him this week. "My secretary called Scotland Yard and left all my contact numbers," he said, according to the Interfax news agency. "So far I haven't had any calls from anyone."

Russia's early refusal to extradite suspects is in keeping with a wider extradition problem between the countries, as Britain has resisted Russia's efforts to extradite a billionaire fugitive, Boris A. Berezovsky.

Also, Russia will not cooperate in tracing the origins of the radioactive polonium 210, Mr. Chaika said. Russia exports the metal, but it is also made in other countries. "A criminal case has been opened in Britain," Mr. Chaika said. "Let them determine the origin of this polonium." <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

Moscow Restricts British Police Investigating Ex-Spy's Death (WP)

By Peter Finn And Mary Jordan

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

MOSCOW, Dec. 5 -- British detectives visiting Russia to investigate the poisoning death of a former Russian intelligence officer in London will face broad restrictions in their work here, a senior Russian official said Tuesday.

Prosecutor General Yury Chaika said his subordinates, not the British, would conduct any interrogations. He ruled out the extradition of possible suspects who are Russian citizens and said British investigators could not meet an imprisoned lawyer and former officer in the FSB, a successor agency of the KGB, who claims to have vital information.

A key witness checked into a hospital Tuesday, raising questions about when, and whether, investigators from Scotland Yard would be able to see him.

Some British politicians quickly criticized the restrictions. "If they don't allow access, the world at large will wonder, why not?" lawmaker David Davis, a leading member of the opposition Conservative Party, said in an interview. But he cautioned that it was too early to know exactly how much cooperation British investigators would get.

At a news conference in Moscow, Chaika smacked down any notion that the British police could go wherever their investigation leads them, as British Home Secretary John Reid put it in London on Sunday. Even allowing for the normal sensitivities in any country about allowing foreign police on home turf, Chaika was unequivocal in mapping out the secondary function of his British counterparts.

"They may participate with our consent, and we might also withhold our consent," said Chaika, whose position is equivalent to that of attorney general.

Several British detectives flew into Moscow on Monday night to probe any Russian connection to the Nov. 1 poisoning of Alexander Litvinenko with polonium-210. The radioactive isotope brought on the former domestic security officer's death Nov. 23 after a slow and gruesome deterioration in his condition.

Litvinenko, 43, was part of a London circle of Russian exiles fiercely critical of Russian President Vladimir Putin. In a deathbed statement, Litvinenko accused the Kremlin of ordering his killing, a charge that authorities here labeled baseless and absurd.

Among those the British had planned to interview is Andrei Lugovoy, a Russian entrepreneur and former KGB officer who met with Litvinenko in a bar at the Millennium Hotel in London the day of the poisoning.

Lugovoy spoke to officials at the British Embassy in Moscow and denied any involvement in the poisoning. His attorney, Andrei Romashov, said he was tested last week for radiation contamination and got a clean bill of health at a Moscow clinic. But the Russian newspaper Kommersant, quoting the attorney, said Lugovoy had checked into a hospital with his wife and three children, who were with him in London, for fresh tests.

"I cannot say if he's ready to meet with the British investigators," Romashov said.

British police are also interested in meeting with Dmitry Kovtun, a business consultant, and Vyacheslav Sokolenko, who heads an association of security agencies. Both men also met Litvinenko at the Millennium Hotel with Lugovoy.

The British also want to meet with Mikhail Trepashkin, a former FSB officer who is serving a four-year sentence on charges of divulging state secrets. Trepashkin, like Litvinenko, had investigated a series of apartment bombings in Russia in 1999 that were among the triggers for a second war between Russian forces and separatists in the southern republic of Chechnya.

Trepashkin accused his former colleagues in the security services of organizing the bombings. Human rights groups including Amnesty International have expressed concern that he was prosecuted to stop his unsanctioned inquiry.

Trepashkin's lawyers released a letter in which the prisoner asserted that the FSB had created a list of people, including Litvinenko, who should be assassinated, and he requested a meeting with the British, saying he had relevant information about the case.

A spokesman for the Russian prison system told the Russian news agency Interfax that such a meeting would not happen. "The Federal Penitentiary Service will not allow a person convicted for divulging state secrets to remain a source of information for representatives of foreign special services," the spokesman said.

Chaika ridiculed the idea. "Seven hundred thousand people are prisoners as Trepashkin is, let's interrogate 400,000 of them, what if they tell something," he said.

A prison administrator filed a request with a Russian court Tuesday asking that Trepashkin be transferred to a more secure prison, Interfax reported.

Lynne Featherstone, a member of the British Parliament who said Litvinenko was one of her constituents, said there is so much speculation in the case that Russia should fully cooperate to "lift the cloud."

"Nothing is solved by leaving it in the dark," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0103112

Chaika also said any suspects would be tried in Russia. Extradition has long been a touchy subject between London and Moscow. British courts have refused to hand over Boris Berezovsky, an exiled Russian tycoon who clashed with Putin, and Akhmed Zakayev, a Chechen separatist who received asylum in Britain. Both men were close associates of Litvinenko.

"The British side will sooner or later be forced to extradite them, because every day there is more and more evidence that they have committed crimes," Chaika said. "This is actually a case where there are political motives for their non-extradition."

Chris Bryant, a Labor Party member of the British Parliament, said in an interview that "I think there is a feeling in Russia that we are behaving outrageously" by not extraditing Berezovsky and others wanted by Russia, but that a judge had ruled those prosecutions were politically motivated.

Key Suspect In Poisoning Case Is Hospitalized (LAT)

By David Holley

The Los Angeles Times, December 6, 2006

MOSCOW — Russia's chief prosecutor said Tuesday that a key potential suspect in the poisoning death of dissident former KGB agent Alexander Litvinenko has been hospitalized, and that British investigators would be allowed to see him only if doctors grant approval.

Prosecutor General Yuri Chaika also said that Russia's constitution forbids extradition of citizens, and that if any Russian suspects are identified in the case, they would not be sent to Britain and could only be tried in Russia. Despite earlier top-level pledges of Russian cooperation, he indicated that British investigators may face formidable obstacles in pursuing leads in Russia.

Felllow former KGB agent Andrei Lugovoy, who met with Litvinenko in London on the day he is believed to have been radioactively poisoned, had previously expressed willingness to speak to investigators. On Tuesday, however, a man answering Lugovoy's cellphone said that it was not clear "whether and when he will be able to talk" to investigators or how long he would stay in the hospital. The man, who identified himself as an aide named Alexander, said he was not authorized to comment on the nature of Lugovoy's hospitalization. Chaika said he believed Lugovoy was "undergoing medical treatment" but said nothing about the nature of his illness.

In a statement written shortly before his death Nov. 23, Litvinenko blamed Russian President Vladimir V. Putin for his poisoning, a charge the Kremlin has angrily dismissed. Litvinenko also told friends he believed that Lugovoy might have been the person who poisoned him.

Chaika, speaking at a news conference, said that the questioning of witnesses and potential suspects would be carried out by Russians in the presence of British investigators, who arrived here Monday. He left it unclear whether the British would be allowed to ask any questions.

"They will not interrogate anyone," he said early in the news conference. Later he appeared to modify that statement with an indication that British investigators might be allowed to ask some questions, with permission, on a case-by-case basis.

"We interrogate and they are present. They interrogate in our presence," he said. "We should perform those investigative actions and they can take part in this with our permission. We may even deny them the right to take part. But we will do this together with them. We want them to take part."

The prosecutor's office has not launched an investigation of its own into the case, and will simply assist the British, Chaika said.

An Italian security consultant, Mario Scaramella, also met Litvinenko on Nov. 1, the probable day of his poisoning with radioactive polonium-210. Scaramella, who authorities say also has a "significant quantity" of polomium-210 in his body, has said he asked to meet Litvinenko after receiving an e-mail suggesting that people who were behind the recent unsolved slaying of Russian journalist Anna Politkovskaya were preparing to strike against Litvinenko and himself.

Officials in London said they recognized that Russia is one of several nations that adoes not extradite its citizens for criminal prosecutions. A spokesman for the Home Office, who spoke under standard condition of anonymity, said that should a Russian citizen commit an offense in Britain, there are procedures for trying the case in Russia.

British Home Secretary John Reid, speaking Monday in Brussels, Belgium, said the investigation "will proceed as normal, whatever the diplomatic or ... wider considerations."

The Kremlin has pledged to cooperate in the investigation, he said. But analysts said Chaika's comments did not seem to indicate there would be full cooperation.

"The main message Chaika sent to the world today is that there are powerful forces within the Russian political elite which are not interested in an objective investigation of the Litvinenko murder and are not interested in allowing the people who may well be implicated in that crime, like Andrei Lugovoy, for instance, to say something to the British investigators that they shouldn't," said Stanislav Belkovsky, president of the National Strategy Institute, a Moscow think tank.

Valery Fyodorov, director of the All-Russian Center for Public Opinion Study, said that "the last thing the Russian authorities want now is to look like accomplices in that crime."

"Matters of image are very important for Russia and President Putin, and of course he is willing to help dispel the current gross suspicions in the West," he said. "I think that if Scotland Yard representatives happen to claim that they haven't been given due support here in Russia, that may result in the Russian authorities giving Russian law enforcement an additional push and shove."

Belkovsky said that some British and Italian newspapers have reported that documents Scaramella gave Litvinenko identified Igor Vlasov, 46, as an assassin who had come to London to kill people identified as "enemies of the Russian people."

Vlasov's current whereabouts are unknown and there is some question whether such a person exists.

Vlasov, according to the reports, was a former Russian special services officer who speaks excellent Portuguese.

The Soviet Union had a major presence in the former Portuguese colony of Angola during the 1980s.

Putin's deputy chief of staff, Igor Sechin, 46, who is seen as leader of the hard-line Kremlin faction called the siloviki, or "powerful ones," comes from a KGB background and also speaks Portuguese, Belkovsky said.

"I don't believe in this as a pure coincidence," he said. If Igor Vlasov is a real person and has something to do with the case, it is possible that "coming from the same background and age groups, Sechin and Vlasov may have served together in Angola and they may still have some firm ties," he said.

It is also possible, he said, that "someone is interested in implicating Sechin.

Prime Minister: Kiev No Pawn Of Russia Or West (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, December 6, 2006

Ukraine will reject any effort to be used as a pawn in any struggle for influence between Russia and the West, Ukrainian Prime Minister Viktor Yanukovych said yesterday at the end of a two-day visit to Washington.

But Mr. Yanukovych, whom many in Washington fear is tilting away from the pro-Western reform alliance that spearheaded Ukraine's 2004 Orange Revolution, said his four-month-old government will not lobby strongly for membership in NATO in the face of weak popular support for the trans-Atlantic alliance inside Ukraine.

"Nobody is trying to push anyone anywhere" on NATO, Mr. Yanukovych said, speaking through an interpreter to a small group of reporters at a breakfast briefing. "People have to understand the benefits of this or any other security system."

The prime minister raised fresh doubts about his commitment to NATO when he declined to sign a nonbinding "membership action plan" on a September visit to Brussels. A poll released in Kiev yesterday said that about 75 percent of Ukrainians think Mr. Yanukovych is more likely to protect Russian business interests or those of his home region in eastern Ukraine over the interests of "average Ukrainian citizens."

President Viktor Yushchenko, the hero of the Orange Revolution, has strongly pushed a pro-NATO and pro-Western foreign-policy line. But he was forced to accept Mr. Yanukovych as prime minister after elections this year gave his defeated rival in the 2004 presidential campaign the biggest single bloc in parliament.

Mr. Yanukovych held low-key talks with Vice President Dick Cheney and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on his visit, his first to the United States since taking office in August. Topics in the talks included Ukraine's World Trade Organization bid, energy security and domestic reforms in Ukraine.

Mr. Yanukovych told reporters his government was a vast improvement over the faction-ridden team installed by Mr. Yushchenko immediately after the Orange Revolution.

"Beautiful slogans should always be followed by actions," he said. The new unified government "allows for a foreign and domestic policy where we can be 100 percent sure of implementation."

But the infighting clearly goes on in Kiev.

Mr. Yushchenko yesterday voided a parliamentary vote to fire Foreign Minister Borys Tarasyuk, a chief architect of his pro-Western foreign agenda. Mr. Yanukovych's allies hold virtually all of the other Cabinet posts, but Mr. Yushchenko argued the country's constitution gave him final say on foreign policy.

Mr. Yanukovych declined to criticize recent anti-democratic moves by Russian President Vladimir Putin, noting that Russia is Ukraine's biggest trading partner and the critical supplier of its energy needs.

"President Putin defends the interests of Russia. The way he does -- the Russian people can assess that," Mr. Yanukovych said.

"The most important thing is that Ukraine should not be allied with Russia against the United States and the European Union or vice versa," he said. "We are not going to conduct such a policy."

Europe Is Giving Global Economy A Surprise Boost Amid U.S. Lull (WSJ)

By Marcus Walker

The Wall Street Journal, December 6, 2006

BERLIN -- Europe's economy is firing on all cylinders after years of feeble growth, helping to sustain global expansion as the U.S. economy slows and surprising many economists who doubted the Continent could muster enough demand to break its reliance on exports.

Europe's economic recovery was ignited by rising exports, but it is now spreading to investment, job creation and consumer spending. While some countries around Europe's edges have performed well for years, including the United Kingdom and the Nordic countries, prolonged stagnation in its heartland -- the 12-nation euro currency area dominated by Germany, France and Italy -- earned Europe a reputation rivaling Japan's as the world's economic laggard.

Euro-zone gross domestic product is on course to grow by 2.7% this year, unspectacular by recent U.S. standards but a big improvement on the 1.4% growth the euro zone averaged the previous five years. Even though a U.S. slowdown, a strengthening euro and looming tax increases in Germany could brake euro-zone growth next year, most forecasters still expect an expansion of around 2%. By Europe's lackluster standards, that's nothing short of a comeback -- and is good news for exporters and investors from the U.S. and Asia.

"There is no new miracle in Europe. This recovery is overdue," says Jean-Philippe Cotis, chief economist at the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, a Paris-based think tank. The long slowdown led anxious Europeans to save their incomes, Mr. Cotis says, creating pent-up demand that is now being unleashed as confidence gradually returns.

Europe's rebound still has flaws, which bolster arguments that structural changes are needed to realize any lasting gains. Much of the improvement this year has occurred in Germany, which is helping to buoy its neighbors after taking some painful steps, while many companies in France and Italy still struggle to cope with fierce global competition. Changes to labor laws and welfare systems prescribed by economists are low on government agendas because free-market measures remain unpopular.

But governments, companies and unions have made enough organic change to restore some of the Continent's lost dynamism. And better growth in the $10 trillion euro-zone economy means better growth in the 25-nation European Union, whose $14 trillion economy is about the same size as the U.S.'s and accounts for 30% of world GDP. (Twelve of the 25 EU nations use the euro.)

Europe's revival is reflected in the rising value of its currency, the euro, which at $1.33 is close to its highest level ever against the dollar -- $1.36 -- touched at the end of 2004. That partly reflects dollar weakness against many other currencies, but it is also because currency markets believe the European Central Bank in Frankfurt will continue raising interest rates against a backdrop of solid growth.

Germany, for years the sick man of Europe, has led the revival, reclaiming its place as the region's growth engine. Painful measures to boost efficiency and productivity put German companies -- especially makers of machine tools and other industrial equipment -- in a strong position to exploit the recent boom in global trade. While other euro-zone industries haven't restructured in the same way, they have also enjoyed rising exports amid the fastest pace of global growth in more than 30 years.

Rising corporate profits and a new optimism have led European companies to invest at home again, especially in Germany, where strenuous cost cutting has done much to compensate for high labor costs and stiff payroll taxes.

"It's fun to be an industrial entrepreneur in Germany at this time," says Jurgen Grossmann, owner of steel group Georgsmarienhutte. "The world wants our products. We have record order intakes. There is a renaissance in tangible goods."

Many German companies have found leeway in Germany's labor laws to improve productivity, and have been rewarded with rising profits. Machine-tool maker Trumpf Group, near Stuttgart, is typical of the thousands of midsize family-owned companies that make up the backbone of the world's third-largest national economy. After stagnant or falling sales earlier in the decade, Trumpf negotiated deals with its work force that allowed an extension of the workweek to near 40 hours from 35, with extra pay partly dependent on company profits, in exchange for job guarantees.

At the same time, Trumpf's export sales to fast-growing economies in Asia and Eastern Europe have rocketed. The firm is adding 450 workers to its 6,500 staff this year. Trumpf's investment spending is up 75% this year -- most of it in Germany, including a new laser factory.

"Our decision to invest in Germany rather than abroad hinged on the agreements with our workers. A 35-hour week is a joke. You can't compete internationally with that," says Nicola Leibinger-Kammüller, Trumpf's chief executive.

Total investment in Germany is set to grow by 5.8% this year, according to the OECD, up from 1% last year and declines in the four previous years. Revived investment has helped bring Germany's chronic unemployment below four million in November, from more than five million in January.

Germany still has a high jobless rate of 9.6%, and many formerly jobless people have found only low-paid, temporary or part-time work. But rising employment has allowed a modest recovery in consumer spending, which is expected to grow by around 0.8% this year after stagnating or shrinking since 2001.

Across the euro area, unemployment has fallen to 7.7%, according to the European Commission's standardized measure, from a peak exceeding 9% in 2004. Surveys show consumer confidence is increasing as fear of unemployment recedes.

The winners from higher investment in German industry include services providers with customers in the booming manufacturing sector. Frankfurt-based Commerzbank AG has recovered from years of heavy losses, bad loans and asset writedowns. After losing €2.3 billion ($3.06 billion) in 2003, it posted net profit of €1.2 billion in the first nine months of this year, and is even hiring 700 new customer advisers after laying off more than 7,000 employees in recent years.

SAP AG, Germany's largest software company, is also hiring. But it's doing so cautiously because German labor laws make it expensive to cut the work force when the business cycle dips. "Whenever you hire in an inflexible environment, you want to make sure you can keep these people for 10 or 20 years," says Chief Executive Henning Kagermann.

Investment is also improving in other European countries, but less markedly than in Germany. Companies in Italy, France and Spain haven't cut costs or jobs or raised productivity as aggressively as their German counterparts. Labor costs in Germany have fallen by nearly 1% a year on average since 2000, but have risen by nearly 4% a year in Italy in the same period, according to the European Commission, the EU's executive arm.

In Germany, the severity of the downturn and joblessness led to far-reaching concessions by unions on work rules. But unions in other euro-zone nations have resisted similar demands from employers.

"Some of the changes German industry has made -- for example, longer working periods -- are not realistic in Italy" in light of stiff union opposition, says Ernesto Greco, chief executive of Italian furniture maker Natuzzi SpA. It has built factories in Brazil, China and Romania recently, while trimming costs in Italy to cope with rising global competition.

Yet companies from other euro-zone nations are also exporting more, in part because Germany's $2.8 trillion economy is buying more goods from the rest of Europe as it grows.

"The recovery in Germany is lifting Italy and helping France," says Mr. Cotis, the OECD economist. In both countries, stronger exports are helping companies to raise investment.

Rising trade among European countries has helped to compensate for slower growth in exports to the rest of the world this year, allowing the euro zone to sustain its recovery even though the U.S. economy is slowing. "It's looking increasingly like Europe hasn't caught a cold from the U.S. sneezing," says Neville Hill, European economist at Credit Suisse in London. That's a break with the past when, if the U.S. economy caught a cold, Europe usually caught something worse.

Consumer spending hasn't improved as strongly as investment, but even here there are signs of improvement. Euro-zone consumption rose by 0.6% during the third quarter, helped by strong spending in Germany. In a sign of the retail market's gradual recovery, Europe's biggest retailer, Carrefour SA of France, recently announced a 7% rise in third-quarter sales, including more than 5% growth in France, where its megastores have struggled against fierce competition from discount chains in recent years.

But the robust outlook could still crumble if the euro rises further against the dollar into next year. The currency's appreciation is beginning to revive bad memories of 2003 and 2004, when a surging euro snuffed out embryonic upturns in the euro-zone economy.

"The impact was very bad in all industries competing with products made in the dollar area. My feeling is we will have a hard time in front of us," says Andrea Tomat, president of Italian sport-shoe maker Lotto Sport Italia SpA.

Other risks to Europe's revival include planned tax increases in Germany and Italy, whose governments are trying to rein in budget deficits to comply with EU fiscal rules. Germany's plan to raise its value-added tax -- equivalent to U.S. sales tax -- by three percentage points to 19% in January is causing particular worry, given the fragile confidence of German consumers. Most economists believe the increase will cause only a temporary drop in spending, but some point to the case of Japan, where a VAT rise in 1997 prolonged its economic stagnation.

Many economists caution against euphoria about Europe's improved growth. "It's an OK performance compared with the past few years, but nothing is firing tremendously," says Jean-Francois Mercier, an economist at Citigroup in London. "The problems haven't gone away, including structural rigidities and caution by many businesses which prefer to invest offshore rather than at home."

Europe's recovery is also uneven. While German industry is looking strong, consumer spending is still only growing weakly. In France, consumer spending has helped underpin GDP growth, but companies have been losing global market share while investment is growing more slowly than in past upturns.

Thanks to its continuing structural problems, the euro zone is able to sustain a growth rate of only around 2% a year without stoking inflation, the OECD estimates. The U.S. economy can sustain closer to 3%. More-flexible labor rules, more competition in markets for goods and services, and an overhaul of pension and health-care systems would help the euro zone to sustain faster growth, making it easier to cope with the future strains of an aging and eventually shrinking population.

"The case for structural reforms in Europe remains strong," says Mr. Cotis.

Immigration Fuels U.K. Growth (WSJ)

By Andrew Peaple

The Wall Street Journal, December 6, 2006

LONDON -- An influx of immigrant labor after the European Union expanded in 2004 has fueled a surge in the U.K. economy and is expected to prompt the government to announce today that growth this year will be faster than expected.

Chancellor of the Exchequer Gordon Brown, presenting his latest report to Parliament on the economy and public finances, will raise the growth forecast for gross domestic product to around 2.75%, from the 2.25% forecast in March, people familiar with the report say.

Mr. Brown last week said the faster growth trend was due at least in part to the wave of immigration that has washed over Britain. The government estimates that 600,000 people have moved to the U.K. from Central and Eastern Europe since the EU grew by 10 countries two years ago.

More than two-thirds have found jobs, increasing Britain's work force by 1.5% and adding new momentum to a U.K. economy already strengthened by a wave of privatization and deregulation in the 1980s and 1990s. The Centre for Economic and Business Research says migrant workers add £54 billion ($107 billion) a year to output, or around 5% of GDP.

Economists say the new output and domestic buying power have raised the country's economic "speed limit" -- the pace at which it can grow without generating inflation.

"This immigration has been a supply shock on a scale that I don't think we've seen in our history, and we don't have a good handle on its scale and the consequences," Confederation of British Industry Director-General Richard Lambert said in a recent interview.

Other EU countries, including Ireland and Sweden, have been similarly jolted by immigration flows, though not to the extent seen in Britain, which is equipped with a heavily service-based economy and liberal labor laws that help it absorb more jobs.

Spain's per-capita output would have fallen over the past decade, instead of rising 2.6% a year, without a population increase of two million due to immigration, says Andrew Milligan, head of global strategy at Standard Life Investments.

The ability to forecast extra revenue is a boon for any finance minister. For Mr. Brown, who is hoping to succeed Prime Minister Tony Blair next year, it is even more valuable. Extra immigration-related tax revenue could give him a deeper war chest for spending increases ahead of the next general election, due by 2010.

Indeed, Mr. Brown is expected to add to that war chest in Parliament today, people familiar with the matter say. They say he will raise taxes for airline passengers and motorists this week in a bid to show his environmental credentials ahead of the election.

The air-passenger tax is set to double, with the tax on an economy flight to Europe rising to £10 from £5, while the duty on a business or first-class flight will rise to £20 a person from £10, the people say. The size of the fuel-tax increase -- which will be the first since 2003 -- hasn't been decided, those people say.

Peter Spencer, chief adviser of economic-forecasting group the Ernst & Young ITEM Club, calculates that the U.K. treasury has received an extra £12 billion to £18 billion in tax revenue since 1998 from the influx of workers. And an upgrade to future output estimates means the chancellor can safely forecast higher tax revenue. A number of economists think the scale of immigration means potential economic growth could be as high as 3% to 3.25% a year.

The increase in the working population also has consequences for the Bank of England, as it considers whether to continue raising interest rates next year.

"A faster-growing labor force potentially raises the amount the economy can produce," said Rachel Lomax, the central bank's deputy governor, in a speech last week. "Rather like raising the economy's speed limit, it implies that it can grow faster without hitting supply constraints and generating inflationary pressure -- that may be the situation right now."

But immigration also comes at a social cost, driving up housing prices in London and other urban areas while also restraining wage growth in the services sector, which is good for inflation, but potentially frustrating for Britain's work force.

Recognizing those concerns, the British government is looking at ways to better manage the inflow. When Bulgaria and Romania join the EU next month the government will allow workers from those countries only gradual access to the labor market, limiting entrants to 20,000 a year.

While some economists see this as a bad move, given the boost to growth immigration has given so far, others see the pause as justified to take stock.

DOJ_NMG_0103117

"GDP per head also matters. The fact that overall GDP is rising is not in itself something that generates new wealth," says the Confederation of British Industry's Mr. Lambert, who is a former member of the Bank of England's rate-setting monetary-policy committee.

Fiji Under State Of Emergency After Government Is Toppled (WP/AP)

By Ray Lilley

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

SUVA, Fiji, Dec. 6 -- Fiji's military commander declared a state of emergency Wednesday, a day after he overthrew the elected government and brought international sanctions and censure that began to isolate the South Pacific country.

It was the nation's fourth coup in 20 years. Radio network Legend quoted a military statement saying that armed forces would set up checkpoints around Suva, the capital, as part of the state of emergency.

"As of 6 o'clock this evening, the military has taken over the government, has executive authority and the running of this country," Commodore Frank Bainimarama, the armed forces chief credited with resolving Fiji's last coup, said Tuesday in a nationally broadcast statement.

Prime Minister Laisenia Qarase, who insists he is still Fiji's legitimate leader, flew Wednesday from the capital to his home village on the remote, northeastern Lau Islands, said Pene Nonu, his private secretary.

The takeover, like the previous three coups, has its roots in the ethnic divide between the descendants of ancient Melanesian warrior tribes and those of Indian laborers brought by former colonial power Britain to work in sugar plantations.

In his declaration, Bainimarama justified seizing power to prevent legislation that favored indigenous Fijians, contending that the measures "would undermine the constitution and deny many citizens their rights."

Bainimarama said he had assumed some powers of the president and was using them to dismiss the prime minister.

The nation's last coup, in 2000, was led by indigenous nationalists who overthrew the country's first ethnic Indian prime minister. Bainimarama was widely regarded as a national hero after he stepped in, brokered a resolution without bloodshed and restored democracy, hand-picking Qarase, a former banker, to lead an interim government.

He also promised amnesty to coup participants but later reneged, and the ringleaders were arrested, tried and imprisoned for treason.

Bainimarama named Jona Senilagakali, a military medic with no political experience, as caretaker prime minister and said a full interim government would be appointed next week to see the country through elections that would restore democracy.

Rising Interest In Nuclear Power Brings New Life To Uranium Mining (WP)

By Craig Timberg

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

ARANDIS, Namibia -- This sandy little company town, with its tree-lined streets and concrete homes set amid a vast, forbidding desert, had all the signs of terminal decline just a few years back. Both banks closed. The only gas station shut off its pumps. And employable young men, realizing the bleak future of the giant uranium mine that gave Arandis life, began drifting away.

But something unexpected happened on the way to the funeral for Arandis: The nuclear industry, stagnant for two decades, reversed its fortunes at a time of rising oil prices and growing realization that burning fossil fuel caused global climate change. Nuclear went from being seen as a dirty source of energy to a comparatively clean, efficient one.

From that shift in perception, mainly in the minds of Westerners thousands of miles away, the fate of this remote African town went from doom to boom.

"The future was very dark," said the energetic mayor of Arandis, Daniel Muhuura, who like hundreds of residents here has spent his entire professional life working for Roessing Uranium Mine. "Now the future is very bright."

Dramatic turnarounds have happened across the continent as a quest for mineral riches, similar to the one that helped fuel the 19th century's "Scramble for Africa," has become a hot economic story of the decade. Decisions in boardrooms around the world have sent prices soaring for copper in Zambia, coltan in Congo and oil in Angola, Nigeria and Sudan.

From rising demand for these commodities, sub-Saharan Africa's economic growth has hit rates not seen in three decades.

Perhaps no renaissance, however, has matched that of the uranium industry's.

Roessing Uranium Mine opened in 1976 during nuclear power's heyday. But the Three Mile Island accident in 1979 and Chernobyl in 1986 caused a profound political backlash that nearly halted new reactor construction. Uncertainty about how to handle the dangerous radioactive waste created by nuclear power plants also contributed to its unpopularity.

By 2001, the price for uranium oxide had fallen to about $7 a pound, one-sixth of its peak. Two years later, facing massive losses, Roessing announced plans to close.

Under that plan, the mine was to cease operations in 2007 after having dug 1 billion tons of rock out of a jagged, bleached landscape often compared to the surface of the moon. Instead, oil prices soared and global warming became the stuff of newspaper headlines and Hollywood movies. Interest in building new nuclear reactors grew, and the price of uranium oxide rose to $62.50 a pound.

Roessing, which recently made its first delivery to an increasingly energy-hungry China, has decided to continue mining until at least 2016, mine officials say.

They expect to end this year with Roessing's first substantial profit, and tax bill to the Namibian government, in five years.

And the mine, whose workforce dropped from 3,800 in the 1970s to 860 last year, has begun hiring again.

"It is definitely a dramatic change," said company spokesman Rehabeam Hoveka. "It is good news for Arandis. It is good news for Namibia, too."

A second uranium mine, meanwhile, is slated to open nearby soon. Three others within 60 miles are in various stages of development. So where Arandis was once going to be a mining town without a mine, soon there could be five in the area.

The boom in uranium mining has caused grumbling from the tourism industry, which fears the loss of pristine landscapes, and environmentalists, who fear damage to the fragile biodiversity of the Namib, regarded as the driest and oldest desert in the world. Some environmentalists also are concerned about the renewed growth of an industry they still regard as dangerous despite industry claims of safety improvements since the Chernobyl disaster.

"They cannot tell us that they are safer than before," said Bertchen Kohrs, head of Earthlife Namibia, speaking from Windhoek, the capital. "It starts here with mining uranium, the whole cycle starts. Who says that some day we won't have to take back the nuclear waste here in Namibia?"

Roessing mine is a massive, dun-colored canyon two miles long, nearly a mile wide and more than 1,000 feet deep. From its lip, the giant dump trucks that haul uranium ore from the mine floor look like children's toys.

Several crushing machines pulverize the rock into sand, then powerful acids extract the traces of uranium. The end product, after processing, is a fine gray powder that leaves the mine in steel drums weighing 900 pounds. Mine officials say each holds as much potential energy as 40,000 barrels of oil.

All of Roessing's uranium oxide is used by civilian reactors, mine officials say, and is exported only to countries approved by the International Atomic Energy Agency.

The government of Iran owns 15 percent of Roessing, a legacy of early investment in the 1960s by the shah there. Mine officials say no shipment of uranium has ever been made to Iran, and the country has no right to the mine's product. Roessing's majority owner is Rio Tinto, a global mining conglomerate.

Officials in Arandis say they hope to use the unexpected revival of the mine to secure the future of their town, which already has, by African standards, an enviable infrastructure, including paved roads, a soccer stadium, a library, streetlights and steady sources of electricity and clean water. Two small clothing factories and a technical college provide some jobs not directly affiliated with the mine.

The banks have not resumed operations, but one recently opened a cash machine in Arandis, and work on a new gas station is to begin this month, said Muhuura, the mayor. With population on the rise again, the town recently made a deal with a builder to construct 50 homes.

The mine also has donated one of its dump trucks to Arandis, where it sits massively, with giant rubber wheels twice the height of most men, in the center of town. It is the first piece of what town officials hope is an eventual mining museum, part of the plan to help the town survive the next big downturn in uranium demand, whenever it comes.

"We want to turn around to show the world that this town will never be a ghost town," Muhuura said.

China's Sunshine Boys (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, December 6, 2006

So here's a little news quiz: Guess who's the seventh-richest man in China today, with a fortune estimated by Forbes magazine at $1.43 billion?

Answer: Shi Zhengrong. Now guess what he does. Real estate? No. Banking? No. Manufacturing for Wal-Mart? No. Construction? No.

Mr. Shi is China's leading maker of silicon photovoltaic solar cells, which convert sunlight into electricity. Yes, the seventh-richest man in China is a green entrepreneur! It should only happen in America.

Mr. Shi thinks, as I do, that renewable clean power — wind, solar, bio-fuels — is going to be the growth industry of the 21st century, and he wants to make sure that China and his company, Suntech Power Holdings, are the leaders. Only 43 years old and full of energy himself, Mr. Shi hopes to do for solar energy what China did for tennis shoes: drive down the cost so that millions of people who could not afford solar photovoltaic panels will be able to do so.

As an environmentalist, I wish him well. As an American, I worry that if we don't start doing everything we can to develop our own clean power, we're going to miss out on the green industrial revolution. Today, most of our hybrid cars are imported from Japan. Tomorrow, if Mr. Shi has his way, most of our solar panels will come from China.

What Mr. Shi understands is that China is going to have to go green. Its rivers and air are becoming so polluted it has no choice. In fact, as he and I spoke in his 66th-floor office in Shanghai, the air was so dirty you could barely make out the skyscrapers down the street. America, alas, still seems to think it has a choice in going green. So while China will be compelled to move into this industry, U.S. companies may or may not, depending on whether states, or Washington, require power providers to generate energy from renewables.

For years our brain-dead Congress thought it was helping our power companies and manufacturers by not imposing tough energy-efficiency standards on them. In fact, it was just helping some of them commit suicide. Congress's idiotic decision not to impose higher mileage standards on U.S. carmakers helped Detroit miss the market and almost go bankrupt. China already has higher mileage standards for its autos than we do.

"People at all levels in China have become more aware of this environment issue and alternative energy," said Mr. Shi. "Five years ago when I started the company people said: 'Why do we need solar? We have a surplus of coal-powered electricity.' Now it is different; now people realize that solar has a bright future. But it is still too expensive."

Mr. Shi founded Suntech in Wuxi, China, near Shanghai, after earning a Ph.D. in engineering in Australia in 1992. As The Wall Street Journal put it in a recent profile, Suntech combines "first world technology and developing world prices" — so effectively it has become one of the world's four top solar manufacturers, along with Sharp and Kyocera of Japan and BP.

The key, Mr. Shi explained to me, is that he uses more low-cost Chinese labor, rather than high-tech machines, to make his solar modules and handle the fragile silicon, and he takes advantage of the subsidies offered by different Chinese provinces dying for him to open a Suntech factory in their region.

Roughly 90 percent of his business today is abroad. But as he brings the price down, the China market will open up, and he expects to use that to gain much greater scale and drive the price of his solar modules down further.

"If we have a market here, we feel confident we will be a cost leader," he says. "Now we are at around $4 per watt. In 10 years time, I'm pretty sure we will be below $2 per watt," which would make solar competitive and scalable.

Thanks to Suntech's success, "now there is a rush of [Chinese] business people entering this sector, even though we still don't have a market here," added Mr. Shi. "Many government people now say, 'This is an industry!' " To help, the Chinese government just passed a law mandating that China get 10 percent of its energy from renewables, like solar, by 2020.

China is setting high standards for renewables, but is still weak on enforcement. America is better at enforcement, but still weak on setting high standards. We need to get our act together, because eventually China will bring its enforcement in line with its regulations — or it won't breathe. And when that happens, China's emerging green power entrepreneurs could clean our clock in the clean power business.

Oh, well, you can always buy a share. Suntech is already listed on the New York Stock Exchange. <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

Out In The Cold (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 6, 2006

THE SKIING ISN'T ideal in Big Sky, Mont., thanks to a lack of snowfall, but temperatures are cold enough to support the man-made variety. It seems to be equally frosty inside a resort conference room where South Korean and American representatives are trying to cement the United States' biggest trade deal since the North American Free Trade Agreement.

Underway is the fifth round of talks on a bilateral pact supported by President Bush and South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun. The stakes for both countries are high and go beyond mere economics — though the economies of both nations would benefit from a pact. A failure would further strain already frayed relations between the U.S. and South Korea and could push Seoul nearer to China's political and trade orbit.

Despite such considerations, there doesn't seem to be much urgency in Montana. This was supposed to be the final round of talks, but with agreement lacking on even relatively easy issues in earlier rounds, they are expected to continue next year. With Bush's fast-track trade authority expiring in July, a deal needs to be finished by March to allow time for congressional review. Yet on Tuesday, there was still no sign of progress.

There are a number of contentious matters on the table, including South Korea's restrictions on U.S. beef and rice and U.S. anti-dumping rules that South Koreans say have unfairly punished their high-tech manufacturers. Probably the biggest snag is automobiles: South Korea puts heavy tariffs and taxes on imports and imposes safety and environmental regulations that make it difficult for foreign automakers to compete.

These clearly have to go, but that's not enough for Detroit. U.S. automakers are demanding that cuts to U.S. tariffs on South Korean vehicles be tied to measurable gains in market share for U.S. cars in South Korea. They don't just want a level playing field — they want sales guarantees. It's an absurd notion that, distressingly, is embraced by Rep. Sander M. Levin (D-Mich.), who is likely to chair the House Ways and Means Committee's trade subcommittee next year.

Meanwhile, among South Korea's more nonsensical trade quirks is its restriction on U.S. beef, which is based on overblown fears of mad cow disease. That should be jettisoned as well.

With $72 billion in trade last year, South Korea is the United States' seventh-biggest trading partner. A successful free-trade agreement would be an achievement in itself and would lay the groundwork for an even bigger deal with Japan. Such an agreement is too important to be derailed by a protectionist minority in both countries.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Senators Grill Mueller About NSA Surveillance Program. The AP (12/7, Jordan) reports in a widely-distributed story, "Senators frustrated by scant details on the Bush administration's domestic eavesdropping program on Wednesday rapped FBI Director Robert Mueller for refusing to show how it has curbed terrorist activity in the United States. Mueller said he was unable to talk about the warrantless spying program because it is classified." Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter asked, "What assurances can you provide that the program is worthwhile? Have arrests been made? Have terror cells been broken?" The AP notes, "In his opening remarks, Mueller ticked off a list of FBI cases targeting terror suspects since the 2001 attacks. … But Mueller did not say if any of the cases resulted from the secret spying program, which was revealed last year. His answer annoyed senators, who said their constitutionally protected oversight was being hampered by the administration's stonewalling."

PBS Newshour with Jim Lehrer (12/6, 7:00 p.m., Lehrer) broadcasted, "FBI Director Mueller balked today at giving the results of domestic surveillance. The eavesdropping on international calls and e-mails is done without warrants. At a hearing, Mueller faced persistent questioning from Arlen Specter, the chairman of the Senate judiciary committee." Sen. Arlen Specter, Chairman of Senate Judiciary Committee: "What assurances can you provide to this committee and the American people that the program is worthwhile? Have arrests been made? Have terrorist cells been broken up?" Robert Mueller, FBI Director: "All I can tell you, sir, is the compartment is classified. It is compartmented, and if given the permission to provide such a brief allegation we have breached the intelligence committee, we are happy to do so, sir." Lehrer: "Mueller did say that the FBI had broken up several terror plots since 9/11."

Under the headline "Mueller's Reticence Angers Senate Panel," the Washington Times (12/7, Seper, 88K) reports Mueller "was subjected to bipartisan…after refusing to discuss the Bush administration's domestic terrorist-surveillance program because it is 'classified.'" Mueller "stepped further into the breach when he told Mr. Specter the FBI had given a 'full briefing' on the program to the Senate Intelligence Committee behind closed doors. 'Well, we're very interested in that, Director Mueller, but not as interested as a full briefing to this committee,' said Mr. Specter, adding that 'this committee has oversight jurisdiction over the FBI. We're going to pursue that, Director Mueller. That is not what I view as a satisfactory response by the administration.'" Meanwhile, NPR's All Things Considered (12/6, Shapiro) called the hearing "combative," noting that "every senator brought an issue." In addition to Specter's questions about domestic surveillance, NPR reported Sen. Dianne Feinstein's criticism of FBI anti-gang priorities, as well as criticism of the Amerithrax probe from Sens. Charles Grassley and Patrick Leahy.

Senate Democrats May Press Administration On Terrorism, Privacy Concerns. The New York Times (12/7, Lichtblau) reports, "Leading Senate Democrats put the Bush administration on notice Wednesday that they intended to press for a fuller accounting on a wide range of counterterrorism programs, including wiretapping, data-mining operations and the interrogation and treatment of detainees." The Times continues, "Democrats have appeared divided at times over how aggressively to challenge the administration on its terrorism policies, in part because of concerns that they risked playing into Republican accusations that they were soft on terrorism. … But Senator Patrick J. Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, who will take over next month as chairman of the Judiciary Committee, made clear at a committee hearing Wednesday that he wanted to investigate actively the effectiveness and legality of many programs. … 'The administration's gone to unprecedented lengths to hide its own activities from the public while at the same time collecting an unprecedented amount of data on private citizens,' Mr. Leahy told Robert S. Mueller III, the director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation." The Times adds, "As the sole witness at the hearing, Mr. Mueller bore the brunt of the Democrats' criticism. But their sharp questions often went well beyond the F.B.I.'s purview, delving into areas like the National Security Agency's eavesdropping program, the Central Intelligence Agency's interrogations of Qaeda suspects and the Department of Homeland Security's use of profiling scores to assess the risks posed by travelers. … As a first step toward what Mr. Leahy described as an effort to roll back the administration's curtailment of rights, he and Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania, proposed legislation that would seek to restore the rights of all terrorism suspects to challenge their detentions in court. … Brian Roehrkasse, a spokesman for the Justice Department, said that while the administration would review the Leahy-Specter proposal, the process approved by Congress allows enemy combatants to challenge their detention and 'goes well beyond what is required for lawful prisoners of war under both international and domestic law.'"

Leahy Says FBI, DOJ Oversight Will Be One Of His "Highest Priorities." In its story focusing on Mueller's comments about the Weldon probe leak, Bloomberg (12/7, Schmidt) also reports, "Senator Patrick Leahy, the Vermont Democrat who will take over as committee chairman next year, promised to press the FBI on privacy issues related to personal information the government collects to protect against terrorist attacks. 'There is a growing concern in this country that our government knows too much about us,' Leahy said. Leahy told Mueller that 'oversight of the FBI and the Department of Justice will be one of my highest priorities next year.'"

FBI Seeks More Funds To Avoid Tech Upgrade Delays. Government Executive (12/7, Pulliam) reports, "The FBI's $425 million effort to upgrade its case management system is at risk of delays if Congress does not provide additional funds in the next stopgap spending measure, the bureau's chief told lawmakers Wednesday." GE continues, "Testifying before the Senate Judiciary Committee, FBI Director Robert Mueller said the bureau needs $157 million to begin the second phase of building the system, known as Sentinel, in February as planned. … President Bush included $100 million for the project in his fiscal 2007 budget request. According to Mueller, the Office of Management and Budget has helped the FBI find the additional $57 million, using funds left over from the first phase of the effort and unspent balances in other accounts. … The House version of the fiscal 2007 Science, State, Justice, Commerce and related agencies spending bill, which includes FBI funding, meets the administration's $100 million request. But the Senate version provides an appropriation of only $40 million. The bill has yet to be completed." GE adds, "The Senate did not grant the full request because the FBI failed to fully respond to a March 24, 2006, letter from the Judiciary Committee relating to the bureau's modernization efforts. Language in the report accompanying the appropriations bill stated that the funding levels would be reconsidered if FBI officials answer the committee's outstanding questions. … The current continuing resolution to keep money flowing to agencies in the absence of final fiscal 2007 appropriations is set to expire Dec. 8. Agency officials have asked that when lawmakers extend it, they provide $80 million for Sentinel."

Officials Fear Al Qaeda Could Strike In UK. The Financial Times (12/7, Fidler) reports, "Britain's security services have concluded that al-Qaeda is rebuilding its headquarters' operation in Pakistan and that the UK is the western country mainly at risk from the development, according to UK government officials. The conclusion, drawn from examinations of past plots and other evidence, runs counter to conventional wisdom that al-Qaeda has been in retreat as an operational force and has become essentially a "brand" that inspires radical Muslims to commit acts of terror." The Times adds, "The theme was addressed in public last month in a speech by Dame Eliza Manningham-Buller, director-general of the UK's domestic security service. She said the service knew of some 30 plots and had identified 1,600 people actively engaged in plotting, or facilitating, terrorist acts here and abroad. … UK government officials, speak-ing on condition they not be named, say they have evidence that some groups receive direction from Pakistan, in particular from the lawless tribal areas near the Afghan borders."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Gonzales To Tour Supermax Prison In February. The Rocky Mountain News (12/7, Burnett) reports, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales plans to tour Supermax prison with Sen. Ken Salazar in February, Salazar's spokesman said today." The News continues, "Salazar said he hopes the Feb. 21 tour will bring much-needed attention to the nation's highest-security federal prison, which has seen a decrease in staff and increased concerns about security since it opened in Florence in 1994. .. .The prison is home to inmates such as 9/11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui, 1993 World Trade Center bomber Ramzi Yousef and Oklahoma City bombing conspirator Terry Nichols." The News adds, "In September, a Justice Department inspector general's report criticized the prison for not properly screening terrorists' mail and other communications. A federal indictment also revealed that a drug kingpin had used coded messages to conduct business in Los Angeles from inside Supermax."

The AP (12/7) reports, "This year an arbitrator found staffing levels had made the facility more dangerous, with some shifts going unfilled. In September, a Justice Department report criticized the prison for not properly screening mail and other communications." The AP adds, "Gonzales had committed to a tour when he met with Salazar last month, when he restated the Bureau of Prison's commitment to add 18 staff members to the prison by the end of the year."

Local Television. KJCT- TV (12/6, 10:00 p.m.) in Grand Junction, Durango, and Montrose broadcasts, "Senator Ken Salazar and US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales will tour the Supermax prison in Florence next February. Salazar says he hopes the tour will bring more attention to security and staffing concerns at the nation's highest-security federal prison. The prison houses the nation's most dangerous inmates."

KKCO- TV (12/6, 10:00 p.m.) in Grand Junction, Durango, Montrose, broadcasts, "Glen questions about the security of one of the prisons holding the nation's most notorious criminals is prompting a visit from federal officials. Florence, Colorado Supermax security prompts investigation Senator Ken Salazar announced he will visit the Supermax prison near Florence Colorado along with Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. The prison has been criticized for being understaffed. And that mail is not adequately screened."

KMGH- TV (12/6, 4:00 p.m.) in Denver, "Alberto Gonzales will visit Supermax in February. It houses the nation's most notorious prisoners."

US-Bound Cargo To Be Tested For Radiation At Four Foreign Ports. USA Today (12/7, 9A, Hall, 2.27M) reports the Homeland Security and Energy departments will announce today that beginning next year, "containers at ports in Korea, Oman, Honduras and the United Kingdom" will be scanned for radiation before being loaded onto US-bound ships in "the first phase of a program that could expand to ports worldwide." Korea is "one of the world's largest ports" and will only have some cargo containers run through detectors, but "officials expect most or all will be" scanned at the smaller ports. "Either way, the program should deter anyone aiming to sneak weapons onto a cargo ship," Homeland Security Deputy Secretary Michael Jackson said.

EPA To Start Final 9/11 Cleanup Program. The New York Times (12/7, Depalma, 1.16M) reports, "More than five years after contaminated dust from the World Trade Center seeped into apartments and offices throughout Lower Manhattan, the federal Environmental Protection Agency announced plans yesterday to start a final indoor cleanup program next month, despite widespread criticism that the program is seriously flawed." Agency "officials said residents and owners of commercial buildings below Canal Street would have 60 days to sign up for the voluntary program, which will test for asbestos, lead, vitreous fibers and harmful soot that may have come from the collapse of the trade center. If any one of the contaminants is found, the space will be professionally cleaned at no cost to the resident or owner. … Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, who in 2004 forced the environmental agency to test indoor spaces for contamination, called the program announced yesterday 'totally inadequate.'"

NYTimes Urges Democrats To Adopt All 9/11 Panel Recommendations. The New York Times (12/7, 1.16M) editorializes, "Weeks before they take majority control of the Capitol, the Democrats are reported to be wriggling out of one of their most important campaign vows: to repair Congressional oversight of the nation's intelligence agencies. Congress was found to be nothing less than 'dysfunctional' on this duty by the Sept. 11 commission, which wisely recommended a full-scale revamping of the committee structure. … Now that they can taste power again, however, the victors seem to be having second thoughts. Instead of attempting wholesale committee reform in the first weeks of Congress, Democratic leaders may punt the idea toward oblivion in some sort of a study panel, according to The Washington Post. Nothing could be more disappointing to voters. … Surely, the leaders of the new Congress know they will be risking the nation's security, far more than their credibility, if they retreat from the vow to do a stronger job of oversight."

Nagin Says Federal Government Has Abandoned New Orleans. In a front page article, USA Today (12/7, 1A, Eisler, Heath, 2.27M) reports on an interview with New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin in which he "accused the federal government…of abandoning its legal obligation to help his city recover from the devastation of Hurricane Katrina." He "insisted that even the city's most flood-prone areas should be rebuilt — albeit 'smarter and safer.' He said that can't happen unless promised federal aid begins to flow." Though Nagin said "local officials have not been able to access" most of the $900 million approved by the federal government to rebuild New Orleans' infrastructure, the head of FEMA's recovery office in Louisiana, James Stark, "said most of the federal money already has been turned over to Louisiana" and that the agency "has been working to speed up the funding process."

Under the headline "'We're Going To Do It.'" USA Today (12/7, 13A, 2.27M) runs an excerpt from its interview with Nagin and City Council members Oliver Thomas Jr., Cynthia Hedge-Morrell and Arnie Fielkow. Asked what must be done to make the recover process in New Orleans work, Nagin said, "The main thing we need right now is the $900 million that is pending through the Federal Emergency Management Agency for infrastructure repairs. The second thing is the dollars our citizens need to rebuild their homes and their lives." Nagin said only 44 citizens have "received a check" through the Road Home program. Nagin added later that the program is "not meeting the needs of our citizens. It needs to move more quickly with more dollars. We have to get to a point where I can say to a citizen, you can't live here or you shouldn't live here because of the risk, but here's how we move you to a better place to rebuild your life."

GAO Says FEMA Wasting Millions In Katrina Aid. The Washington Post/AP (12/7, A12, Yen) reports investigators for the Government Accountability Office said Wednesday that the federal government "is squandering tens of millions of dollars in Hurricane Katrina disaster help, in some cases doling out housing payments to people living rent-free." Meanwhile, FEMA "has recouped less than 1 percent of the $1 billion that investigators contend it wasted on fraudulent assistance." GAO's Gregory Kutz told a Senate hearing that the office's "work shows for individual assistance payments, at least tens of thousands of individuals took the opportunity to commit fraud." He added "that his previous $1 billion estimate of wasted aid was now 'likely understated.'" FEMA spokesman Pat Philbin said "the agency has sought to upgrade the registration process and strengthen its procedures for verifying names and addresses."

USA Today (12/7, 7A, Hall, 2.27M) reports, "Among the latest examples of waste were duplicate payments to people claiming the same damage to their homes from two hurricanes." Sen. Susan Collins "called the new revelations about FEMA 'truly alarming.'" NPR (12/6, Anne, Kelly) reported on its website that Collins said the agency "has yet to strike a proper balance between expedited assistance and good stewardship of taxpayers' funds. Current practices invite and enable fraud, harming the very people the program is designed to help."

Louisiana Disputes FEMA Bill For Payments On Fraudulent Claims. The New York Times (12/7, Eaton, 1.16M) reports Louisiana officials "have gone to court to try to prevent the Federal Emergency Management Agency from collecting about $60 million from the state," arguing that the state should not be responsible for fraudulent claims paid by the agency. "The federal government has asked a judge to dismiss the lawsuit, contending that Louisiana cannot refuse to pay charges it disagrees with — even when the charges are the result of fraudulent claims — and that the state has no right to audit FEMA's spending." The figure in dispute "includes $45 million withheld because the state estimates that about 12 percent of FEMA's other needs spending went to people who were probably not eligible for it."

WAR NEWS:

Iraq Study Group Report Seen As Rebuke Of Bush Policies. To say that the release of the Iraq Study Group Report dominates news coverage would be a major understatement. Stories about or related to the release of the 142-page report by the panel headed by ex-Secretary of State James Baker and ex-Rep. Lee Hamilton took up 48 minutes of the three major network news broadcasts Wednesday night, with ABC giving the topic 13 and one-half minutes, NBC just over 16 minutes, and CBS a full 20 minutes. Major newspapers across the country have their own front-page reports and detailed analyses. Most media analyses suggest the release of the eagerly anticipated document puts great pressure on President Bush to chart a new course for the US in Iraq. Much of the coverage is very favorable toward the ISG and its report, which is being portrayed as a blunt rebuke of the Administration's Iraq policies.

ABC World News (12/6, lead story, 2:10, Gibson, 8.78M) said the report "read a bit like a report card on the Bush Administration's conduct of the war and the marks were not good." ABC (Karl) added, "The commission calls not just for a change in military strategy but also a complete overhaul of US foreign policy in the Middle East."

NBC Nightly News (12/6, lead story, 3:15, Williams, 9.87M) said "10 prominent Americans appeared before reporters after working for nine months on a plan for the US in Iraq. Between them they have hundreds of years of government experience, Republicans and Democrats who today delivered a blunt bipartisan and grim assessment." NBC (Gregory) added, "This report is a harsh review of the President's handling of the Iraq war, a rejection of the President's recent claim that the US is winning in Iraq. The report concludes just the opposite, that the current approach is not working." A bit later on NBC Nightly News (12/6, story 5, 2:05, Williams, 9.87M), Tim Russert said, "The one thing that resonated today, whether you're liberal, conservative, Democrat, Republican, for the war or against the war, was the grimness of this report. They used the word 'dire.' … When 10 Americans in a bipartisan way come together in a unanimous report and say it's grave and getting worse, it was heard throughout official Washington."

In the most negative of the three network openings, the CBS Evening News (12/6, lead story, 2:20, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "The US military confirms that 10 more American soldiers were killed in Iraq today, some in combat, others by roadside bombs. With each death, with every passing day, so many of us ask, 'Is there any way out of this nightmare?' Today we got an answer from a bipartisan commission. … The committee does recommend a new diplomatic offensive to end the violence in Iraq, one that would include Iran and Syria, something the President has rejected in the past." The CBS Evening News (12/6, story 3, 1:00, Axelrod, 7.66M) additionally said, "From the outset, the President's aides have set he will not outsource his foreign policy. This report calls for several things that would force the President to alter his course, if not pull a 180-degree turn, and that hasn't exactly been a hallmark of this presidency to date."

A harsh AP (12/6, Flaherty, Espo) report appearing in well over 100 newspapers or on their web sites says the ISG concluded that "President Bush's war policies have failed in almost every regard," warning of "dwindling chances to change course before crisis turns to chaos with dire implications for terrorism, war in the Middle East and higher oil prices around the world." The Washington Post (12/7, A1, Abramowitz, Wright, 690K) says the "panel of prominent elder leaders yesterday offered a stinging assessment of virtually every aspect of the U.S. venture in Iraq and called for a reshaping of the American military presence and a new Middle East diplomatic initiative to prevent the country from sliding into anarchy," while the he Los Angeles Times (12/7, Richter, 850K) says the report used "uncompromising and dismal terms" to say "continuing deterioration in Iraq could inflame the entire region in a deadly war that would further curtail U.S. influence throughout the world."

USA Today (12/7, 1A, Nichols, Slavin, 2.27M) said the "much-awaited report" calls for "U.S. troop withdrawals by 2008 to prevent" Iraq's "slide toward 'chaos.'" The Wall Street Journal (12/7, A1, Dreazen, King, 2.04M) also focuses on the call for drawing down troop strength, saying the report offers a "prescription for withdrawing most U.S. troops by a specific date and dismissal of calls to partition Iraq or send additional American forces there." McClatchy (12/7, Hutcheson) reports the "eagerly anticipated report" called for a "get-tough approach that would set clear milestones for the Iraqis in conjunction with a gradual withdrawal of U.S. troops." The Financial Times (12/7, Sevastopulo, Daniel, Luce) says the report "called for a radical change of course in US policy."

The New York Times (12/7, A1, Sanger, 1.16M) cites the report's "unusually sweeping and blunt language" in its 79 recommendations, which "included a call for direct engagement with Syria and Iran as part of a 'new diplomatic offensive,' jump-starting the Israeli-Palestinian peace effort, and a clear declaration that the United States would reduce its support to Iraq unless Baghdad made 'substantial progress' on reconciliation and security." The Baltimore Sun (12/7, Davis, 257K) calls it "a grim and strongly worded report."

The Chicago Tribune (12/7, Silva, 617K) says Bush was presented "with both a pointed critique of his handling of the war and a road map for changing course in Iraq that would require the president to transform the military mission and recalibrate in fundamental ways his approach to Middle East diplomacy." The Houston Chronicle (12/7, A1, Hedges, Roth, 530K) says the report "painted a dire portrait of the situation in Iraq while calling for all American combat brigades to be withdrawn by the first quarter of 2008, barring unexpected developments."

With a slightly different focus, the Christian Science Monitor (12/7, LaFranchi, 59K) says the report "avoids some controversial proposals. This reflects the panel's bipartisan makeup as well as a desire not to be dismissed by the White House out of hand. But it does call for increased pressure on the Iraqi government to make progress in key areas of reconciliation and governability -- and to withdraw US support if progress is not made. … One downbeat note greeting the report is that, no matter how good some of its recommendations may be, it may simply have been overtaken by the deterioration of conditions on the ground in Iraq."

In a front-page news analysis, the New York Times (12/7, Stolberg, 1.16M) writes, "In 142 stark pages, the Iraq Study Group report makes an impassioned plea for bipartisan consensus on the most divisive foreign policy issue of this generation. Without President Bush, that cannot happen." While the ISG members "gave a nod to Mr. Bush, adopting his language in accepting the goal of an Iraq that can 'govern itself, sustain itself and defend itself,'" the Administration's "talk of Iraq as a beacon of democracy in the Middle East is absent, as is any talk of victory."

The Washington Post (12/7, Kessler, Ricks, 690K) also runs an analysis piece on its front page, saying the report "might well be titled 'The Realist Manifesto.' From the very first page, in which" Baker and Hamilton "scold that 'our leaders must be candid and forthright with the American people,' the bipartisan report is nothing less than a repudiation of the Bush administration's diplomatic and military approach to Iraq and to the whole region." The report "reflects the foreign policy establishment's disdain for the 'neoconservative' policies long espoused by President Bush and his aides." Also in the Washington Post (12/7, A2, 690K), Dana Milbank says the ISG "placed an improvised explosive device beneath the Bush administration's Iraq policy."

An AP (12/6, Raum) news analysis says that now that Bush "has the outlines of a bipartisan exit strategy for Iraq and a new secretary of defense to help carry it out," the "pressure on him to change course is now politically enormous."

NBC Nightly News (12/6, story 6, 2:15, Williams, 9.87M) ran an "In Depth" report on "reaction we are able to gauge from across the country." NBC (Allen) noted that Wednesday was the "eve of that day of infamy" when Japan attacked the US at Pearl Harbor, adding that "even these military families disagree with the Iraq study group's sober assessment of the war." One said, "I don't think we are done there yet." But another said, "Get everybody out of Iraq. It will be another Vietnam if not worse." The CBS Evening News (12/6, story 14, 2:40, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "When the story is written about what finally got the United States out of Iraq, it will have less to do with the Baker-Hamilton report than with this: the mounting toll that turned so many Americans against the war; more than 2,900 dead, more than 22,000 wounded."

Bartlett Says Bush Will Present "One Single Way Forward." Counselor to the President Dan Bartlett spoke for the White House on PBS, MSNBC, and CNN. On PBS' NewsHour (12/6, Suarez), he said, "It's been a constructive dialogue today. The Administration is looking at all of these recommendations very carefully. As we stated, we're not going to have an instant analysis of every piece of information coming out just yet. There is a robust review under way by the Administration, by the military leadership, by the national security staff. So there's a lot of activity under way, but the President was deeply grateful for the service to the country that these people provided by producing this report." On MSNBC's Hardball (12/6, Barnicle), Bartlett said, "President Bush recognizes a sense of urgency when it comes to helping, not only Iraq get on a better path and what role the neighborhood can play in that, but also how important the Middle East peace process can be."

On CNN's The Situation Room (12/6, Blitzer), Bartlett said, "We do want to have as quick an assessment as possible. As you know, there is a very comprehensive assessment going on by the administration, his military leadership, the National Security Council staff. And the President will be meeting with members of his Administration in the next week or two to also get their findings. The President will have one single way forward that he will present to the American people, hopefully before the end of the year, so the American people, our allies in the region and everybody, for that matter, will know quite as clearly as possible about the way forward."

USA Today (12/7, 2A, 2.27M) says the ISG "isn't the only review of U.S. policy in Iraq: The Bush administration has launched its own appraisal. Last month, President Bush asked the National Security Council to coordinate studies that in some cases had been underway for months." National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley "hasn't set a deadline for a final report but says it will be completed in 'weeks, not months.'"

Recommendations Could Be Hard Sell On Capitol Hill. NBC Nightly News (12/6, story 2, 2:20, Williams, 9.87M) reported on the "reaction here on Capitol Hill and this question of how easy or hard it may be to implement even some of this report's key recommendations." NBC (Mitchell) added, "The Baker-Hamilton group overcame its divisions now we will see if Congress can do the same. Leaders of the study group knew their report would be a tough sell on Capitol Hill. Democratic leaders' response sounded a lot like 'we told you so.'" Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi: "They said we must transition our troops out of Iraq. We begin by changing the mission. Democrats have been saying that all along." Mitchell said the "study group's controversial call for direct talks with Iran and Syria" also found Capitol Hill critics. Sen.

Joseph Lieberman: "I see it as a non-starter. Why do I? Iran has exactly the opposite interests that we do in Iraq." Sen. John McCain: "If the price of negotiations with Iran is their nuclear weapons program that is not good enough."

ABC World News (12/6, story 3, 2:25, Stephanopoulos, 8.78M) said, "This report ratified a consensus here in Washington. Republicans and Democrats agree that the current strategy has failed, that the situation is slipping, and that a serious change of course is necessary. Now, there is a lot of disagreement over the 79 recommendations. But as a practical matter, Capitol Hill is now in a holding pattern. Everyone here is waiting to see what the President does with the report."

CNN's The Situation Room (12/6, Blitzer) reported, "On Capitol Hill, the early reaction to the Iraq Study Group's plan of action in Iraq is mostly favorable. But after a bitter election and with Democrats poised to take power, lawmakers may not necessarily be ready to put all their old battles over Iraq behind them." CNN (Bash) continued, "Democratic leaders insist time and time again that they're ready and willing to work with the President on a new bipartisan approach to Iraq if he is willing to make major changes there. But what this bipartisan report did was, at least initially, stoke the bitter partisan Iraq divide."

The Hill (12/7, Schor) says incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid said he "felt vindicated by the report and that it would lead to the beginning of military withdrawal." Reid said, "The President has the ball in his court now."

Sen. Barack Obama said on CNN's The Situation Room (12/6, Blitzer), "I thought that the Iraq Study Group did a terrific job of providing, for the first time, in a bipartisan fashion, a realistic assessment of what's taking place there. And many of the recommendations that they put forward mirrored recommendations that I made in a speech in Chicago three weeks ago. … This now gives us an opportunity, as Democrats and Republicans, and as Americans, to come together and say what are the tasks and objectives that we can set for ourselves that will lead to a more acceptable outcome."

Sen. Chuck Hagel said on PBS' NewsHour (12/6, Ifill), "We have a very significant contribution that's just been made here by 10 very important Americans. … I have a sense that the impending disaster in Iraq is unwinding at a rate that we can't quite calibrate. … The fact is the future of Iraq will be determined by the Iraqi people. It's not going to be determined by us."

Sen. Lindsay Graham said on Fox News' Your World (12/6, Cavuto) said, "I appreciate their recommendations. But I am in this thing to win. I believe it's the central battlefront on the war on terror. If you believe that, you throw everything you have as a nation to win. We've never had enough troops. The reason there's chaos in Iraq is because the insurgency has bloomed and moderation has been oppressed."

Sen. Christopher Dodd said on PBS' NewsHour (12/6, Ifill), "To pick up on Jim Baker's suggestion that we send a message to the American people and to others, particularly in Iraq and elsewhere, that this is something that we can generally support -- there may be differences on specifics -- but overall I think it's the right direction, and we ought to be doing that."

Rep. Phil Gingrey said on MSNBC's Tucker (12/6, Carlson), "I think the President responded in the appropriate fashion. He said every recommendation, all 79 of them, will be looked at. They won't necessarily be rubber-stamped."

The CBS Evening News (12/6, story 5, 2:40, Couric, 7.66M) reported on the "key recommendation of this commission" to create an "Iraq support group involving many other countries, including Syria and Iran. The President has frozen them out to this point, so will there be a thaw?" CBS (Axelrod) added, "Recommendation No. 9 suggests the United States should engage directly with Iran and Syria, something Mr. Bush has repeatedly rejected. Today, the Administration seemed to draw limits on this idea of expanded diplomacy, at least with Iran because of its nuclear program." Tony Snow, White House Press Secretary: "I'm telling you that there may be a difference between one-on-one talks with Iran, which is something that we have ruled out." Axelrod: "The report also concludes there will be no peace in the Middle East until the US deals directly the Israeli/Palestinian conflict. That's an idea the Administration seemed to be open to today."

NBC Nightly News (12/6, story 3, 0:45, Engel, 9.87M) said that in Lebanon, "there is a hope that this could be the start not just of a new policy in Iraq, but throughout the Middle East, one that revitalizes the Arab-Israeli peace process, and tries to prevent the conflict in Iraq from spreading beyond the borders. But there is also concern that if Washington engages in serious negotiations with Iran and Syria, then the smaller states in the Middle East, namely Lebanon and Israel, are worried that they will have to pay the price for those negotiations by offering concessions. Many tonight in this region are asking if President Bush is really a statesman, a negotiator."

Report Gets Mixed Reaction In Iraq. ABC World News (12/6, story 4, 2:45, Gibson, 8.78M) reported that "in Iraq itself," a deputy prime minister "said, 'There is no doubt that the government of Iraq carries a heavy burden.' But an influential Sunni group, the Association of Muslim Scholars, said that the report is unrealistic in the solutions it provided. And that group questioned whether US troops could successfully train Iraqi forces." The CBS Evening News (12/6, story 7, 0:50, Palmer, 7.66M) said, "The report does appear to bolster" Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki "by giving him something he wants very much, and that is more control over the Iraqi security forces sooner rather than later. And he's said that he's onside with the diplomatic initiative in the report. In other words, he will send envoys to the neighbors Iran and Syria to ask if they'll help in stabilizing Iraq."

The Washington Post (12/7, A1, Raghavan, 690K) reports that Iraqis "expressed fear that the report's recommendations, if implemented, could weaken an already besieged government in a country teetering on the edge of civil war. 'It is a report to solve American problems, and not to solve Iraq's problems,' said Ayad al-Sammarai, an influential Sunni Muslim politician." USA Today (12/7, 4A, Soriano, 2.27M) reports on the political debate in Iraq over the report.

The New York Times (12/7, A25, Wong, Al-Saiedi, 1.16M) says that according to "conservative Shiite legislator" Sami al-Askari, Maliki was pleased "because the report seemed to affirm an argument that Mr. Maliki and other Shiite leaders had been making to President Bush -- give the Iraqi government more control over the security forces, and the war could be won." But the New York Times (12/7, A1, Gordon, 1.16M) also reports that the "experience of American commanders shows the difficulties in rapidly handing over security responsibilities to Iraq," and military experts say the recommendation "underestimates the challenge of building a capable Iraqi security force." Retired Army Chief of Staff Jack Keane, who advised the ISG, "described that goal as entirely impractical. 'Based on where we are now we can't get there,' General Keane said in an interview." USA Today (12/7, 4A, Brook, Kelley, 2.27M) says the recommendations "would put short-term strains on military people and equipment, while helping with the military's long-term challenges."

Even Called-For Troop Drawdown Would Leave "Tens Of Thousands" In Iraq. The CBS Evening News (12/6, story 4, 2:30, Martin, 7.66M) said that "even if most combat brigades can get out of Iraq by early 2008, tens of thousands of American troops would still be in the fight, both as trainers embedded in Iraqi units and as commandos conducting raids against Al Qaeda operatives." The CBS Evening News (12/6, story 8, 2:10, Couric, 7.66M) ran a feature on preparations to train Iraqi forces.

Wolf Pleased By Commission's Results. NBC Nightly News (12/6, story 10, 2:00, Williams, 9.87M) talked briefly with Rep. Frank Wolf, saying "this whole Iraq commission was his idea, and today he was feeling grateful and hopeful. Are we at our best when our best and get together and hammer out a problem like this?" Wolf: "The answer to that is just yes. That is the way it was during World War II. … I feel good today."

Biden Says Proposals "Necessary, But Not Sufficient." In a USA Today (12/7, 13A, 2.27M) op-ed, Sen. Joseph Biden writes that the report "is a first step toward a bipartisan way forward in Iraq. The fundamental changes it proposes are necessary, but not sufficient to achieve the objective most Americans share: to leave Iraq without leaving chaos behind. The report's most valuable contribution is to make clear that staying the course in Iraq is not an option." But "absent a political settlement, refocusing the mission of our remaining troops on training and engaging Iraq's neighbors will not stabilize Iraq."

Study Group Urges Agencies To Order Civilians To Iraq. The Washington Post's (12/7, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "Federal agencies supporting the Iraq war and reconstruction should order their civilian employees to fill key jobs in the combat zone if not enough volunteers step forward," the Iraq Study Group said yesterday. The recommendation "grew out of a sense that civilian agencies are not contributing enough personnel to Iraq, adding to the burdens on the US military. The group offered little detail on the staffing recommendation." The Post notes that it is rare for agencies to "reassign employees based on where they are needed," since "unions discourage forced reassignments and, at many agencies, only senior federal executives are at any real risk of such transfers because they are seen as a mobile part of the government's workforce."

More Commentary. The New York Times (12/7, A38, 1.16M) editorializes, "The much-anticipated report from the bipartisan panel is precisely about political cover. That is a good thing, if only Mr. Bush has the sense to embrace it. Iraq is so far gone that nobody expected the panel to come up with a breakthrough solution. … Its real mission was to avert the worst scenario, in which a stubborn George W. Bush spends the next two years blindly insisting he will accept nothing short of victory, while Iraq keeps spiraling out of control and the Iraqis get no closer to being able to contain the chaos after the Americans leave."

The Washington Post (12/7, A30, 690K) editorializes that the ISG report "outlines a military strategy for Iraq that has already been embraced in large measure by the Iraqi government and U.S. military commanders, if not explicitly by President Bush. It foresees a year-long shift of U.S. forces from fighting insurgents and preventing sectarian war to advising and supporting an Iraqi army that would take responsibility for those missions. … As the study group concedes, this last-ditch strategy to stabilize Iraq might not work. But it is an option worth trying, and one Americans and Iraqis can agree on. … What's missing from the study group report, unfortunately, is any evaluation of what should be done if the new strategy doesn't work."

The Wall Street Journal (12/7, A18, 2.04M) editorializes, "The way to success in Iraq lies in stronger U.S. support for Baghdad's Shiite-led governing coalition, not in some bipartisan strategic muddle ginned up for domestic political purposes. This is not to say that yesterday's Study Group report…serves no useful purpose. In calling for a withdrawal of most U.S. troops by 2008 -- if security conditions allow -- the report rejects any rapid withdrawal or deadline. Likewise, it reinforces the case Mr. Bush has been making about the ugly consequences of failure in Iraq for American interests."

The Los Angeles Times (12/7, 850K) editorializes that the report "distills the emerging conventional wisdom in Washington, laced with a measure of wishful thinking. Yes, persuading Iran and Syria to help stabilize Iraq, contrary to the administration's stance, is a worthy pursuit, though it isn't clear why Syria and Iran would want to do so, at least in the immediate term. And yes, settling the Israeli-Palestinian conflict would indeed reduce tensions throughout the Arab world, though linking that issue to the commission's brief was a stretch that plays into the hands of anti-American extremists in the region."

In a second editorial, the Los Angeles Times (12/7, 850K) says, "Independent commissions have a long and (mostly) honorable history in the United States, and it would be a mistake to dismiss the 79 recommendations of the Iraq Study Group simply because they are familiar. Such commissions often have an influence that lasts beyond their final report." The ultimate success of the ISG "lies less in what the group proposed than in whether its recommendations come to be seen as a turning point in U.S. involvement in Iraq."

The Financial Times (12/7) editorializes that the report "pulls few punches, except perhaps in its almost histrionic overuse of the conditional could to describe events already under way ('neighbouring countries could intervene' in Iraq; 'the global standing of the US could be diminished' and so on)." The report offers "sane suggestions. The question is: will a Bush administration trapped in denial act on them and, even if it does, will it be too late?"

In his Washington Post (12/7, A31, 690K) column, David Ignatius writes that the ISG "achieved the goal of any blue-ribbon commission: It stated the obvious, emphatically. … This report asks the world to help us find our way back home. Even if its proposals don't succeed, Baker-Hamilton can still accomplish its purpose, to 'enable the United States to begin to move its combat forces out of Iraq responsibly.'"

In his Washington Post (12/7, A31, 690K) column, George F. Will writes that the ISG, "like the policy it was created to critique, was overtaken by the unexpectedly rapid crumbling of the U.S. position in Iraq since the ISG was formed in March. … By what the ISG did not recommend -- e.g., many more troops and much more money -- it recognized that the deterioration is beyond much remediation."

In his Los Angeles Times (12/7, 850K) column, Jonah Goldberg writes, "The commissioners are latter-day Laodiceans, whom the Book of Revelation describes as 'neither cold nor hot … [but] lukewarm.' As a result, most of the report hits stratospheric heights of banality. … The commission is making the same core mistake that was made in the Vietnam era: treating a war like a political problem to be haggled, spun and bartered."

In a Wall Street Journal (12/7, A18, 2.04M) op-ed, Eliot Cohen of the Johns Hopkins University School of Advanced International Studies writes that the ISG itself "reflects the vain hope that well-meaning, senior, former public officials can find ideas that have not already occurred to people inside government; that those new ideas can redeem incompetent execution and insufficient resources; that salvation can come from a Washington establishment whose wisdom was exaggerated in its heyday;" and "that a public commission can do the work of oversight that Congress has shirked for five years in the misguided belief that it would thus support an administration struggling to do its best in a difficult situation.

This is no way to run a war, and most definitely, no way to win it."

In a Washington Post (12/7, A31, 690K) op-ed, Michael J. Glennon of the Tufts University Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy writes, "As a matter of sound policy, as well as constitutional principle, Congress should participate in weighing recommendations on future military action. Whatever military option is selected, its success will depend upon broad support from the American people. Congressional involvement will not guarantee that support, but congressional exclusion will almost surely preclude it."

Baker, Hamilton Say Bush Will Take Report Seriously. Iraq Study Group co-chairmen James Baker and Lee Hamilton were interviewed by all three broadcast networks as well as Fox News. On NBC Nightly News (12/6, story 4, 3:15, 9.87M), Brian Williams asked Baker, "When you're with this President, do you, can you, speak truth to power?" Baker: "He wants me to, and I do. I give him very candid advice, frank advice. Occasionally, he will take it. Sometimes he doesn't, sometimes he does. But yes, you can speak truth to this President." Asked where the ISG ranks "on all the service you've provided to your country," Baker said, "At the very top of the difficult issues. And there were a lot of difficult issues that I confronted during those 12 or 13 years but this is at the very top." On ABC World News (12/6, story 7, 3:10, Gibson, 8.78M), Baker said, "Presidents have been known to change their minds. It may be -- he's been known to change his. And it may be that you will see some mind changing. But you may not. There's no -- this is nothing more than a report. It is a suggestion. But it is the only bipartisan way forward."

On the CBS Evening News (12/6, story 6, 3:15, 7.66M), Katie Couric asked Hamilton if it is possible "that even if all 79 recommendations are implemented, this thing is lost, that we could be at the point of no return?" Hamilton: "Well, it's certainly possible. I really don't think it's likely. But you cannot ignore the possibility that the whole thing could come apart." As for President Bush's reaction, Hamilton said, "I was pleasantly surprised with his openness as he talked to us." Continuing on that theme on Fox News (12/6, Hume), Hamilton said, "I was personally very encouraged. I think the other members of the group were, as well. He said, first of all, he is going to take it very seriously. He said he was going to read it carefully. He said that it presented an opportunity to bring the country together. I think he sees the potential of it."

ISG's Main Goal Said To Be To Get Bush To "Change His Mind." The Los Angeles Times (12/7, McManus, 850K) observes that while "some bipartisan commissions try to change public opinion on contentious national issues" and others "try to help Congress find compromise solutions to thorny problems," the ISG "had a different -- and unusual -- goal: persuading President Bush to change his mind about staying the course in Iraq. 'This is highly unusual,' an adviser to the group said today, after the panel released its final report. 'It's one thing for people inside the administration to tell the president what to do. But for an outside group to say, "Here, son, let us give you a road map for your foreign policy?" That's remarkable.'"

ISG Managed To Work With Rare Bipartisanship. The Washington Post (12/7, A26, Baker, Wright, Linzer, 690K) takes a look at how the ISG went about its work, saying its process was "marked by that rarest of qualities in a polarized era: bipartisanship. At a time when Washington prefers confrontation to compromise, five Republicans and five Democrats sat down to tackle the country's most urgent crisis and came up with a document they all could sign. It proved to be a nine-month study of how to bridge not only Iraq's deep divide but also America's." The Los Angeles Times (12/7, Miller, 850K) says Baker "was a remarkably familiar presence in a remarkably familiar role -- talking diplomacy in his Texas twang, seeking solutions for a crisis in Iraq, and trying to rescue a president named Bush." The Washington Post (12/7, C1, Montgomery, 690K) also has a feature on the actual distribution of the report around Washington.

ISG Members Discuss Their Efforts And Hopes. Ex-Sen. Charles Robb, an Iraq Study Group member, said of President Bush on MSNBC's Hardball (12/6, Barnicle), "I think that the reception that we got this morning was very positive. Obviously, he's going to consult with others, he's going to get input from other groups. But I think all of us were pleasantly surprised that he was as supportive of the concept and of the unity of the report. And each of us had an opportunity to discuss elements of the report with him, and he seemed to fully understand the gravity of the events and/or actions that we were talking about. But only time will tell in terms of what decisions he ultimately makes."

Ex-Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, an Iraq Study Group member, said on MSNBC's Hardball (12/6, Barnicle), "I thought it was impressive that this group of 10 people, give Democrats and five Republicans, with a very serious, complicated issue, could come up with 79-some unanimous recommendations. I thought it was a remarkable performance really. And what we need to go forward now in this very tough situation is a broad consensus in our country. The American people must begin to feel like this is a way we should approach it and this is something that we should support. I hope that the Congress will feel the same way, or at least most of them."

Ex-Secretary of State Lawrence Eagleburger, an Iraq Study Group member, said on CNN's The Situation Room (12/6, Blitzer), "Our job now is to try to figure out how we get from where we are now, which is a mess, and everybody agrees with that, to where we should be...and can we do it in a bipartisan fashion?"

Iraq Study Group member Leon Panetta said on CNN's The Situation Room (12/6, Blitzer), "The goal here is to try to provide some degree of stability in Iraq so they can govern themselves, they can defend themselves and they can operate as an independent government. That's really what we're seeking."

Iraq Study Group member Vernon Jordan said on CNN's The Situation Room (12/6, Blitzer), "I have been serving on presidential commissions since 1965. … This has been the toughest. This has been the most difficult. But, from a standpoint of civility, it's been first-class, especially in this town, where hostility and polarization have taken the front seat, and civility a backseat. This process put civility in the front seat. And, hopefully, it will be instructive to the Congress and to the Administration and to the American people."

Bush, Blair To Discuss Iraq. The AP (12/7, Riechmann) reports, "President Bush faces urgent pressure to find a fresh strategy in Iraq as a new defense secretary heads to the Pentagon and a scathing bipartisan commission report says his war policies have failed and that 'time is running out.'" AFP (12/7) quotes Bush national security spokesman Gordon Johndroe saying the President and Blair "have a number of issues to discuss, including Iraq, the broader war on terror, the NATO commitment to Afghanistan, Sudan, as well as free and fair trade." AFP adds "US and British officials have steadfastly denied that Blair's visit was timed to coincide with the release of the grim Iraq report."

Ten US Troops Died In Iraq Wednesday. The Washington Post (12/7, A18, Trejos, 690K) reports 10 US troops "died in Iraq on Wednesday, the U.S. military reported, matching the highest number of U.S. service members killed on a single day in the past year. It was also a deadly day for Iraqi civilians, with at least 40 killed in car bombings and mortar attacks across the capital." The US troops died in four incidents, according to a military spokesman who "declined to provide details about how or where they were killed because family members were still being notified."

US, Iraq "Quietly Talking" With Insurgent Leaders. The Christian Science Monitor (12/7, Enders, 59K) reports that "both Baghdad and Washington" are "quietly talking with Iraq's insurgent leaders in an effort to end the unrelenting violence. US officials have not commented on reports of these recent meetings with resistance-group representatives. But Arab journalists, politicians, and officials in Jordan say they've occurred." The meetings "have come amid pressure from two key Shiite politicians on Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to alter course. The opposition has also stepped up efforts to outflank his increasingly unpopular rule. And in the US, the White House is sifting recommendations from the Iraq Study Group and other reviews as discontent grows over the administration's strategy."

Suicide Bomber Strikes Outside US Security Firm In Kandahar. The New York Times (12/7, A25, Gall, 1.16M) reports a suicide bomber "blew himself up on Wednesday outside the offices of an American security firm in the southern city of Kandahar, killing two American security officers and nine Afghan members of the staff."

DOJ:

Federal Inmate Charged With Mailing Threat Letters To Judge, USAs. The Springfield (MO) News-Leader (12/5) reported, "An Oregon man was indicted by a federal grand jury for mailing threatening letters to a federal judge and former U.S. attorney, the current U.S. attorney for the Western District of Missouri announced Monday. Bruce Dewayne Jensen, 29 — serving a sentence in the U.S. Medical Center for Federal Prisoners — was charged in a three-count indictment returned Wednesday." The News-Leader notes that the case "was investigated by the FBI and the Medical Center for Federal Prisoners."

Dayton Signals Support For Paulose As Minnesota US Attorney. The AP (12/7) reports, "Minnesota's acting U.S. attorney picked up key support Wednesday for permanent confirmation, but it wasn't immediately clear whether Rachel Paulose could expect a vote before Congress adjourns this year." The AP continues, "Paulose met Wednesday with Sen. Mark Dayton, who hadn't taken a position on her nomination because he said she hadn't sought a meeting. Afterward, he said she had his support." The AP adds, "Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., had already backed Paulose, calling her 'an extremely competent and capable professional.' But the Senate Judiciary Committee generally doesn't vote on a nominee without the support of both of a nominee's home-state senators. … Paulose, 33, has been acting U.S. attorney for nine months, and President Bush nominated her to the permanent post four months ago. If the Senate fails to take up her nomination before adjourning next week, Bush can resubmit her next year."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Fannie Mae Announces Financial Restatement. The Wall Street Journal (12/7, A4, Hagerty, 2.04M) reports, "Fannie Mae took another step toward resolving its accounting fiasco by announcing a restatement of results that reduced retained earnings as of June 30, 2004, by $6.3 billion." But "the long-awaited restatement by the government-sponsored mortgage company increased stockholders' equity by $4.1 billion as of the same date. That is because of big increases in the value of mortgage securities held by Fannie that were reclassified as being available for sale as part of correcting past accounting errors. Those increases more than offset the reduction in retained earnings." The restatement "comes two years after regulators found that Fannie had violated more than a dozen accounting rules, partly in an effort to make earnings growth appear smoother and to trigger maximum bonuses for executives."

The New York Times (12/7, Dash, 1.16M) reports, "Federal regulators, meanwhile, said they planned to file a lawsuit before the end of the year in an effort to recover millions of dollars from Fannie Mae's former top two executives, whose bonuses were tied to the manipulated earnings. Franklin D. Raines, the former chairman and chief executive, and J. Timothy Howard, who had been chief financial officer, were ousted from the company in December 2004, and investigators have laid much of the blame on their shoulders. … A lawyer for Mr. Raines declined to comment, and a lawyer representing Mr. Howard did not return phone calls yesterday. A Fannie Mae spokesman also declined to comment." The Washington Post (12/7, D1, Hilzenrath, 690K) also reports the story.

The AP (12/7, Gordon) reports, "Over the last two years, Fannie Mae has disclosed a passel of new accounting problems that had been uncovered in several areas, including its core business of issuing securities backed by the billions of dollars of home mortgages annually that it buys from lenders and bundles together for resale to investors worldwide. Other problems were revealed in loans, houses acquired through foreclosures, interest on delinquent home loans and reverse mortgages. … Fannie Mae escaped criminal prosecution over the accounting failure. The Justice Department had pursued a criminal investigation, but federal prosecutors said in August that they had shut down their probe without bringing any action. The SEC still could bring civil actions against individual executives, including people no longer at Fannie Mae, with the burden of proof less stringent than in criminal prosecutions."

Home Depot Probe Finds Backdated Options Grants. The Wall Street Journal (12/7, A3, Zimmerman) reports, "Home Depot Inc. said an internal investigation found that the company routinely backdated stock options for 20 years, from 1981 to 2000, and as a result it understated compensation expense by $200 million." The Journal continues, "With fiscal 2006 sales of $81.5 billion, the home-improvement retailer is one of the largest companies to admit to backdating stock options. The practice stopped in the fall of 2000 at the same time that current Chief Executive Bob Nardelli took the helm at the retailer. During the previous two decades, the company was run by founders Bernie Marcus and Arthur Blank, but neither founder received stock options. The company wouldn't say who did receive the awards and who made the decision to backdate them." The Journal adds, "Home Depot's admission that executives backdated options beginning more than 25 years ago is the earliest finding to date, and means the practice began far earlier than the technology boom when stock options became a popular compensation tool. In Home Depot's case, the practice goes back to its inception as a public company."

USA Today (12/7, 1B, Farrell) reports, "Home Depot disclosed in September that the Securities and Exchange Commission has begun an informal inquiry into the company's stock option practices and the U.S. Attorney's Office in New York has asked for information." USA adds, "For Home Depot's annual option grants and some quarterly grants from 1981 through November 2000, the 'stated grant date was routinely earlier than the actual date on which the grants were approved by a committee of the board of directors,' the company's statement said. 'In almost every instance, the stock price on the apparent approval date was higher than the price on the stated grant date.' … The company blamed 'management personnel, who have since left the company,' for the practice."

The Financial Times (12/7, Ward) reports, "The investigation, by a sub-committee of Home Depot's board, concluded that no intentional backdating had taken place since Bob Nardelli, the current chief executive, took charge in 2000, and cleared all current management and directors of wrongdoing." The Times adds, "Home Depot launched the inquiry in August after becoming the largest US company to be ensnared in the scandal over backdating of stock options to increase the potential value of compensation packages. … More than 160 companies have acknowledged that they are either facing regulatory inquiries or carrying out internal investigations of the way they handed out stock options. Home Depot said the unrecorded expenses would not have a material impact on its financial statements."

Pediatrix Probe Finds Backdated Options. Bloomberg (12/7, Pettypiece) reports, "Pediatrix Medical Group Inc. said a preliminary review found evidence that stock options were backdated and a board member has resigned." Bloomberg continues, "The company, the largest U.S. provider of care for premature babies, may have to record additional compensation expenses of $28 million for the period from 1995 through 2006, according to a statement distributed today by Business Wire." Bloomberg adds, "Pediatrix is among at least 186 companies that have disclosed internal or federal investigations into how they grant stock options to executives. At least 79 companies have announced they must restate previously reported financial results, and more than 60 executives and directors at companies under investigation have left their jobs."

GCs Fall Victim To Options Probes. Corporate Counsel (12/7, Osborne) reports, "Nothing in memory has ever caused as many GCs to lose their jobs as quickly as stock options backdating. In little more than a year, 12 general counsel have stepped down amid options problems at their companies. These legal chiefs constitute about a quarter of the 40-plus executives who have lost their jobs in the steadily expanding options controversy. Indeed, backdating has forced out as many GCs as CEOs." Corporate Counsel continues, "By all indications, the casualty list will only grow. 'I expect that we will see more general counsel lose their jobs,' says Erik Lie, the University of Iowa business professor whose research into backdating kindled the current firestorm." Corporate Counsel adds, "Some of these GCs won't deserve their fate, Lie adds: 'My sense is that a lot of innocent people might be implicated in this, including, possibly, general counsel.' Indeed, a review of government documents and official company statements about options-related investigations shows that in some cases, the GC appears to have been little more than a fall guy. In other instances, however, company and government reports have directly faulted in-house lawyers for failing to intervene when grant dates on options were deliberately altered to enrich their recipients." Corporate Counsel notes, "So far the U.S. Department of Justice and the Securities and Exchange Commission are scrutinizing option grants at more than 130 companies. But Lie thinks that another 70 may have engaged in backdating, based on his statistical analysis of 8,000 businesses that issued options between 1996 and 2005."

Ouster Of Insurance Giant's CEO After Options Probe Examined. The Wall Street Journal (12/7, A1, Bandler, Forelle) reports, "Over the past 15 years, the board of UnitedHealth Group Inc. couldn't have been more supportive of its chairman and chief executive, William McGuire. Directors lavished close to $2 billion in compensation on him, counting stock options, as he built UnitedHealth into one of the country's largest health insurers. … Last week, Dr. McGuire left his job, following a vote by the same board to dump him. It acted unanimously in October after concluding that his explanations for a pattern of unusually well-timed stock-option grants didn't add up. Dr. McGuire thus became one of the biggest casualties in the options backdating scandal, which so far has swept away more than 60 corporate officials, including 16 CEOs." The Journal continues, "How did one of America's most pliant boards turn on its star chief executive? Dr. McGuire's support slowly leached away over the course of a six-month internal investigation. Documentation that could support his defense was sparse. A board-ordered statistical analysis undercut his arguments. And his closest board ally was sidelined by a conflict of interest that unsettled other directors. In the end, directors felt pressure after their lawyer told them federal regulators appeared likely to charge the UnitedHealth chief.

… Now, Dr. McGuire and the board are girding for tense negotiations over how much of his giant cache of stock options, many still unexercised, he'll be able to take with him. He has already agreed to surrender about $200 million of those options' value, and people close to the situation say the company hopes to get back at the very least $250 million more. He is still likely to end up with more than $1 billion, although last week a federal judge hearing a shareholder lawsuit temporarily barred him from exercising any options or receiving any retirement pay."

Rep. Frank May Try To Roll Back DOJ Guidelines On Privilege Waivers. The Washington Post (12/7, D3, Johnson) reports, "Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.) yesterday held out an olive branch to business interests, announcing that he would be open to cooperating on trade, immigration and outsourcing if industry gave ground on union drives, health-care reforms and minimum-wage proposals." The Post continues, "At a briefing to introduce his legislative agenda, Frank, the incoming chairman of the House Financial Services Committee, addressed several hot-button issues, including a mounting push by business interests to slash what they consider burdensome regulations. … The lawmaker said he had met with leaders of the Securities and Exchange Commission and an accounting industry oversight board to urge them to give businesses some relief from a costly audit rule prescribed by the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley law. Over the next two weeks, the agencies are set to present proposed changes to the rule, which requires that auditors review corporate financial controls to prevent fraud and mistakes." The Post adds, "He reserved judgment on proposals that would make it more difficult for consumers to sue businesses, auditors and corporate board members, saying that the issue fell under the jurisdiction of another congressional panel. … But Frank said he agreed with several other recommendations, including indicting companies only as a last resort and rolling back controversial Justice Department guidelines that urge companies to waive their attorney-client privilege." The Post notes, "Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty has been considering changes to a memo that says when prosecutors should bring criminal charges against businesses, but he has not released any revisions. In the meantime, Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) is set to introduce legislation to supersede those guidelines as early as today."

Frank Says Economic Divide Country's "No. 1 Problem." The AP (12/7, Aversa) reports, "Incoming House Financial Services Committee Chairman Barney Frank said Wednesday he plans to delve deeper into why some Americans are not reaping the benefits of a mostly healthy economy, which he called the 'No. 1 problem' facing the country." Frank, "in a wide-ranging discussion with reporters, highlighted some of his priorities once he takes over the committee, when the new Democratic-controlled Congress convenes in early January. While the economy's growth, as measured by gross domestic product, has been expanding at a decent pace, the inflation-adjusted wages of workers have lagged. … There is an 'increasing disconnect between growth in the gross domestic product and the well-being of the average citizen,' Frank said."

HP Reportedly Ready To Settle California Civil Complaint Over Pretexting. CNET News (12/7, Fried) reports, "The California attorney general's office is expected to announce Thursday that it has settled civil complaints with Hewlett-Packard over the company's spying tactics, CNET News.com has learned." CNET continues, "The civil complaints are separate from the criminal charges already brought forward by the attorney general's office. Five people, including former HP Chairman Patricia Dunn, are facing felony charges in connection with HP's campaign to determine the source of unauthorized media leaks. All five have pleaded not guilty." CNET adds, "A lawyer for the attorney general's office confirmed that an announcement is scheduled for Thursday, but would not confirm or deny the civil settlement. CNET News.com reported last week that the state's top prosecutor was considering a civil complaint over HP's tactics. … As part of its effort to uncover the source of news stories, HP investigators employed the practice of 'pretexting,' or using false pretenses, to obtain the phone records of more than a dozen people, including board members, journalists and HP employees. The company also employed physical surveillance and sent a bogus tip with an electronic tracer to a CNET News.com reporter. .. After the company's tactics came to light, Congress held hearings, and the FBI and Justice Department also launched probes. HP also faces a formal SEC inquiry into the matter."

New York Judge Seeks Settlement In BOA-Parmalat Case. The Financial Times (12/7, Michaels) reports, "A judge in New York has ordered Bank of America and the former auditors to Parmalat to set out in writing their stances on a settlement in the multibillion dollar damages case surrounding the collapse of the Italian dairy company." The Times continues, "Judge Lewis Kaplan has also told Parmalat itself to submit what it would accept to settle the case, telling all groups involved to consider a global settlement and to send letters relating to a deal to Henry Pitman, another judge." The Times adds, "Judge Pitman is to review the letters and start to assess the possibility of a global settlement in the week of December 18, according to a transcript of a hearing presided over by Judge Kaplan at the end of November and obtained by the Financial Times. … Bank of America and auditors Grant Thornton and Deloitte are being targeted for damages as it is alleged they helped prolong fraud at the company, which collapsed at the end of 2003. None has admitted wrongdoing."

Korean Probe Of Lone Star Yields No Charges Against Company. The Wall Street Journal (12/7, B10, Ramstad, Yoon) reports from Seoul, South Korea, "Prosecutors here said they would charge former government officials and bankers for fraud in the 2003 sale of a controlling stake in Korea Exchange Bank to Lone Star Funds. But they brought no charges against the Dallas-based private-equity firm that has been trying to sell its stake in the bank since March." The Journal continues, "The prosecutors said in a news conference Thursday morning in Seoul that KEB managers and government officials worked with Lone Star to make the nation's fifth-largest bank look financially troubled in order to get regulatory approval for the 2003 deal. They called the transaction -- in which Lone Star paid $1.2 billion for 51% of the bank – 'inappropriate' but not illegal and said they continue to investigate." The Journal adds, "The prosecutors said they would indict 15 people in the matter, but they identified only two: Byeon Yang Ho, a former official at the Ministry of Finance and Economy, and Lee Kang Won, former chief executive officer of KEB. … Their probe began in late March, just a week after another Korean bank, Kookmin Bank, agreed to buy Lone Star's and other shares in KEB amounting to a 65% stake for $6.6 billion. Lone Star's profit in the deal would have amounted to about $4.5 billion. … The size of that deal and Lone Star's resulting profit shocked politicians and the Korean public. Many were upset when foreign investors over the past two years made big money by selling the control of Korean banks they had purchased in the wake of the country's economic collapse in the late 1990s."

WSJ Lauds Judge's Ruling In Lerach's Enron Suit. The Wall Street Journal (12/7) editorializes, "One reason the tort bar files so many frivolous lawsuits is that there have been very few penalties for its legal abuses. So congratulations are due to a Texas judge who last week ordered class-action kingpin Bill Lerach to pay up for his latest wretched excess." The Journal continues, "Federal Judge Melinda Harmon's good deed came at the end of a high-profile suit against Alliance Capital. She dismissed the case in summary fashion and invoked a little-used legal rule that requires the Lerach firm to pay Alliance's legal fees. While the plaintiffs might have had cause for filing the suit, the judge said, by the end of discovery it was clear 'the continuance of the claim against Alliance was at that point without merit' and so the Lerach firm must pay for dragging Alliance past that point. … We'd call that justice, with the caveat that Judge Harmon is probably too generous in saying Mr. Lerach had a reason to sue in the first place. … The suit was a Lerach Special, a novel attempt to pry money from a company only tangentially involved with the Enron debacle. An Alliance executive, Frank Savage, had served on Enron's board from 1999 to 2001. During his Enron tenure, he'd signed a registration statement for a bond issue that included false financial statements. Mr. Lerach's elastic legal theory was that Alliance had put Mr. Savage on the Enron board, and thus the company was liable for his actions." The Journal notes, "To be sure, Mr. Lerach's client was the University of California Board of Regents and no babe in the tort woods. Like many public pension representatives, the California regents have become willing fronts for the tort bar. But Judge Harmon is right that the real culprit here is Mr. Lerach, whose former firm, Milberg Weiss, was indicted this year for paying kickbacks to plaintiffs in its suits. Let's hope more judges take their duty to protect the integrity of the courts more seriously and make the loser of a frivolous lawsuit pay."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Mueller Tells Senate Committee Public Corruption Is FBI's Top Criminal Priority. The AP (12/7, Jordan) reports, "More than 1,000 government employees, including hundreds of police officers, have been convicted over the last two years in FBI corruption cases against crooked public officials, Director Robert Mueller said Wednesday." The AP continues, "In prepared testimony to the Senate panel that oversees the bureau, Mueller called public corruption cases the FBI's 'top criminal investigative priority.' … Public corruption 'erodes public confidence and undermines the strength of our democracy,' Mueller said in his testimony. 'Unchecked, it threatens our government and our way of life.' … His remarks also outlined strides the FBI has taken to protect the nation against terror attacks since 2001." The AP adds, "Over the last year, the Justice Department has targeted about a dozen high-profile House and Senate lawmakers in corruption cases – including three Republicans in the month before the Nov. 7 election that shifted power in Congress to Democrats. … Overall, 177 federal officials have been convicted in corruption cases over the last two years, Mueller said. During the same time, the FBI investigated cases against 158 state officials, 360 local officials and more than 365 police officers. It was not immediately clear how many police officers represented local, state or federal law enforcement agencies. … Last year alone, the FBI saw a 25 percent rise in its public corruption investigations, resulting in 890 indictments and 759 convictions, Mueller said. There are 2,118 cases still pending, he said." USA Today (12/7, 7A, 2.27M) briefly reports on Mueller's testimony, under the headline "FBI Corruption Probes Snare Officials, Officers."

The Washington Post (12/7, A9, Eggen) reports, "Congress isn't the only place where public corruption is on the rise. … More than 1,000 federal, state and local government employees across the country have been convicted in government corruption cases over the past two years, including hundreds of crooked police officers and others who have dipped into the taxpayers' till, FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III said yesterday." The Post continues, "The numbers underscore the extent to which public corruption has become a primary, if little-noticed, focus of FBI criminal investigators, taking its place alongside preventing terrorism as one the bureau's fundamental missions." The Post adds, "All told, public-corruption investigations have surged by 30 percent in the past four years, to more than 2,000, officials said. The FBI now dedicates more than 600 agents and 15 percent of its criminal investigative resources to government graft. … The highest-profile cases have been in Congress, including the probe into the web of corruption surrounding former lobbyist Jack Abramoff that led to guilty pleas from former congressman Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio) and some Capitol Hill aides, and a separate investigation that led to a guilty plea from former congressman Randy 'Duke' Cunningham (R-Calif.). The FBI also prompted a showdown with House leaders earlier this year after it searched the Capitol Hill office of Rep. William J. Jefferson (D-La.) in connection with a probe of financial deals he was involved in. … But most of the FBI's corruption inquiries focus on state legislatures, city halls and police stations, Mueller said. The list of convictions over the past two years includes 158 state officials, 360 local officials and 365 police officers, Mueller said. One hundred seventy-seven of the convictions involved federal officials." The Post notes, "Law-enforcement experts said it is impossible to say whether the increase in corruption cases reflects a rise in criminality among public officials or the greater emphasis at the FBI on such prosecutions. … The number of FBI agents assigned to corruption cases has ballooned from 451 in 2001 to 618 in 2006, officials said, and Mueller has made corruption the top priority for the bureau's criminal investigative division."

Local Television. WMBC- TV (12/6, 5:00 p.m.) New York, broadcasted, "The FBI's top man tells a Senate panel that public corruption is the Bureau's top criminal investigative priority. Robert Mueller tells the Senate Oversight Committee more than 1,000 crooked government employees have been convicted in the past two years. Among those were 360 police officers. The bureau saw a 25% jump in public corruption investigations last year."

WSPA- TV (12/6, 5:00 p.m.) in Greenville, Spartanburg, Asheville, broadcasts, "Fighting public corruption is the top priority of the FBI according to the bureau chief Robert Mueller. Today he told a Senate panel the fight against terror gets the most attention. But the FBI has busted more than 1000 government employees in the past two years in corruption cases."

WBBH- TV (12/6, 4:00 p.m.) Ft. Myers, Naples, broadcasts, "Fighting terrorism is important, but public corruption is the FBI's top investigative priority. FBI director, Robert Mueller told a Senate panel more than 1,000 crooked government employees have been convicted over the past two years. That includes more than 360 police officers. And a dozen high profile House and Senate members."

WZVN- TV (12/6, 11:00 p.m.) Ft. Myers, Naples, broadcasts, "Conviction of 1,000 crooked government employees in the past two years. FBI director Robert Mueller explains they have seen a 25 percent hike last year in public corruption investigations. The Justice Department targeted dozen high-profile House and Senate members necessary corruption cases just in the past year alone." WGME- TV (12/6, 5:30 p.m.) in Portland, Auburn also broadcasted this story.

FBI Investigating Leak Of Weldon Probe. Bloomberg (12/7, Schmidt) reports, "The Federal Bureau of Investigation is conducting a leak investigation into the disclosure several weeks before the congressional elections that the FBI is probing U.S. Representative Curt Weldon, the agency's director said." Bloomberg continues, "FBI chief Robert Mueller told the Senate Judiciary Committee today that the agency is pursuing 'a series' of leak probes of its agents, including one involved in the Weldon matter. The Pennsylvania Republican, who lost his seat on Nov. 7, was involved in a tight race when the news of the investigation broke. … 'I was exceptionally disappointed, and that is being charitable in terms of my response,' Mueller said about the leak. 'It is unfair in advance of an election, but, as importantly to us, it adversely affected the investigation.'" Bloomberg adds, "The FBI probe of alleged influence peddling was first reported Oct. 13 by McClatchy Newspapers, which cited an anonymous law enforcement agent. Three days later, agents raided the home of Weldon's daughter and five other targets. … The FBI is probing whether Weldon used his political influence to steer business to help his daughter Karen win consulting deals, a person familiar with the matter has said. … Mueller said that at least one of the bureau's leak probes is being handled as a criminal investigation. He told the senators that he believes investigators are having 'some success' in discovering who the leakers are but declined to give any details."

In a third widely-distributed story, the AP (12/7, Jordan) also reports, "Mueller described himself as 'exceptionally disappointed, and that is being charitable, in terms of my response upon hearing about the leak.' … Senators scolded Mueller about the leaks," with Specter saying "the disclosures were 'just disastrous' for suspects who have not been charged, much less proven guilty." The AP adds, "Disclosing information a grand jury is considering is a serious crime, and such leaks often aim "to sway public opinion in favor of the government," said Martin Pinales, president of the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers. … On the other hand, leaks may sometimes be the price of having an open government in a democracy, said Ronald Collins, a scholar at the First Amendment Center."

Mueller Apologizes For Agent's Comments. WRC-TV (12/6, 5:00 p.m.) in Washington DC, broadcasts, "FBI Director Robert Mueller apologized for an agent's comments. The woman was a woman at the University Of Vermont and killed in October after a chance meeting with alleged killer Brian Rooney. Lawyers tried to get the murder charges dismissed. After Agent Fuller wrote or what was described as an inflammatory column about the case, Patrick Leahy chastised the agents and Muller responded."

US Charges Son Of Former Liberian President With Torture. The Miami Herald (12/7, Weaver) reports, "A federal grand jury in Miami today indicted the son of former Liberian President Charles Taylor on torture charges in what is believed to be the first criminal case of its kind in the country." The Herald continues, "Charles McArthur Emmanuel, 29, accused of committing atrocities in Liberia as the former head of a paramilitary unit in his father's government, already is in custody in the Federal Detention Center in Miami. He faces sentencing Thursday on a separate passport-fraud conviction. … Emmanuel, a U.S. citizen born in Boston who is known as 'Chuckie' Taylor, admitted that he falsified his application for a passport to enter the United States from Trinidad on March 30. He was arrested by U.S. Customs and Border Protection agents upon his arrival at Miami International Airport." The Herald adds, "His father, who was arrested the day before in Africa, faces a U.N.-backed war crimes trial for alleged atrocities during Sierre Leone's civil war. The elder Taylor also has been linked to killings, kidnappings, torture and other violence in Liberia, where his son headed the 'Demon Forces,' the security unit blamed for many of the alleged atrocities."

The Washington Post (12/7, A14, Smith) reports, "The indictment involves a rare use of a U.S. human rights law against a foreign national or a U.S. citizen over an act committed outside U.S. territory. Taylor's son allegedly committed the torture in the Liberian capital of Monrovia in July 2002, while he headed an 'antiterrorist unit' charged with protecting Taylor." The Post continues, "The son…has been in a Florida jail for the past nine months on charges of trying to enter the United States on a false passport. In a court pleading in that case, his attorney said that Belfast, 29, has 'consistently denied any criminal acts while in Africa.'" The Post adds, "Human Rights Watch, an advocacy group, had been lobbying the Bush administration to invoke the statute against Taylor since his arrest at the Miami airport after a flight from Trinidad. Amnesty International, which said in 2002 that at least 150 human rights abusers were living in the United States and called the country a 'haven for torturers,' had separately been pressing the Justice Department to invoke the 1994 criminal statute. … The charges are 'important for Liberia, but also important because it opens a precedent,' said Elise Keppler, a lawyer in Human Rights Watch's international justice program. .. .Until now, however, the government had preferred to seek extradition rather than criminal indictments. 'These cases are hard cases,' Julie L. Myers, head of the Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) agency, said at a news conference yesterday. 'In this case alone, we had agents from . . . three different agencies flying all over the world to get evidence.' … Myers called the indictment a milestone. She said it will send 'a clear message that the United States will not be a safe haven for human rights violators.'"

The Washington Times (12/7, Seper) reports, "Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher said the indictment, handed up in U.S. District Court in Miami, accuses Roy Belfast Jr., 29, who also is known as Charles Taylor Jr., Charles Taylor II and Charles McArthur Emmanuel, with one count of torture, one count of conspiracy to torture, and one count of using a firearm during the commission of a violent crime. … Mrs. Fisher said the indictment charges Belfast, who was born in the United States, with participating in the July 2002 torture in Monrovia, Liberia, while he was serving as chief of a violent paramilitary unit during his father's regime." The Times adds, "According to the indictment, the victim -- who was not identified -- was abducted from his home and transported to various locations, ultimately arriving at the residence of Mr. Taylor, who was then president of Liberia. It said Belfast observed questioning of the victim at this location before he was transported to the residence of a co-conspirator for continued interrogation. … While at the residence, the indictment said, Belfast and others tortured the victim, including burning his flesh with a hot iron, burning various parts of his body with scalding water, repeatedly electrically shocking the victim's genitalia and other body parts, and rubbing salt into the victim's wounds. … Belfast is in federal custody in connection with a criminal charge of passport fraud, to which he pleaded guilty on Sept. 15. He admitted lying on his passport application by listing his father as 'Steven Daniel Smith' rather than Charles Taylor or his stepfather, Roy Belfast. His sentencing is scheduled for today."

The New York Times (12/7, Johnston) reports, "The three-count indictment said the victim, who is not named, was a political opponent of the Taylor government. The victim was taken from his home to several locations, including the president's residence, and later to the home of a co-conspirator in the Liberian security service. … There the man was repeatedly burned with a hot iron and scalding water, the indictment said. He was given electric shocks and salt was rubbed into his wounds. The interrogation was carried out at gunpoint, the indictment said. … The United States attorney in Miami, R. Alexander Acosta, said these acts violated federal law. 'Such conduct is criminal and constitutes torture, and must be prosecuted,' he said."

The AP (12/7, Anderson) reports, "Because Emmanuel, 29, was born in the United States, prosecutors charged him under a 1994 law making it a crime for a U.S. citizen to commit torture or war crimes abroad. Emmanuel is already in custody in Miami awaiting sentencing for falsifying his father's name to get a passport he used to enter the U.S. from Trinidad in March." The AP notes, "Alice Fisher, assistant U.S. attorney general for the Justice Department's criminal division, said the indictment was the first time charges under the torture laws had been brought. Emmanuel faces a potential life prison sentence. … Emmanuel's father, meanwhile, faces trial next spring in The Hague, Netherlands, on charges of war crimes and crimes against humanity for allegedly overseeing the murder, rape and mutilation of thousands of people during Sierra Leone's bloody 10-year civil war, many hacked to death with machetes. Taylor has pleaded not guilty."

AFP (12/7) reports, "Taylor on Wednesday was charged with one count of torture, one count of conspiracy to torture and one count of using a firearm during the commission of a violent crime, the Justice Department said in a statement. … Specifically, he is charged with participating in the torture of a person in July 2002 who had been abducted from his home and taken to the residence of a member of the Liberian Special Security Service. … 'The allegations in this case include acts of torture, such as burning flesh with a hot iron, burning flesh with scalding water, and applying electric shocks,' US Attorney Acosta said in the statement."

Tennessee County Official Sentenced To Two Years In Prison For Bribery. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (12/7) reports former Shelby County Commissioner Michael Hooks Sr. "was sentenced Wednesday to slightly more than two years in prison for bribery." He "is one of 11 people, including five current or former state lawmakers, charged in an undercover FBI investigation code-named Tennessee Waltz. Judge J. Daniel Breen noted Hooks' guilty plea and statements of remorse in sentencing him to 26 months, less than the federal guidelines." The AP notes, "Hooks grew up in the home of his uncle, Benjamin Hooks, 81, the former national director of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. The elder Hooks said he had advised his nephew to admit his wrongdoing." The Memphis Commercial Appeal (12/7, Buser, 163K) notes, "Breen and federal prosecutors were clearly impressed by Hooks' admission of guilt and his refrain from criticizing the FBI's Tennessee Waltz investigation that recorded his downfall. 'He has accepted responsibility about as sincerely and publicly as he can,' Asst. U.S. Atty. Tim DiScenza told the judge. By comparison, former state senator Roscoe Dixon's defense in his bribery trial included allegations of entrapment and racism."

Tennessee Professor Suggests Probe Racially, Politically Motivated. WMC-TV Memphis (12/6, Hartman) reported on its Web site from a broadcast story, "A cloud of public corruption is looming over Shelby County; troubled elected officials bear a common thread which is impossible to ignore." Rhodes College Prof. Charles McKinney "says citizens must be able to trust their elected officials as well as the government agencies monitoring them. Specifically, McKinney says, the FBI. McKinney adds, 'What does it mean that the vast majority are Democratic or, perhaps more importantly, are African-American. If somebody is targeting Democrats, the vast majority of them, that's going to mean one of two things: one, they're targeting Democrats, and two, they're targeting African-American Democrats. If that is, in fact, the case,' says McKinney. McKinney says that this case is another unfortunate example of the peeling and stripping away of public trust."

Former US Army Contractor Pleads Guilty To Taking Bribes. The AP (12/7) reports, "A former director of contracting for the Army pleaded guilty in federal court to accepting more than $350,000 in cash, as well as airline tickets and hotel rooms, as bribes in exchange for awarding contracts at an Army recreational facility in Germany, prosecutors said Wednesday." Steven Potoski of Shriesheim, Germany, "a former civilian Army employee, pleaded guilty to one count of bribery and three counts of filing false tax returns, Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher for the Criminal Division said in a statement released from Washington." The AP notes, "In all, Potoski accepted over $350,000 in bribes from 15 contractors or subcontractors, two American contractors, 12 German contractors, and one British contractor, Fisher said. Bribes also came in the form of home renovations, automobile maintenance, airline tickets, hotel rooms and furniture, among other things."

Pennsylvania State Senator Seeks Removal Of Corruption Trial Judge. The Philadelphia Inquirer (12/7, Shiffman, 385K) reports, "State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo says the federal judge supervising a grand jury investigation of him should step aside, citing a long history of 'political animosity' between the judge and senator. U.S. District Judge Legrome D. Davis has declined to recuse himself, saying he bears no animosity to Fumo, who strongly opposed the judge's nominations to the Philadelphia Court of Common Pleas and the federal bench. In a sealed order issued in July, Davis called Fumo's prior opposition nothing more than 'political gamesmanship.' A federal appeals court agreed with Davis, and now Fumo has appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court." The Inquirer notes, "The FBI and IRS are trying to determine whether Fumo used a South Philadelphia charity, Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods, for personal or political advantage."

Philadelphia Mobsters Fear FBI Intensifying Investigations. The Philadelphia City Paper (12/6, McGarvey) reported, "Many mobsters in the Philadelphia Cosa Nostra are dreaming of a jail-free holiday season, but they're worried that all they'll get for Christmas are chunks of coal taking the form of federal racketeering indictments. Fueling concerns is the fact that undercover feds have been seen closely monitoring alleged mob meeting places in South Philly, Northeast Philly, Cherry Hill and Margate. It seems as if purported boss Joseph 'Uncle Joe' Ligambi is the focus of attention. 'The FBI is following Ligambi around the clock,' a mob associate tells City Paper. 'A lot of people think something big is coming down the pike.'" However, "one local defense attorney who has represented mobsters says he thinks the feds are merely floating indictment rumors because they've wiretapped the local mob. 'It's called "tickling the wire,"' the attorney explains. 'The police tell the press. The press tells everyone else and when the gangsters hear about it, they start blabbing to each other over the telephone. The FBI hopes that someone will panic and say something incriminating.'"

FBI Says Gang Members Increasingly Infiltrating US Armed Forces. The European edition of Stars and Stripes (12/7, Robson) reports, "U.S. criminal gangs have gained a foothold in the U.S. military and are using overseas deployments to spread tentacles around the globe, according to the FBI. FBI gang investigator Jennifer Simon said in an e-mail to Stars and Stripes this week that gang members have been documented on or near U.S. military bases in Germany, Italy, Japan, South Korea and Iraq. 'It's no secret that gang members are prevalent in the armed forces, including internationally,' Simon said, adding that the FBI is preparing to release a report on gangs in the military." Stars and Stripes adds, "Gang-related activity in the military is highly underreported, and the Army is the only branch of the military that collects gang-related statistics, she wrote. 'It's often in the military's best interest to keep these incidents quiet, given low recruitment numbers and recent negative publicity. The relaxation of recruiting standards, recruiter misconduct and the military's lack of enforcement (gang membership is not prohibited in the Army) have compounded the problem and allowed gang member presence in the military to proliferate,' Simon said."

Federal Judge Directs Maryland Officials To Test Recruiting Doctors For Executions. The AP (12/7, Witte) reports, "A federal judge considering challenges to Maryland's practice of execution by lethal injection wants the state to explore whether general surgeons, anesthesiologists and other more highly trained medical personnel would be willing to take part in executions." The AP continues, "Lawyers for death row inmate and convicted murderer Vernon Evans Jr. argue the people who currently carry out lethal injections are not qualified to know if an inmate is properly anesthetized before being put to death." The AP adds, "They have argued Evans' veins are so damaged from intravenous drug use that current execution protocol would subject him to "an unnecessary risk of unconstitutional pain and suffering." … They have asked U.S. District Judge Benson Legg to require the state to add a general surgeon and either an anesthesiologist or a certified nurse anesthetist to the lethal injection team." The AP notes, "Attorneys representing the state have argued such specialists are not needed because an execution is not a medical procedure. … The state also has argued that finding such specialists would be difficult. The American Medical Association, the American Society of Anesthesiologists and the American Nurses Association strongly discourage members from having anything to do with lethal injections. … But Evans' lawyers have argued there are medical specialists willing to take part. They have cited a study in the Annals of Internal Medicine that found 19 percent of surveyed physicians expressed a willingness to inject the drugs. The 2001 study also found 41 percent of the doctors surveyed would do at least one of the AMA-prohibited actions."

Judge Sets Bail For Two Of Three Charged With Sex Trafficking In Colorado. The AP (12/5) reported, "A federal magistrate set bail at $20,000 each for two people accused of running a prostitution ring but ordered a third suspect held without bail." Wai Chong Kong and Kit Chi Ho "were ordered Monday to wear monitoring bracelets on their ankles if released on bail. Magistrate Judge O. Edward Schlatter denied bail for Kah Poh Cheah…who prosecutors said is in the United States illegally on an expired visa. The three were arrested last month on suspicion of operating brothels out of four Denver-area apartments. Authorities said some of the prostitutes were working to pay off debts of up to $18,000 for fake visas that got them into the United States illegally from Asia." The Rocky Mountain News (12/5, Burnett) notedd Kit Chi Ho "wept as she asked a federal judge Monday to let her go home to her two young children. … On Monday, a federal grand jury returned an 18-count indictment, accusing each defendant of conspiracy and seven counts of transport of an individual for prostitution. Kong also is charged with two counts of money laundering, and Ho and Cheah each are charged with two counts of using interstate facilities to promote prostitution."

Virginia Man Pleads Guilty To $8.3 Million Investment Fraud. The AP (12/7) reports that a "Richmond man accused of cheating more than 350 investors out of about $8.3 million pleaded guilty Wednesday to mail fraud and money laundering. James E. Brown Jr. faces a maximum of 120 years in prison and fines of up to $16 million on each count when he is sentenced March 14 by U.S. District Judge Richard Williams, according to federal prosecutors. Brown was arrested in September after an investigation by the FBI, the U.S. Postal Inspection Service and the Internal Revenue Service. Authorities charged that Brown, owner and president of Brown Investment Services, promised investors he could double their money every 30 business days through trading on the Foreign Currency Exchange Market." The AP notes, "Little of the money was invested, and Brown paid early investors with cash coming in from subsequent investors to lull them into believing the investments were paying off as promised."

Former Fort Bliss Soldier Pleads Guilty To Child Porn Charges. The El Paso Times (12/7, Fonce-Olivas) reports, "A 27-year-old former Fort Bliss soldier pleaded guilty Wednesday in U.S District Court to charges of producing and possessing child pornography, the office of U.S. Attorney Johnny Sutton announced. Gary Alan Hernandez Jr., a former first lieutenant in the 204th Military Intelligence Battalion, pleaded guilty to one count of production and one count of possession of material involving the sexual exploitation of children." The Times notes, "As part of his guilty plea, he admitted that on April 16, 2005, he enticed a minor female to engage in sexually explicit conduct that would be photographed and distributed on the Internet. He was arrested Aug. 3, 2005, by FBI agents."

Florida Prosecutors Drop Charges In Girls Gone Wild Video Series Case. The AP (12/7) reports from Panama City, FL, "All but eight of the dozens of felony charges once faced by producers of the Girls Gone Wild video series about young women baring their breasts and acting in other sexual situations have been dropped by prosecutors due to a lack of evidence in the case that is set for trial next year." The AP continues, "Assistant State Attorney Mark Graham said he can support only second-degree felony charges of using children in sexual performances in his case against producer Joseph Francis, Francis' companies and employees. … The remaining charges could be dropped at a Jan. 3 hearing when a judge considers a defense motion to dismiss all charges in the 2003 case." The AP adds, "Graham filed the motion to reduce the charges on Monday in response to the request from Francis' attorney Aaron Dyer for all charges to be dropped because of police misconduct. A judge in July threw out evidence investigators gathered while searching Francis' condominiums and private jet because of problems with the search warrants. … A federal civil lawsuit against Francis filed by the two women filmed is pending."

Maryland Pastor Fatally Shot Outside Church. The Washington Post (12/7, B01, Partlow, Harris) reports, "A well-known Prince George's County minister who runs a transitional home for poor families died yesterday after being gunned down on the steps of his church in the morning." The Post continues, "The Rev. Milton L. Moore was outside the entrance of the Warriors for Christ Ministries in Suitland about 7 a.m. when he was struck in the upper body and bullets shattered a glass door, police and relatives said. He died at 4:25 p.m. … The shooting happened outside the three-story beige brick ministry building at 2420 Brooks Dr., which shares a parking lot with Drew-Freeman Middle School. Vernell Simon, 66, who lives across Brooks Drive from the ministry building, said he heard five or six shots, followed minutes later by sirens." The Post adds, "People inside the ministry building told police that they heard arguing outside before the shots. .. .Moore, 50, was shot once in the upper body, police said. … Several advocates for the homeless in Prince George's said Moore's ministry plays an important role in the county's social safety net and helps people get off the streets until they can find more permanent shelter."

Police Say Same Person May Have Killed Virginia Elderly Women. The Washington Post (12/7, B6, Jackman, 690K) reports, "Two elderly women slain three months apart in Springfield may have been killed by the same person -- someone with ties to their community who happened to come along, saw them alone and pounced on the opportunity to attack them, Fairfax County police said yesterday. 'I'm not going to say it's a serial killer,' Capt. Michael Spradlin, head of Fairfax's criminal investigations bureau, said at a news conference. But he said investigators decided that the cases were linked after looking at the common elements." The Post notes, "There was no indication that the women knew each other, Spradlin said. … Police have been discussing the cases with analysts from the FBI's Behavioral Sciences Unit, but Spradlin said he did not want to release any possible profile of the killer, for fear of limiting tips on potential suspects."

CIVIL LAW:

Family Sues US Mint Over Confiscation Of Rare Coins. The AP (12/7, Loviglio) reports from Philadelphia, "A family is suing the U.S. Mint, saying it illegally seized 10 gold coins that are among the rarest and most valuable in the world that the family found among a dead relative's possessions." The AP continues, "The lawsuit, filed

Tuesday in U.S. District Court in Philadelphia, accuses the Mint of violating the Constitution and breaking federal forfeiture laws by refusing to return the 1933 'double eagle' coins to the family after it handed the coins over to have their authenticity confirmed." The AP adds, "Plaintiffs Joan S. Langbord and her sons, Roy and David, are seeking the immediate return of the coins, said their attorney, Barry H. Berke. … Defendants named in the suit include the Mint, the Treasury Department, and officials in those agencies. … The coins, which Mint officials have said are so rare that their value could not be calculated, feature a flying eagle on one side and a figure representing liberty on the other. There were 445,500 minted in 1933, but they were melted down before being released into circulation when President Franklin D. Roosevelt took the country off the gold standard. … A handful escaped, however. Two were deliberately set aside and are at the Smithsonian Institution. The Mint has said any others in existence were obtained illegally, but agreed after a lengthy court battle to allow one of the coins to be sold at auction in 2002 for $7.59 million - the highest price ever paid for a coin - after its owner agreed to split the proceeds with the Mint. … Langbord, who discovered the coins in 2003 in a safe deposit box belonging to her deceased father, longtime Philadelphia jeweler Israel Switt, was aware of that case and contacted the Mint to disclose the coins' existence and 'attempt to reach an amicable resolution of any issues that might be raised,' the lawsuit states. … She handed the coins over to the Mint to be authenticated, but the Mint refused to give them back, saying they must have been stolen from the Philadelphia Mint in the early 1930s because they had never been in circulation, according to the lawsuit."

Bankruptcy Filings Down After One Year Under New Law. The AP (12/7, Caterinicchia) reports, "Bankruptcy filings have dropped dramatically in the year since a law went into effect aimed at curbing abuse of the system. But it's too soon to gauge the act's effectiveness, the legislation's most ardent supporters said Wednesday at a hearing held to study the law's impact." The AP continues, "About 750,000 personal bankruptcy cases were filed in the month before the law went into effect Oct. 17, 2005, compared to fewer than 500,000 cases in the past 12 months. … Many consumers rushed to file ahead of the new law, which requires a 'means test' that determines whether filers qualify to have their debt erased under Chapter 7 or must file for a type of bankruptcy that requires repayment of a percentage of their debt over time. … 'Means testing is a workable system,' says Clifford J. White III, director of the Justice Department's Executive Office for U.S. Trustees, which has responsibility for the bankruptcy system. But White added that the test's long-term effectiveness is unknown since the number of filings has been so low." The AP adds, "White, who testified before the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on Administrative Oversight and the Courts, also urged the mandating of 'smart forms' that would automate most court procedures involved in bankruptcy filings. That could help keep the bankruptcy system efficient if the number of filings increase in the future as trends indicate they will, he said. … From January to September, the personal and business bankruptcies dropped to 443,750 from 1.41 million in the year-ago period, according to data released Tuesday by the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts. Personal filings fell to 429,522 from 1.38 million, while business bankruptcies declined to 14,228 from 26,275 in the same period. … But the subcommittee's incoming chairman, Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., said the bill may not go far enough in distinguishing between people who were financially ruined for legitimate reasons like job loss or the death of a spouse, and those who are 'reckless high rollers.'"

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Probe Clears Florida Police In 2005 Drug Raid Death. The St. Petersburg (FL) Times (12/7, Tisch) reports, "Federal prosecutors have determined that a Pinellas sheriff's deputy did not violate the civil rights of a St. Petersburg man who was shot and killed in April 2005 during a drug raid." The Times continues, "Jarrell S. Walker, 19, was shot to death by Deputy Christopher Taylor after a SWAT team burst into Walker's home as part of a drug investigation April 12, 2005. … Deputies found drugs and guns in the home. Walker, who was unarmed, was shot twice in the back." The Times adds, "The FBI said in May 2005 that it would investigate whether Walker's civil rights were violated. … 'After careful consideration, we concluded that the evidence does not establish a prosecutable violation of the federal criminal civil rights statutes,' said Mark J. Kappelhoff, section chief of the criminal section of the U.S. Department of Justice's Civil Rights Division, in a letter to the Sheriff's Office." The Times notes, "The shooting prompted controversy and criticism from some community leaders, especially in St. Petersburg's African-American community. Walker was black;

Taylor is white. … The Pinellas-Pasco State Attorney's Office ruled the shooting justifiable homicide because, it said, Walker was reaching for something under a couch and refused repeated orders to show his hands. A loaded handgun was found nearby. … However, Pinellas-Pasco State Attorney Bernie McCabe noted in a report: 'I cannot help but note that this is another relatively young black male who has met his death at the hands of law enforcement in Pinellas County.' He urged the Sheriff's Office to review its policy on deadly force. … Sheriff Jim Coats did just that, changing policy to make it more clear when deadly force should be used. … The federal civil rights review came at the request of the St. Petersburg NAACP, whose leadership disagreed with McCabe's decision to clear Taylor of wrongdoing."

Protestors Urge Action After Atlanta Police Shootings. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (12/7, Simpson) reports, "Vowing to go to jail for their cause, about 50 protestors blocked traffic on Memorial Drive Wednesday in the latest march to draw attention to police shootings in DeKalb County." The AJC continues, "Marchers who made the short trek from the county jail complex to nearby I-285, included former DeKalb NAACP president John Evans and state Rep. 'Able' Mable Thomas (D-Atlanta). … Some of the marchers said they were willing to be arrested for the cause. No police were on the scene shortly after 11 a.m." The AJC adds, "The march is the third of its kind in recent weeks. This year, DeKalb police have been involved in 12 deadly shootings. One officer has been killed. … Some community activists have called for the U.S. Justice Department to investigate. The DeKalb County District Attorneys office has agreed to review all of the shootings."

Group Sends Letter To Gonzales. WAGA-TV (12/6, 12:00 p.m.) broadcasts in Atlanta, "We want to ask Mr. Vernon Jones how much more a mother has to cry for their child, how much more kids have to cry for their parents. And the group has written a letter to US Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez. They have not heard back yet. So they will be going to the county commission's meeting next Tuesday."

Columnist Decries Slow Pace Of NYC Police Shooting Probe. In his column for the New York Times (12/7), Bob Herbert writes, "I don't know whether the undercover cops who shot and killed Sean Bell and wounded his two friends should be criminally indicted. I wasn't there and not enough information has emerged publicly to make a determination. … What I do know is that the investigation of this shooting in Jamaica, Queens, in which the victims were unarmed and seemed to have no intention of threatening the police, is not being conducted in a timely or effective fashion." Herbert continues, "While the local community is seething with anger over the shooting, there are investigators scrambling like mad to find dirt to throw on the victims and locate any evidence that might, however remotely, tend to justify the shooting. But the authorities have not even asked the cops, who fired 50 bullets at the car with the three men inside, what happened. That is insane." Herbert adds, "The office of the Queens district attorney, Richard Brown, is leading the investigation into the shooting. For procedural reasons that have to do with concerns about inadvertently conferring some degree of immunity on the officers, the D.A. has asked the Police Department not to interview the officers who shot at the car. … But the D.A.'s office has been moving in super-slow motion on the case, and no one from that office has interviewed the cops, either. Mr. Brown told me yesterday that he has a tremendous amount of additional information to gather before his office attempts to speak to the cops. … The truth is that neither the Police Department nor the district attorneys in New York are equipped to properly investigate controversial police shootings. The prosecutors and the cops have a special, co-dependent relationship that exists around-the-clock, year-in and year-out. They work together all the time on criminal cases and other matters. They view one another as members of a close-knit criminal justice family. They watch each other's backs. … The interests of the larger community can be served only when problematic police shootings are thoroughly and fairly investigated by objective, impartial and independent investigators. … A special investigative office, which could look at these incidents and encounters only after the fact, is not enough. There is also a need for Mayor Bloomberg and Police Commissioner Ray Kelly to become proactive, to acknowledge that racism is still an issue in the Police Department and to overhaul police training and address poisonous police attitudes in an effort to prevent these senseless tragedies."

New York Anti-Terror Unit Sued For Anti-Muslim Rhetoric. The AP (12/7, Neumeister) reports, "A celebrated police anti-terrorism cyber unit became a beehive of anti-Muslim rhetoric after a city consultant unleashed hundreds of hateful e-mails saying Muslims and Arabs were all potential terrorists, a unit member said in a lawsuit filed Tuesday." The AP continues, "The Department of Correction lieutenant, listed as John Doe Anti-Terrorism Officer on the lawsuit in U.S. District Court in Manhattan, said he was subjected to a hostile work environment, great emotional anguish, public humiliation and illegal retaliation. .. The Egyptian-born man asked for unspecified damages, saying he had suffered severe emotional distress, mental anguish, depression, physical injuries, illness, loss of pay and benefits and loss of advancement opportunities as a member of the elite anti-terror unit." The AP adds, "The man, described in the lawsuit as 'a proud Arab-American, a practicing Muslim and a patriot,' blamed the city for failing to respond to his repeated complaints about the contractor, who was alleged to have sent e-mails saying 'Burning the hate-filled Koran should be viewed as a public service at the least' and 'Without Islam, there wouldn't be any Islamic terror.' … He said the hateful rhetoric, unchecked by supervisors, infected the workplace, where other employees felt comfortable making anti-Muslim comments and jokes and where a high-ranking police official thought it was OK to say, 'All Arabs are animals.'"

Judge To Decide On Osceola, FL, Voting Plan. The Orlando Sentinel (12/7, Pino) reports, "A 17-month-long battle over how Osceola elects county commissioners could come to a close in federal court today." The Sentinel continues, "The remaining issue before U.S. District Judge Gregory A. Presnell is whether the county's proposal to create a system of at-large and single-member seats by increasing the size of the board to seven commissioners will pass legal muster." The Sentinel adds, "Presnell issued an injunction halting commission elections in June and ruled in October that the 'racially polarized' county's at-large voting system penalizes Hispanics in violation of the Voting Rights Act. … On Wednesday, commissioners voted 4-0 to accept a redistricting plan drafted by the U.S. Department of Justice, rather than a plan drawn up by county experts, after Presnell this week rejected a key part of the county's proposal. Commissioner Paul Owen was absent." The Sentinel notes, "In drawing proposed new district lines, Osceola had used 2005 U.S. Census population estimates and a county database of certificates of occupancy to distribute the approximately 59,000 people who have moved to the county since 2000. Presnell said he was "unconvinced" by the data and ordered the county to submit a plan using 2000 Census figures by Wednesday. … 'I'm going to support the resolution' to adopt the Justice Department's plan, Commissioner Tom Franklin said. 'But I think we should express our concern that the court did not allow us enough time to seek public input.' … The plan adopted Wednesday has district lines that do not require two commissioners to face each other in an upcoming election. As a result, Assistant County Attorney George Nickerson said, the Justice Department will accept staggered elections. In its initial proposal, the agency has wanted all five commission seats on the ballot at the same time."

ANTITRUST:

Texas Man Indicted For E-Rate Fraud. The AP (12/7) reports, "A contractor was indicted in Texas on Wednesday and charged with defrauding a federal program that provides computers and Internet access to economically disadvantaged schools and libraries." The AP continues, "A federal grand jury in McAllen, Texas, returned a nine-count indictment alleging that the former president and owner of ATE Tel Solutions Inc. — Rafael G. Adame — committed wire fraud, according to the Justice Department." The AP adds, "The E-Rate program is funded by telephone customers through a special fee included in their bills. The indictment alleges Adame submitted fraudulent charges on behalf of his company to the program's administrator, collecting $141,273 in payments. … The Justice Department said that including Wednesday's filing, 14 individuals and 12 companies have been charged as part of an ongoing investigation into the program. Thus far, defendants have agreed to pay fines and restitution totaling more than $40 million." The AP notes, "The indictment alleges Adame, by making false representations on invoices filed with the E-Rate administrator, received payments in excess of what was authorized and for work that was not performed."

Antitrust Probes Roil Municipal Bond Market. Bloomberg (12/7, Selway, Braun) reports, "The first-ever antitrust probe of the municipal bond market is roiling an industry that states and cities depend on to finance everything from garbage trucks to schools." Bloomberg continues, "U.S. Justice Department prosecutors subpoenaed more than a dozen banks and insurers three weeks ago, seizing documents from three brokers in a search for evidence of bid rigging. Lawyers say it's the biggest criminal investigation of the almost 200- year-old market, where municipalities have more than $2 trillion of debt outstanding. … 'You don't want to have something like this going on,' said Robert Doty, a Sacramento, California-based adviser with American Governmental Financial Services Co., who is the vice chairman of the National Association of Independent Public Finance Advisors. 'It's just bad for the reputation of the market.'" Bloomberg adds, "JPMorgan Chase & Co., the third-largest bank in the U.S., American International Group Inc., the world's largest insurance company, and Financial Security Assurance Holdings Ltd., a unit of Brussels-based financial services company Dexia SA, are among the companies that received subpoenas. JPMorgan declined to comment. AIG and Financial Security spokespeople said the companies are cooperating with the probe. … The investigation stems from an Internal Revenue Service review that found scores of municipal bond deals robbed federal taxpayers of more than $100 million. Banks and other financial firms arranged to sell guaranteed investment contracts in a way that increased their fees at the expense of the U.S. government, said Charlie Anderson, manager of field operations for the IRS's tax-exempt bond division."

The Wall Street Journal (12/7, C1, Hudson, Richardson) reports, "Federal regulators tried to clean up corruption in the municipal-bond market in the 1990s. … But with the muni market caught in a new, wide-ranging investigation, it looks like little has changed." The Journal continues, "In recent weeks, the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission have issued subpoenas to Wall Street firms seeking information on an array of muni-market investment products, according to people close to the banks. In November, the Federal Bureau of Investigation raided offices of some firms that act as go-betweens for municipalities and the banks. The Justice Department acknowledged it was investigating 'anticompetitive practices' in the industry. And the Internal Revenue Service is examining whether consultants and underwriters have used financial sleight of hand to evade federal taxes. … 'There's a lot of bad deals out there -- and the industry is very blasé,' said Charles Anderson, field manager of the IRS's municipal-bond unit, in an interview." The Journal adds, "The Justice Department has issued subpoenas to most of the big investment banks on Wall Street, according to several people close to the banks. The top underwriters of municipal bonds over the past 15 years include Bank of America Corp., Bear Stearns Cos., Citigroup Inc., Goldman Sachs Group Inc., J.P. Morgan Chase & Co., Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc., Merrill Lynch & Co., Morgan Stanley and UBS AG. All declined to comment officially, but several people close to the banks said that most or all of the firms had received subpoenas in recent weeks. … Some people familiar with the probes cautioned that hard details about the nature of the latest investigations are hard to come by. One person close to a big Wall Street bank said the probes 'could take several years.'"

Delta Pilots Union Opposes Merger With US Air. USA Today (12/7, Adams) reports, "On a day of escalating rhetoric from two airlines, the chief of Delta Air Lines' pilots union warned Wednesday that a merger with US Airways (LCC) would leave 'thousands' of Delta employees jobless." USA continues, "The remarks by Lee Moak, chairman of Delta's Air Line Pilots Association, came as US Airways CEO Douglas Parker pressed for access to Delta's books to move ahead on his company's bid to acquire Delta out of Chapter 11 bankruptcy." USA adds, "US Airways has made a hostile takeover offer of $8.5 billion in cash and stock for Delta, the USA's third-biggest airline, which is in Chapter 11. US Airways says a merger would make both airlines stronger and more competitive in the USA and abroad. It would be the world's biggest airline. .. .Executives at Delta have rebuffed the offer, saying that it's too risky and that Delta is better off alone." USA notes, "Moak's warning of job losses contrasts with US Airways' public promises not to lay off any employees or halt air service to any cities if the two airlines merge. Because both US Airways and Delta operate a shuttle service serving Washington, New York and Boston, Parker has said one of the shuttles would have to be sold to avoid federal antitrust violations. … In an interview, Moak said the union's analysis of US Airways' offer finds 'at least 1,000 Delta pilots and several thousand other Delta employees would be terminated' as a result. … Only Delta's pilots are unionized. That union is one of Delta's largest unsecured creditors and is represented on the creditors' committee. Other Delta workers, such as flight attendants, mechanics and reservations agents, are not unionized and have no contract protections."

US Air Reiterates Commitment To Merger. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (12/7, Hirschman) reports, "US Airways called for Delta Air Lines' directors and creditors to 'fully and fairly' evaluate its $8.6 billion takeover bid and reiterated Wednesday its commitment to pursue the controversial deal." The AJC continues, "Some airline analysts had concluded the acquisition was falling apart when US Airways CEO Doug Parker was quoted in USA Today on Wednesday morning saying his carrier would abandon the hostile takeover if Delta wasn't convinced of its benefits. Parker's comments were made during a Tuesday meeting with the newspaper's editors and reporters. … 'We have to get to a point where all are working together on this or it's not going to happen,' Parker said in USA Today. 'This is all about convincing Delta's management that this plan makes sense.'" The AJC adds, "On Wednesday afternoon, however, Parker issued a written statement proclaiming US Airways is 'fully committed' to purchasing Delta and calling for the Atlanta-based airline's board and creditors to move to a detailed study of a combined operation. … Parker didn't deny telling USA Today that US Airways would only pursue a consensual deal. But a US Airways spokeswoman said Parker's written statement was meant to clear up 'misperceptions the article may have caused.'"

SF Chronicle, MediaNews Plan Ad Sales, Distribution Sharing Deal. The AP (12/7, Kravets) reports, "MediaNews Group Inc. and the San Francisco Chronicle plan to consolidate some of the business operations of their Bay Area newspapers, but will refrain from doing so pending the outcome of a federal antitrust trial challenging the deal, both companies said Wednesday." The AP continues, "Last week, U.S. District Judge Susan Illston tentatively blocked MediaNews and the Chronicle's owner, Hearst Corp., from merging local distribution and national ad sales. Illston said such a deal could pave the way for "price manipulation" and make it harder for new competitors to enter the market." The AP adds, "New York-based Hearst Corp. has invested $300 million in a complex deal that gives MediaNews three more Bay Area newspapers -- on top of the seven it already owns, including the Oakland Tribune. Hearst's investment helped Denver-based MediaNews finance the purchase of Hearst rivals Contra Costa Times, the San Jose Mercury News and Monterey County Herald earlier this year. … In issuing the temporary restraining order against the alliance, Illston said she had been under the impression that Hearst's investment was solely an equity stake, but an April 26 memo had surfaced suggesting it actually was a bid to merge operations." The AP notes, "Illston's comments bolstered San Francisco businessman Clint Reilly's federal antitrust claims against the publishers. … In court briefs and in interviews Wednesday, the publishers said they planned to move forward with the consolidation by winning the right to do so at trial by proving the plan is not anticompetitive. Executives have said the two companies had not engaged in any discussions to merge operations since the letter was written."

Telemundo, Grupo Xtra Request For Network Sets Off Mexican Media Dispute. The New York Times (12/7, Malkin) reports, "Night after night for almost two weeks, Mexican television news has shown exposés on how poor people suffer from the high cost of medicines. … The images of the ill and dying have been heart-wrenching. Legislators lament the lack of regulation. Corner pharmacies barely fend off failure. The new health minister concedes that high prices are a problem." The Times continues, "It may be merely a coincidence that Mexico's two competing television companies, Televisa and TV Azteca, have each chosen to focus on this particular social problem at the same time. … Their separate reporting comes to exactly the same conclusion. The culprits who drive the prices so high are two pharmaceutical distributors who together control 70 percent of the market. And both news teams single out the same one for particular opprobrium: Grupo Casa Saba, a $2 billion company controlled by the reclusive octogenarian billionaire Isaac Saba Raffoul. … What neither Televisa nor TV Azteca mentions is that Mr. Saba has his eye on another business: television." The Times adds, "Mr. Saba is the Mexican partner of Telemundo, the NBC Universal unit that is the No. 2 Spanish-language television broadcaster in the United States. In September, Telemundo and another company Mr. Saba owns, Grupo Xtra, formally requested a license for a broadcast television network. … Both Televisa and TV Azteca say that their coverage is driven only by news judgment. … Within weeks, the license request set off a nasty dispute between Telemundo and TV Azteca, leading to lawsuits and countersuits. Last week, Telemundo asked the Federal Communications Commission in the United States to deny the renewal of the broadcasting license to KAZA, the Los Angeles affiliate of Azteca's growing network based in the United States. The dispute comes just as Felipe Calderón takes office as president. Mr. Calderón, who campaigned on a promise to increase competition, has said that Mexico should have a third broadcast company. … The decision over whether to authorize a new network, which would be awarded by public auction, could prove to be the new government's first big test when it comes to taking on powerful business interests."

Japan Tobacco Discussing Takeover Of Gallaher. The Financial Times (12/7, Saigol, Wiggins) reports, "Japan Tobacco, the world's third-biggest tobacco company, has made a takeover approach for Gallaher, the UK group that owns the Benson & Hedges and Silk Cut brands. … The approach is expected to trigger a counterbid for Gallaher, which has a market value of £6.4bn ($12.6bn)." The Times continues, "Philip Morris is the most likely suitor. BAT and Imperial Tobacco might also be interested but they would face heavy competition issues. … People familiar with the situation said on Wednesday night the talks were at a preliminary stage. The two companies have had one discussion." The Times adds, "Gallaher has been the subject of persistent takeover speculation in recent weeks. The UK company's shares have risen strongly over the past two months, gaining 13 per cent to close on Wednesday at 979p. … On Thursday, shares of Japan Tobacco surged 5.5 per cent to Y533,000 in midday trading in Tokyo. … Gallaher said on Wednesday night it had received an approach but declined to name the company involved. It said there was no certainty an offer would be made." The Times notes, "Japan Tobacco, which also owns food and pharmaceutical businesses, controls about 70 per cent of the Japanese tobacco market. A former state-owned monopoly, it sells the Camel and Winston brands outside the US. Japan Tobacco's international tobacco business is stronger than its domestic operations."

News Corp Nears Deal To Regain Liberty's Stake. The Wall Street Journal (12/7, A3, Angwin) reports, "A two-year standoff between News Corp. and its second-biggest shareholder, Liberty Media Corp., is nearing an end in a deal that will return Liberty to a powerful position in the media sector and solidify News Corp. Chairman Rupert Murdoch's control of his company, say people close to the situation." The Journal continues, "Under an agreement, which could be finalized in the next few weeks, News Corp. will buy Liberty's $11 billion stake in the media giant in exchange for News Corp's 38.6% stake in satellite-TV firm DirecTV Group Inc., some cash and some smaller News Corp. assets. … While the two sides have been discussing a deal along these lines for several months, significant progress has been made this week, according to people close to the situation." The Journal adds, "The biggest bone of contention has been the soaring stock price of DirecTV, which has risen more than 20% to above $23 since news of the talks broke in mid-September. … But while the two shareholdings are now roughly equal in price, Liberty executives believe the DirecTV stock was inflated by deal speculation, a point Liberty Chief Executive Greg Maffei made to investors at a media conference yesterday. By adding some cash and other assets to the swap, News Corp. will reduce the effective price it is getting for its DirecTV shares. … The main reason to add the assets, however, is to ensure the deal is tax-free for Liberty. Mr. Maffei estimated Liberty would save billions of dollars in taxes on the cash-and-asset swap."

Professor Warns Against Antitrust Probes Of Private Equity Funds. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (12/7, A18), Josh Lerner, the Jacob H. Schiff professor of investment banking at Harvard Business School, writes, "Some 53 years ago, Judge Harold Medina dismissed charges brought by the Justice Department against 17 leading investment banks. A case built up over a decade of investigations and almost three years of trial collapsed when the government was unable to show that the industry's collaborative practices constituted an anti-competitive conspiracy. The judge observed that activities that the government depicted as nefarious were 'nothing more nor less than a gradual, natural and normal growth or evolution by which an ancient form has been adapted to the needs of those engaged in raising capital.' … Now the trust-busters have again launched an inquiry into collusion in financial services, this time focusing on private equity firms such as Kohlberg, Kravis & Roberts. … The concern this time involves teaming up to bid in auctions of firms going private rather than jointly underwriting public corporate offerings. But it is hard not to feel that history is repeating itself. For not only is this investigation sure to fatten the profit pools of dozens of securities law firms, but the fundamental errors that Judge Medina flagged half a century ago seem destined to be repeated." Lerner continues, "Far from being a static industry with ossified giants, private equity features brutal competition and enormous dynamism. Groups that were dominant just a few years ago…have dramatically downsized or announced their intention to cease operations after experiencing investment missteps and succession problems. Meanwhile, new organizations have amassed enormous sums of capital in short periods. For instance, one of the Justice Department's targets, Silver Lake Partners, was only established in 1999. Since then, it has raised $6 billion in equity, and in light of its great success, is now raising a larger fund. … Thus, the reality of the market seems dramatically different from the typical setting where "trust-busters" are mandated to work. Moreover, the behavior in the Justice Department's cross-hairs -- deal sharing -- is an important aspect of this competition that benefits all of us." Lerner concludes, "Even if the antitrust threat dissipates, there is a broader lesson here. When one considers private equity's substantial successes in this decade, it is clear that the industry thrives on its extraordinary flexibility and ability to take risks. … Private equity is a dynamic industry, at whose heart is taking calculated risks based on limited information. Washington must understand that the many benefits private equity provides by facilitating economic growth are unlikely to be sustained if the heavy hand of government intrudes, whether through litigation or regulation."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

DOJ Tells Alabama County To Continue Greenways Program. The Birmingham (AL) News (12/7, Bouma) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department has rejected Jefferson County's plans to close its greenways program, leading to an 11th-hour scramble to write a new arrangement that all sides agree is legal." The News continues, "The county cannot meet its obligations under a federal agreement by assigning the ultimate financial and legal responsibility to the nonprofit Freshwater Land Trust, as the County Commission voted in November." The News adds, "Jefferson County agreed in 1996, in a federal case, to spend 10 years buying land in the Black Warrior and Cahaba rivers watersheds as penance for polluting the waterways for decades with broken sewers. … All sides agree that the county met its obligation to finish buying land in the $30 million program by the Saturday due date. And lawyers agree the nonprofit Freshwater Land Trust should oversee the land, as the county has planned. … But the 1996 court settlement requires the county to keep financial responsibility for major problems and the legal responsibility of ensuring that the land is preserved." The News notes, "Bill Weinischke, senior attorney for the Justice Department, said he could not say what would happen if the county missed the deadline by a few days but completed it in time for the county commission to vote on it during its Tuesday meeting. … Fines are allowed under the 1996 consent decree, but the Justice Department has not threatened any."

Interior Department AG Finds Pervasive Problems In Royalty Program. The New York Times (12/7, Andrews, 1.16M) reports, "An eight-month investigation by the Interior Department's chief watchdog has found pervasive problems in the government's program for ensuring that companies pay the royalties they owe on billions of dollars of oil and gas pumped on federal land and in coastal waters. In a scathing report to Congress, the Interior Department's inspector general says the agency's data are often inaccurate, that its officials rely too heavily on statements by oil companies rather than actual records and that only about 9 percent of all oil and gas leases are being reviewed." The "report undermines claims by top Interior officials that the department is aggressively pursuing underpayments and outright cheating by companies that drill on property owned by the American public." It "comes as lawmakers in both parties have been attacking the Interior Department for failing to correct blunders that department officials now concede could cost the government as much as $10 billion over the next five years. It also reinforces complaints by critics, from auditors within the agency to lawmakers in both parties, who have said that enforcement has become superficial, prone to errors and overly deferential to oil companies."

The Washington Post (12/7, D3, Mufson, 690K) reports, "The agency that collects royalties from oil and gas producers lacks the data, coordination and manpower to keep track of companies operating on federal land and in federal waters, a report by the Interior Department's inspector general said." It "criticized the Minerals Management Service for relying on 'compliance reviews,' which depend on information provided by the companies, rather than detailed audits, independent information or site visits."

The AP (12/7, Talley) says, "With 'inaccurate and incomplete' data and compliance reviews that 'do not adequately evaluate company-reported volume and allowance data,' the Inspector General said there was a high risk 'the MMS may not detect underpaid royalties.' As a result, the MMS cannot determine the true cost and benefits of the royalty program, and has no complete picture just how much oil companies owe the government." The AP adds, "MMS Director Johnnie Burton, in a response letter to the Inspector General, said that she agreed that more could be done to raise compliance levels. In a press release, the MMS said it would act quickly to implement new measures recommended by the Inspector General, including, 'strengthened procedures, improved administrative controls and enhanced tracking systems.'"

The Houston Chronicle (12/7, Ivanovich, 530K) reports the IG "recommended agency officials insist companies turn over actual source documents — such as tank gauge reports — for at least one test month." The Chronicle adds, "Responding to the report today, Rep. Darrell Issa, R-Calf., chairman of a House subcommittee that has been examining the Minerals Management Service, said agency officials 'don't seem to have any concept of independent collection or independent analysis.' ... Rep. Edward Markey, D-Mass., a frequent critic of the White House's energy policies, said the Devaney report 'underscores how poorly the Bush Administration's Minerals Management Service has been overseeing oil and gas drilling activities on public land.'"

Judge Blocks US From Reversing Roadless Rules. The Christian Science Monitor (12/7, Knickerbocker) reports from Ashland, OR, "Six years after the Bush administration came to office seeking to reverse Bill Clinton's order for protecting roadless areas on federal lands, the issue continues to smolder. … A federal judge has blocked the administration from lifting protections on nearly 50 million acres of backcountry. Several governors are suing Uncle Sam over the issue. And other governors are pushing ahead with their own plans to balance environmental protection with mining, logging, oil and gas development, and other commercial uses." The Monitor continues, "At stake are vast areas of federal land, most of it forested tracts across the Ameri-can West where the sound of road-building bulldozers has never been heard. Environmentalists say such areas are valuable for wildlife habitat, preserving water and air quality, and providing a wildernesslike experience. Many hunters and fishermen want them kept pristine as well. .. .But many areas also are potential sources of timber, minerals, gas, and oil. Developing such natural resources can be done in a way that protects the environment, administration and industry officials assert." The Monitor adds, "In September, US Magistrate Elizabeth Laporte in San Francisco ruled that the Bush administration's repeal of the 2001 Roadless Area Conservation Rule, as the Clinton order is called, violates both the Endangered Species Act and the National Environmental Policy Act. .. .In another opinion last week, Judge Laporte blocked plans to extract natural resources in roadless areas, including some 300 controversial oil and gas leases in seven western states the US Forest Service issued in recent years. … Administration officials made 'a clear error of judgment' in attempting to open up roadless areas without the proper environmental assessments, Laporte ruled. .. .The administration had sought to require governors to petition Washington if they wanted to protect federal roadless land in their states. Laporte ruled that illegal as well. But not before governors in Virginia, North and South Carolina, New Mexico, and California had petitioned the federal government for full protection of roadless areas in their states. .. Meanwhile, governors in other states - Idaho, Colorado, and Utah among them - want to lift or ease some of the restrictions imposed by the Clinton rule."

States Developing Own Plans To Cut Mercury Emissions. The Christian Science Monitor (12/7, Clayton, 59K) reports, "Facing a mandate to slash toxic mercury emissions from coal-fired power plants, 23 states are thumbing their noses at a federal cleanup plan and are instead developing their own far tougher plans to deal with mercury." But "doing so has caused many of them to miss a federal Nov. 17 deadline to submit their plans to the Environmental Protection Agency. Now, the EPA is ratcheting up the pressure. This week, the agency is expected to publish names of more than 20 states that could have the federal plan imposed on them if they don't submit tougher plans by next spring." The Monitor adds, "What it all adds up to is a major state-led rebellion over mercury emissions that dwarfs, for example, an 11-state push to create regional greenhouse-gas reduction programs without federal support. If successful, the revolt could weaken a key element of the federal mercury rules: an emissions-trading system popular with the utility industry and already in place for air pollutants like nitrogen oxides."

Small Print In Tax Bill Would Delay EPA Rule. The AP (12/7, Heilprin) reports, "Farmers would be off the hook for costly air pollution cleanups under an obscure provision slipped into a tax bill that may be the last act of this Congress. Buried in the fine print of the bill filed Wednesday, the measure by Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, would forbid the Environmental Protection Agency from applying the Clean Air Act to dust and soot from farms until 2012." Environmentalists "complain the moratorium would grant farmers a five-year holiday from the EPA's health standards for fine particles and soot, which protect people living downwind."

Police Officers Wounded In Shootout On Nevada Indian Reservation. The AP (12/7) reports, "A tribal police chief, another officer and two residents of a home on the Walker River Paiute Reservation were wounded in a shootout Wednesday as the officers tried to serve an arrest warrant at the house, authorities said. The four men were flown by emergency services helicopters to a hospital in Reno, about 100 miles to the north, FBI spokesman David Staretz said. … Staretz said both officers were wearing body armor and their injuries weren't considered life-threatening. Staretz also said he was told the other men, a father and son, didn't sustain serious injuries, although a spokesman for the Regional Emergency Medical Services Authority in Reno said one of the men was in critical condition." The AP notes, "The nature of the arrest warrant wasn't immediately known, although Staretz said it may have been drug-related since DEA personnel were at the scene. A neighbor described the house as a known hangout for drug users."

House GOP Leaders Drop Efforts To Push Indian Casino Bill. The Hill (12/7, Snyder) reports, "House Republican leaders have apparently dropped a late attempt to pass a bill that limits off-reservation Indian gaming, after several tribes raised objections." The Hill continues, "House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), who opposes one tribe's effort to build a casino in his district, supported the last-ditch effort to push the bill, which had previously been introduced by Rep. Richard Pombo (R-Calif.), outgoing House Resources Committee chairman, gaming lobbyists said. … But the measure proved too controversial to fit into a short lame-duck session." The Hill adds, "Tribal officials and their lobbyists have urged Congress to wait instead for the Department of the Interior's own effort to update its rules governing Indian gaming. … A public-comment period on the proposed rule closes next Friday, with a final rule expected sometime late next spring. … 'We felt like there was a regulation out there and that we ought to let the regulation go forward,' one gaming lobbyist said. … But Brian Kennedy, a spokesman for the House Resources Committee, said that the Pombo measure provided stronger protection against the spread of casinos than is contemplated by Interior." The Hill notes, "In September, a majority of House members voted to approve the Pombo bill, but the measure failed because it did not receive the two-thirds support it needed to pass on the suspension calendar. …. An Interior staff member startled a gathering of tribal officials and Indian lobbyists yesterday morning when he announced that both Hastert and Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) planned to try to push the bill through. … 'The room was packed with D.C. lobbyists there on behalf of their tribal clients,' one lobbyist in attendance wrote in an e-mail to The Hill. 'Most are in strong opposition to the bill.'"

Seminole Tribe To Buy Hard Rock Restaurant, Casino Chain. The Wall Street Journal (12/7, Sanders, Berman) reports, "British gambling-and-leisure company Rank Group PLC said Thursday it will sell the Hard Rock Cafe restaurant-and-casino chain to the Seminole Tribe of Florida for $965 million." The Journal continues, "The Hard Rock business includes 124 Hard Rock Cafes, four Hard Rock Hotels, two Hard Rock Casino Hotels, two Hard Rock Live! concert venues, and stakes in three unbranded hotels. Rank said it would keep the Hard Rock Casino in London but under the Rank Gaming brand. … 'We have maximized the value of Hard Rock through this disposal following a thorough strategic review and competitive auction,' said Chief Executive Ian Burke said." The Journal adds, "The sale, which is subject to shareholder approval, is scheduled to be completed in March. .. The deal shows the long-term maturation of U.S. Indian tribes that have made hundreds of millions of dollars in the gambling business. From roots as operators of small bingo-hall outposts on their reservations, some have become potent entrepreneurs on a wider stage. … The deal for Hard Rock -- a 35-year-old chain based around rock-music memorabilia -- is high-visibility proof of that evolution. Hard Rock posted $70 million in operating profit on $500 million in revenue last year." The Journal notes, "The Seminoles have been a target of the Internal Revenue Service, which in the past few years has stepped up its examination of tax-free bonds used by the Seminoles and tribes in California to build casinos. The tribe issued $415 million of tax-free bonds to build the Tampa and Hollywood casinos, which the IRS deemed illegal. In October 2005, the tribe said it would issue $730 million in bonds to pay off the original tax-free bonds and consolidate debt."

Caribbean Native Pleads Guilty In New York To Drug Conspiracy. The Rochester (NY) Democrat & Chronicle (12/7, Craig) reports, "A Caribbean native whom Justice Department officials had been trying to extradite to the United States for a decade — before finally succeeding last year — pleaded guilty Wednesday to a drug conspiracy that involved a 1992 shipment of 28 pounds of cocaine seized en route to Rochester." The D&C continues, "Noel 'Zambo' Heath, who became somewhat of a folk hero to some residents in the twin-island nation of St. Kitts and Nevis during his fight against extradition, admitted in federal court here to a role in the drug trafficking conspiracy." The D&C adds, "Heath, who was once identified by the White House as an international drug kingpin, could be sentenced to between 70 and 87 months under the terms of the plea agreement. He is scheduled to be sentenced by U.S. District Judge David Larimer in April. … 'We were hopeful to get him back to his family as soon as possible,' said his attorney, Jeffrey Lichtman.In 1992 federal authorities heard Heath on a wiretap, apparently from his St. Kitts home, plotting the shipment of cocaine to Rochester. Using information gleaned from the wiretap, police pulled over a tractor-trailer on the New York Thruway near Victor and discovered the 28 pounds of cocaine, which had a street value then of about $1 million. … Federal authorities eventually identified Heath as a key player in the drug trafficking, and a federal grand jury in Rochester indicted him in 1995. Justice Department officials then initiated extradition proceedings for Heath to face criminal charges in Rochester, but he successfully staved off extradition. Sometimes Heath was aided by sympathetic political powers in St. Kitts."

Court Upholds Florida Man's Conviction In Painkiller Case. The St. Petersburg (FL) Times (12/7) reports "Even those who prosecuted and convicted Richard Paey sympathize with the wheelchair-bound man serving 25 years for drug trafficking - for obtaining the drugs he needs for his debilitating pain. Count among those sympathizers the 2nd District Court of Appeal. The problem, a majority of the court ruled Wednesday, is that they can't help Paey. They upheld his conviction and sentence by a 2-1 vote, but passed on this advice: Get the governor to commute the sentence." The Hudson man "was arrested by the Pasco County Sheriff's Office and the federal Drug Enforcement Administration in 1997 after buying more than 1,200 painkillers with fake prescriptions."

Judge Upholds California's Medical Marijuana Law. In San Diego, the AP (12/7, Hoffman) reported a state judge on Wednesday "upheld California's law permitting the use of medical marijuana for medical purposes, rejecting a lawsuit by three counties challenging the decade-old statute. The counties, led by San Diego, argued that local governments shouldn't be bound to uphold state laws that are weaker than the federal blanket ban on marijuana. … Superior Court Judge William R. Nevitt, Jr., wrote in his ruling counties would not be breaking federal law by giving out state identification cards. … The ruling affirmed a tentative judgment Nevitt issued in November."

The San Diego Union-Tribune (12/7) reports Nevitt "ruled that state law enforcement officials are not obligated to arrest and prosecute people who violate federal laws."

The North County Times (12/7) reports Nevitt, "rejected the county's argument that California's voter-approved Compassionate Use act should be pre-empted by federal law. Federal law says marijuana has no medicinal value and its use is illegal in all situations."

Local TV Coverage. XETV-TV, San Diego (12/6, 10:00 p.m.) aired, "Several counties joined San Diego in the lawsuit. It was filed after local county-officials refused to issue ID cards to medical-marijuana users. But, today, Judge William Nevitt upheld that state law. It was approved by voters in 1996.he said today's ruling does not decide if marijuana really has medical-benefits."

KUSI-TV, San Diego (12/6, 6:00 p.m.) aired, "A victory tonight for supporters of medicinal marijuana in San Diego County. A judge rejected San Diego County's [dispute over] the medical marijuana law. San Diego and two other counties sued, saying federal law supersedes the state law. The tentative ruling was issued last month."

KGTV-TV, San Diego (12/6, 6:30 p.m.) aired, "San Diego County lost a challenge to the state's medical marijuana law. They sued, arguing that [local] governments shouldn't uphold state laws that are overwritten by the federal ban on marijuana. Today a state judge ruled that counties would not be breaking federal law by giving out state marijuana I D cards."

Survey Says Nearly 1 Million Addicted To Drugs In Afghanistan. The AP (12/6) reported, "The first nationwide survey on drug use, conducted last year by the Ministry of Counter Narcotics and U.N. Office on Drugs and Crime, found nearly 1 million addicts in [Afghanistan]…including 60,000 children under age 15. Drugs of choice range from hashish, opium and heroin to pharmaceutical medicines. An estimated 5,000 children are addicted to opiates, and the remainder take cough syrup and other drugs, the survey found. The actual numbers are probably much higher, especially for children and women, the report said."

Tajikistan Cited Among Leading Transit Routes For Drugs From Afghanistan. The AP (12/7) reports Central Asia's poorest county "is also one of the world's leading transit routes for heroin, opium and other drugs from Afghanistan. … In Tajikistan, the scars still remain from a traumatic civil war that ended nine years ago. Now, new wounds are being inflicted on this mountainous nation -- from the dramatic spike in the trafficking of drugs grown in neighboring Afghanistan, smuggled north through Tajikistan en route to Russia and Europe, and increasingly consumed by Tajiks. … The UN ranked Tajikistan fifth worldwide in heroin and morphine seizures, and fourth for opium."

Former Colorado Firefighter Seeks New Trial On Weapons Charge. The Rocky Mountain News (12/6, Burnett) reported, "A former Denver firefighter convicted of selling an illegal machine gun to an undercover federal agent is requesting a new trial, saying prosecutors failed to turn over evidence that could have led to his acquittal. Stan Ford was scheduled to be sentenced Friday. But U.S. District Court Judge Robert E. Blackburn said the sentencing should be postponed until Ford's motion for a new trial is heard." The Mountain News noted, "The U.S. Attorney's office says it did provide Ford's lawyers with copies of all communications. It also disputes that the messages at issue would have been enough to acquit Ford."

More Judges Packing Heat Behind Bench. The National Law Journal (12/7, Bronstad) reports, "Despite increased security at courthouses following shootings in Chicago and Atlanta about one year ago, many judges are bringing their own guns into their courtrooms for protection." The Journal continues, "Earlier this month, a Florida judge was ordered to accept mentoring after warning a defense attorney that he was 'locked and loaded.' In May, a judicial ethics committee of the New York State Unified Court System found that it was ethical for a judge to carry a pistol into his courtroom. … In Nevada, Oklahoma and Texas, incidences of violence in the past year have prompted new laws or solidified rules allowing judges to bring guns into courtrooms. … 'Judges in our courthouse have been carrying guns almost all the time,' said Cynthia Stevens Kent, a Texas judge in the 114th District Court, where a man in a family law case killed his ex-wife and son last year on the steps of a Tyler courthouse. … 'We feel strongly about providing adequate security, but it comes down to personal responsibility. And you've got to take responsibility for your own safety,' Kent said." The Journal notes, "Security concerns were raised last year after a rape suspect grabbed a deputy's gun and killed an Atlanta judge and others. One month earlier, a litigant had killed the husband and mother of a Chicago federal judge who ruled against him. … Some states allow judges to arm themselves."

IMMIGRATION:

Fewer Illegal Immigrant Arrests Reported Along US-Mexico Border. The AP (12/7, Caldwell) reports, "The number of illegal immigrants being arrested at the U.S.-Mexico border has dropped sharply in the first two months of this fiscal year, with some Border Patrol sectors seeing a drop of up to 63 percent." The AP continues, "Arrests along the border in Texas, New Mexico, Arizona and California have dropped about 27 percent, or by nearly 43,000 illegal immigrants, since Oct. 1, compared to the same time last year, Border Patrol officials in Washington said." The AP adds, "Reports of the decrease come about a month after Border Patrol officials announced a nearly 9 percent drop in arrests from 2004 to 2005. If the downward trend continues it would mark the first sustained decrease in illegal immigrant arrests since shortly after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, said Assistant Chief Patrol Agent Xavier Rios." The AP notes, "It's nearly impossible to know whether the drop in arrests really means that fewer people are coming across the border. … T.J. Bonner, president of the union that represents the majority of agents, said agents on the ground estimate that they only catch 25 percent to 33 percent of illegal immigrants. … Border Patrol officials acknowledge that they don't know how many people make it across the border every year. But they insist that the drop in arrests, which varied widely — the San Diego Sector marked a 3 percent drop while the Yuma, Ariz., and Del Rio, Texas, sectors each showed a 63 percent dip — is a sign that recently launched border security efforts are working."

Town Threatens To Withdraw Business Licenses Of Those Who Hire Illegals. The New York Times (12/7, Hamill, 1.16M) reports from Altoona, PA, "Since June, when Hazleton, Pa., some 130 miles east of here, began debating what to do about illegal immigrants, more than 60 local governments in 21 states have followed its lead and considered new ordinances to drive them away. At least 15 have approved the measures, typically intended to punish landlords who rent to illegal immigrants and business owners who employ them." Altoona, "an old railroad town nestled in an Appalachian Mountain valley about 100 miles east of Pittsburgh, is one of those 15. It approved its ordinance, which threatens to withdraw the business licenses of employers and rental licenses of landlords who hire or rent to illegal immigrants, in October." But "it does not fit the same pattern. … If Hazleton, where the immigrant population grew sharply in just a few years, started the current trend for dealing with a surge in illegal immigrants, Altoona may be the beginning of the next wave: trying to prevent a situation from developing in the first place."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Senate Votes 95-2 To Confirm Gates As 22nd Secretary Of Defense. The confirmation of Robert Gates to succeed Donald Rumsfeld as secretary of defense was almost entirely overshadowed by coverage of the release of the Iraq Study Group report. ABC World News (12/6, story 6, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) briefly reported on the Gates confirmation, which came of a 95-2 Senate vote. Republican Sens. Jim Bunning and Rick Santorum voted against Gates, "citing his criticism of the war and his view that the U.S. should engage Iran as part of a solution" according to the AP (12/6, Flaherty), while Sens. Evan Bayh, Joseph Biden, and Elizabeth Dole did not vote. The Hill (12/7, Schor) notes the two votes against Gates.

On CNN's The Situation Room (12/6, Blitzer), Counselor to the President Dan Bartlett said, "Expect the new secretary of defense to be sworn in fairly quickly, before the end of the year." The New York Times (12/7, A24, Cloud, 1.16M) reports White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said Gates would "formally begin work on Dec. 18, more than a week after his confirmation, because he wanted to participate in fall commencement at Texas A&M University before resigning as the school's president." Fox News' The Big Story (12/6, Emanuel) also said Gates will start on the 18th.

The Los Angeles Times (12/7, Spiegel, 850K) says Gates "won over critics of the administration's handling of the war on both sides of the aisle during an adulatory confirmation hearing Tuesday." The Washington Post (12/7, A11, Tyson, 690K) reports both Republicans and Democrats "lauded Gates's frankness after a day of testimony Tuesday in which he acknowledged that the United States is not winning in Iraq, and said that historians would have to judge whether the decision to invade Iraq in March 2003 was correct. He also pledged to take a fresh approach to Iraq in which 'all options are on the table.'" USA Today (12/7, 1A, Page, Jackson, 2.27M) says President Bush's selection of Gates could suggest Bush is willing to weigh changes in Iraq policy.

The Hill (12/7, Tiron) says defense industry insiders do not expect Gates to make "any major changes in budget and policy decisions that could curtail their business, at least for now." The DOD budget for 2008 must be submitted about a month and a half after Gates takes office, and "there will be very little Gates can change regarding a process begun months ago and nearly finished, several defense insiders said. But he will come into his own after a few months and be able to influence the 2009 defense budget, lobbyists said."

Blair Agrees With Gates Assessment That Iraq War Not Being Won. BBC.com (12/6) reports British Prime Minister Tony Blair agreed with Gates' "assessment that the war in Iraq is not being won. Asked by Tory leader David Cameron at prime minister's questions if he agreed with Robert Gates' assessment of the war, Mr Blair said: 'Of course.'"

Senate To Consider Vietnam Trade, Tax Bill. The AP (12/7, Abrams) reports, "In the final hours of Republican rule, the Senate put forward an all-purpose bill covering everything from normalized trade with Vietnam and tax breaks for millions of taxpayers to an expansion of offshore oil drilling. The House, while preparing its own tax and trade agenda, gave conservatives perhaps their last chance for a while to vote on an abortion bill. It was defeated." As of late last night, "House and Senate negotiators were still struggling to come up with a common approach to the tax and trade package." Senate Finance Committee leaders "said they were bringing to the floor as early as Wednesday the session-ending package that would renew expired or expiring tax breaks for businesses and middle income individuals and trade items affecting economic relations with Vietnam, Haiti, Africa and Andean nations." The tax portion, said Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley, gives "continued tax relief to families paying college, teachers buying classroom supplies and producers of clean energy from sources such as wind." The House "put off until Thursday any vote on its Vietnam trade bill as lawmakers pondered whether to combine it with the tax break measure. … It remained uncertain whether the House and Senate could come together on a package that would not be so laden with expensive programs that it becomes unpassable."

The Washington Post (1/27, D1, Montgomery, 690K) says "several senators yesterday raised objections to the bill, blocking its path to a full vote in the Senate and raising alarm among business lobbyists concerned about the fate of the largest of the tax breaks, a credit for research and development worth $7.5 billion in this fiscal year alone." Meanwhile, "with time running out on the 109th Congress, Senate negotiators were still trying to resolve differences with the House, which must also approve the package." The Post adds, "Business organizations and their members were waging a fierce lobbying campaign on behalf of the research credit, urging lawmakers to prevent it from expiring. California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) and Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano (D) sent letters adding their support, and former Michigan governor John Engler, now president of the National Association of Manufacturers, warned lawmakers that 'failure is not an option.' As of late yesterday, business lobbyists remained hopeful that the research credit would be preserved."

House GOP Fails To Pass Abortion Bill. The Los Angeles Times (12/7, Levey, 850K) reports, "House Republicans opposed to abortion rights failed Wednesday in their bid to pass a controversial measure that would have required women seeking abortions to be informed that some fetuses feel pain." Although "it was clear the bill would have stalled in the Senate, the abortion opponents hoped the House vote would provide a symbolic victory before control of Capitol Hill passes to Democrats in January. Instead, the vote dealt social conservatives a final setback in a two-year congressional session that has not produced a major piece of antiabortion legislation." The bill received "majority support, 250 to 162," but "that fell short of the two-thirds margin required under rules that limited debate." The New York Times (12/7, Hulse, 1.16M) notes "proponents of the measure said that they do not expect the new Democratic majority, whose leadership strongly supports abortion rights, to bring up such measures, and that they will press the leadership to allow a second vote under regular rules." But "Republican officials said they had no plans to revisit the issue."

Khalilzad, Williamson Emerge As Top Candidates For UN Post. The AP (12/7, Lederer) reports that speculation on a new US ambassador to the United Nations to succeed John Bolton is focusing on US Ambassador in Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad and a former deputy ambassador at the UN, Richard Williamson. However, there "also are a number of other Republicans and even some Democrats whose names have been floated among diplomats at UN headquarters," including Rep. Jim Leach and Undersecretaries of state Nicholas Burns and Paula Dobriansky. Among the Democratic candidate reportedly being considered are former senators George Mitchell and Sam Nunn.

Bush's DOD IG Nominee Withdraws. The AP (12/6, Solomon) reports David Laufman, President Bush's nominee for Defense Department inspector general, "has withdrawn from consideration." He "sent Bush a letter last week withdrawing from consideration after the Senate Armed Services Committee declined to hold a vote on his nomination before Congress recessed this year." Incoming chairman Carl Levin "has raised concerns about Laufman's nomination. The White House formally withdrew Laufman's name on Wednesday."

Warner Leaving Armed Services Chair But May Seek Reelection. The Norfolk Virginian-Pilot (12/7, Eisman) reports that though Sen. John Warner is stepping down as chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, he "told reporters he's 'leaning in favor' of seeking re-election in 2008." His comments "came as he marshaled bipartisan Senate support for President Bush's nomination of Robert Gates to be secretary of defense and pleaded for more bipartisanship in the debate over the future of America's role in Iraq."

High Court's Reduced Docket Noted. The New York Times (12/7, Greenhouse, 1.16M) reports, "On the Supreme Court's color-coded master calendar, which was distributed months before the term began on the first Monday in October, Dec. 6 is marked in red to signify a day when the justices are scheduled to be on the bench, hearing arguments. The courtroom, however, was empty on Wednesday, and for a simple reason: The court was out of cases. The question is, where have all the cases gone? … The reasons for the decline all grow out of forces building for decades. The federal government has been losing fewer cases in the lower courts and so has less reason to appeal. As Congress enacts fewer laws, the justices have fewer statutes to interpret. And justices who think they might end up on the losing side of an important case might vote not to take it." The Times adds, "In a divided court, in a divided country, the court's reduced role is perhaps not surprising, nor is it necessarily a bad thing. … In private conversations, the justices themselves insist that nothing so profound is going on, but rather seem mystified at what they perceive as a paucity of cases that meet the court's standard criteria. The most important of those criteria is whether a case raises a question that has produced conflicting decisions among the lower federal courts."

Election Decimated Ranks Of GOP Moderates. The Washington Post (12/7, A29, Goldfarb, 690K) reports, "Iowa Rep. Jim Leach (R) seemed a natural to weather voters' antiwar sentiment this fall. His independent streak and moderate views had engendered the allegiance of his Democratic-leaning district for the past 30 years, and he broke with his party and President Bush in October 2002 by voting against the Iraq war. Yet on Election Day, voters in Iowa's 2nd Congressional District ousted him in favor of an untested Democrat, a college professor -- a testament to the vulnerable position that Republican moderates found themselves in all year. … With the defeat of Leach and several other Republican moderates Nov. 7, the Democrats' victory in the midterm election accelerates a three-decade-old pattern of declining moderate influence and rising conservative dominance in the Republican Party. By one measure, the GOP is more ideologically homogenous now than it has been in modern history. The waning moderate wing must find its place when the Democratic majority takes over in January." The Post adds, "Eight of the House's 20 most moderate Republicans lost their seats: Rob Simmons and Nancy L. Johnson (Conn.); Jeb Bradley and Charles Bass (N.H.); Michael G. Fitzpatrick and Curt Weldon (Pa.); Sue W. Kelly (N.Y.); and Leach. Also, moderate GOP Rep. Sherwood L. Boehlert (N.Y.), is retiring, and he will be replaced by Democrat Michael A. Arcuri, the Oneida County district attorney." On the Senate side, "the defeat of Lincoln D. Chafee (R-R.I.), a critic of the war who declined to vote for Bush's reelection in 2004, underscored the same trend."

Snowe Seeking Overhaul Of Centrist Coalition. Roll Call (12/7, Pierce) reports, "Sen. Olympia Snowe (R-Maine) quietly is laying the groundwork to overhaul the Senate Centrist Coalition into a regular bipartisan working group that eschews ideological labels." Snowe, who "co-chairs the coalition with Sen. Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.)," said "she wants to change the name of the group and hopes to invite a broader cross-section of the Senate to attend breakfasts or lunches, potentially on a weekly basis, that are designed to foster bipartisanship in the new Congress." Snowe "noted that the meetings need not be focused on a particular issue, but should merely offer a place to go for building relationships and friendships. Still, she cautioned that she is continuing to vet her ideas with Lieberman and others, and that nothing has been decided yet."

Blue Dogs Pledge To Seek Bipartisan Consensus. The Hill (12/7, Joseph) reports, "In a luncheon yesterday, members of the fiscally centrist Democratic Blue Dog Coalition promised to build bipartisan consensus to establish "fiscal sanity" and attempt to improve government accountability, transparency and oversight. 'This country is desperate for the middle, desperate for common-sense solutions,' said Rep. John Tanner (D-Tenn.)." President Bush "has invited members of the centrist Blue Dog and New Democrat coalitions to the White House on Friday to discuss areas 'of mutual cooperation,' in the words of one Democratic aid."

Lott Win Made Possible By Defections Of Collins, Warner. The Hill (12/7, Bolton) reports, "Sen. Trent Lott's (R-Miss.) stunning return to the Senate leadership was made possible by the last-minute defections of Sens. John Warner (R-Va.) and Susan Collins (R-Maine) from Sen. Lamar Alexander's (R-Tenn.) rival campaign for Republican whip. Ironically, four years earlier, Warner and Collins helped drive Lott from leadership by giving his rivals support at crucial moments during the controversy over his comments at the

Lott Selects His Team. Roll Call (12/7, Billings) reports Lott "has opted to dramatically cut the size of the GOP vote-counting team in the next Congress, assembling a group of eight loyalists, led by South Dakota Sen. John Thune, to aid in the party's floor efforts. Insiders suggested the size and membership of the whip team could be a sign that Lott is likely to rely heavily on his own experience and floor know-how to keep his party unified in the 110th Congress." In addition to Thune, "who will serve as Chief Deputy Minority Whip, Lott has brought on GOP Sens. Richard Burr (N.C.), Larry Craig (Idaho), Norm Coleman (Minn.), James Inhofe (Okla.), Olympia Snowe (Maine), John Sununu (N.H.) and David Vitter (La.) to round out his team. Thune, Burr, Vitter, Coleman and Sununu are in their first terms."

Hensarling Wins Race For RSC Post. The Hill (12/7, O'Connor) reports, "Rep. Jeb Hensarling (R-Texas) triumphed yesterday in his bid to chair the conservative Republican Study Committee during the 110th Congress, beating Rep. Todd Tiahrt (R-Kan.) 57-42." Hensarling, "an outspoken second-term conservative who has faced off with Republican leaders on budget and spending issues, won the chairmanship despite Tiahrt's nomination by the group's three remaining founders."

Kilpatrick To Head Black Caucus. The AP (12/7, Ben Evans) reports, "The Congressional Black Caucus on Wednesday tapped Rep. Carolyn Cheeks Kilpatrick as its chairwoman for the next two years, when black lawmakers will wield more power in Congress than ever." Kilpatrick , "a former school teacher and the mother of Detroit Mayor Kwame Kilpatrick, was chosen unanimously. She succeeds Rep. Mel Watt, D-N.C."

Democrats Gather Lobbyists' Donations Following Midterm Wins. The Wall Street Journal (12/7, A4, Cummings, 2.04M) reports, "Democrats may be promising a clampdown on lobbyist freebies once they take control of Congress. But ahead of that push, party leaders are collecting lobbyists' checks, while Democratic staffers angle for jobs inside their well-appointed offices. Verizon Communications Inc. earlier this week sponsored a reception for newly elected Missouri Sen. Claire McCaskill. Illinois Democratic Rep. Melissa Bean was the beneficiary of a Tuesday night fund-raiser in the new Capitol Hill offices of the US Chamber of Commerce." The Journal notes, "Some companies and lobbyists began shifting more donations to Democrats before Election Day. But Political Money Line, an organization that tracks political giving, reported last month that federal political action committees -- the kitties used by corporations and organizations to make donations -- held back $280 million in the final days of the midterm races. That is money now being tapped to welcome the old and new Democratic leaders back to town."

Morris Suggests Ethics Reforms. Dick Morris writes in The Hill (12/7), "Just in case the incoming Democratic majority is serious about real ethics reform, here are a few ideas for its members to consider: Ban spousal and family employment by campaign committees and PACs. … Those who have hired spouses and family members include: Reps. Richard Pombo (R-Calif.), wife and two brothers; Zoe Lofgren (D-Calif.), husband's law firm; Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.), wife and step-daughter; John Doolittle (R-Calif.), wife; Ralph Hall (R-Texas), daughter-in-law; Pete Stark (D-Calif.), wife; Buck McKeon (R-Calif.), wife; Ron Lewis (R-Ky.), wife; Bart Stupak (D-Mich.), wife; Jim Costa (D-Calif.), cousin; Dana Rohrabacher (R-Calif.), wife; Dave Reichert (R-Wash.), nephew; Chris Cannon (R-Utah), three daughters; Lincoln Davis (D-Tenn.), sister-in-law and daughter; Louie Gohmert (R-Texas), wife; Tim Bishop (D-N.Y.), daughter; Bob Filner (D-Calif.), wife; J.D. Hayworth (R-Ariz.), wife; Bob Inglis (R-S.C.), wife; Elton Gallegly (R-Calif.), wife; Sherwood Boehlert (R-N.Y.), wife; John Sweeney (R-N.Y.), wife; Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.), wife; Ed Pastor (D-Ariz.), nephew; John Shadegg (R-Ariz.), son; and Howard Berman (D-Calif.), brother Michael's political consulting firm; Sens. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.), son; and Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.), son and daughter during vice presidential race; and ex-Reps. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), wife; and Tom DeLay (R-Texas), wife and daughter." Other proposals: "Ban immediate family members of senators or congressmen from lobbying Congress. … Restore presidential power to line-item veto earmarks in appropriations bills and reverse the anti-impoundment legislation passed during the Nixon administration. … Require lobbyists to disclose the specific bills that they are lobbying for or against on the lobbying registration forms. Ban all privately paid travel by members, including use of corporate jets. … Require both chambers to work a full week, instead of the two- to three-day schedule they've had for the past few years."

WPost Comments On House's New Monday To Friday Schedule. The Washington Post (12/7, 690K)

editorializes, "When Democrats take over the House next year, the regular workweek will stretch to a backbreaking five days -- up from the now-customary Tuesday-through-Thursday arrangement. Members of the House and Senate -- no doubt reeling from the two weeks they've worked since the election -- will have a mere four weeks off after they leave town Friday." The Post adds, "Hard to believe, but the new leadership actually expects them to come to work on Jan. 4 rather than enjoy the usual elongated holiday break as they wait around for the president to deliver his State of the Union address in late January. In the Senate, the weeklong March break is being eliminated and the two-week April vacation cut in half. This kind of punishing schedule is enough to unite lawmakers of both parties, in both chambers, in a chorus of behind-the-scenes bipartisan grumbling. What, us work?"

Frank Derails Bill Giving Thatcher Congressional Gold Medal. Roll Call (12/7, Akers) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column, "What a kick in the pants, or the skirt, as the case may be, to former British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher. A revised floor schedule for Wednesday was sent out advising, 'H.R. 6136 -- Margaret Thatcher Congressional Gold Medal Act HAS BEEN PULLED."' Roll Call adds "a GOP leadership source told HOH that the reason the bill was pulled was because Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.) objected to it." Frank "explained to HOH in a telephone chat that he opposed giving Thatcher a gold medal because the bill 'hadn't gone through the regular rules' procedure and, frankly, it 'was being used by Republicans for partisan purposes. She was a very conservative person.'"

House Denounces French City For Naming Street After Convicted US Murderer. The AP (12/7, Hefling) reports, "The House passed a resolution Wednesday denouncing a French city for naming a street in honor of Mumia Abu-Jamal, who was sentenced to death for shooting a Philadelphia police officer 25 years ago this month. 'We must stand together as one and send a strong message to the world that cop-killers deserve to be punished, not to be celebrated,' said Rep. Mike Fitzpatrick, a Philadelphia-area congressman who authored the resolution." The vote "came a few days shy of the 25th anniversary of the shooting of Daniel Faulkner, a 25-year-old officer shot after he pulled over Abu-Jamal's brother on Dec. 9, 1981."

Performance Of Medicare Drug Program Said To Defy Critics. David Wessel writes in the Wall Street Journal's (12/7, A2) "Capital" column, "The Medicare prescription-drug benefit…was panned by critics when it was in previews. Now, after a year's run, the elderly audience seems to be applauding, public and private actors are clicking better in the very complex production, and costs are below initial estimates." Although the program's launch was "marred" with problems, critics' "worst fears haven't materialized. That fact is often overshadowed by continuing partisan bickering over the program's design and by persistent public suspicion of drug makers, insurers and pharmaceutical-benefit managers." Now, "Democrats argue the program could be even cheaper if the government, rather than private insurance plans, used its clout to negotiate with drug makers." But "they may have trouble delivering: The official congressional scorekeepers aren't persuaded that the government would actually save money." And "unless Democrats can take credit for saving money, it will be hard to make the benefit more generous."

WSJournal Says NASA Should Offer Prize For Moon Base, Instead Of Building It. The Wall Street Journal (12/7, A18, 2.04M) editoriallizes, "NASA announced this week that it plans to establish a permanent moon base by 2024, a mere generation from now." The Journal adds, "As good as this sounds, we're left to wonder why NASA shouldn't go further. It did not release a budget estimate for the project -- perhaps because the experience with the space station, which was supposed to cost $40 billion but will now likely go above $100 billion, was chastening. But whatever the estimate is, here's a counteroffer. Say NASA believes it can build a permanent moonbase for $100 billion in today's dollars. Why not take half of that and offer it as a bounty to the first private company to build the station and man it. A prize in the neighborhood of $50 billion is bound to attract plenty of interest -- and that number is probably much less than a realistic guess of what it would cost NASA in the end. The taxpayer would save 50% of NASA's cost to build the base, and the result would be much more likely to be attractive to the private interests that NASA wants to draw to the project."

Gasoline Price Increases Likely To Continue Until Christmas. USA Today (12/6, Hagenbaugh, 2.27M) reports, "The recent rise in gasoline prices will likely continue until Christmas, making the trip home for the holidays more costly than at Thanksgiving. The nationwide average retail price of a gallon of regular gasoline has risen 8 cents since the end of October." USA Today adds, "On Monday, the average price was $2.297 a gallon, the highest in two months and 15 cents higher than a year ago ... . A number of analysts, including those at Wachovia and Moody's Economy.com, say prices will likely inch higher through December." USA Today points to rising oil prices, declining gasoline inventories, and increased demand as reasons for higher pump prices.

Survey Finds Affordable Housing Has Dwindled. USA Today (12/7, 7A, El Nasser, 2.27M) reports, "The supply of affordable housing continued to dwindle this year despite weakening home prices, according to one-third of local housing officials who responded to a survey by the National League of Cities. Three-fourths of those surveyed say housing costs are significantly limiting home ownership opportunities for lower-income residents and young families. The survey was sent to officials in 1,167 cities." USA Today adds, "Housing prices in many areas skyrocketed in recent years as interest rates dropped. Demand fueled teardowns and rehabilitation of older homes. That took cheaper housing off the market."

Stocks Down Yesterday. NBC Nightly News (12/6, story 9, 0:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street today, investors pulled back a bit. The Dow was down more than 22 points [to close at 12,309.26]. NASDAQ lost 6 and a half points [to close at 2,445.86] on the day." The Wall Street Journal (12/7, C1, McKay, 2.04M) reports "the broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index slipped 0.1%, or 1.86 points, to 1412.90, up 13% on the year."

Investors Face Choices When Class-Actions Die. The Wall Street Journal (12/7, D1, Koppel, Davies) reports, "Is there life after your class-action lawsuit dies? … A ruling earlier this week undercut a class action against 55 Wall Street investment banks, and dashed hopes for small investors who bought hot stocks that went public during the dot-com bubble and then plummeted as it burst." The Journal continues, "The decision likely means that thousands of investors would have to file individual suits to try to recover billions lawyers claim they lost by investing in initial public offerings, mostly of technology companies, in the late 1990s and 2000." The Journal adds, "Class-action suits let individuals band together to pursue big defendants with more power than they could on their own. But the Second U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New York ruled that this case in its current form couldn't proceed as a class action, in part because plaintiffs' individual claims were not sufficiently similar to be grouped together. … Attorneys say it will be difficult, if not impossible, for small investors to find lawyers who will pursue such suits for them on an individual basis. Claims, they estimate, would need to be worth anywhere from a hundred thousand to several million dollars to make pursuing them worth a lawyer's time. Christine Hurt, a professor at the University of Illinois College of Law who has written about the IPO case, estimates that the average retail plaintiff suffered losses of less than $20,000. … Meanwhile, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce says the appeals-court decision was a major victory for any businesses that face dubious class-action claims." The Journal notes, "The decision marks the latest win for institutions and individuals fighting regulatory and legal action in the wake of massive stock-market losses earlier in this decade. … Still, investors have won some victories against Wall Street banks in bubble-era disputes."

Federal Judge Rules Virginia, Not Individuals, Can Sue Dairy Industry. The Washington Post (12/7, B07, Markon) reports, "Catherine Holmes saw the ads for the so-called 'dairy diet' and thought it would be a tasty way to lose a few pounds. After all, she loves buttermilk, yogurt and cheese. … Instead, the Arlington woman says, she gained three pounds on the diet, which dairy companies have spent hundreds of millions of dollars promoting. She sued the industry. … But a federal judge has ruled that under Virginia law, Holmes and other people can't take on the industry in court -- only a government entity such as the Virginia attorney general's office can. The decision last week by U.S. District Judge Leonie M. Brinkema in Alexandria threw out the lawsuit Holmes filed last year." The Post continues, "In her ruling last Thursday, Brinkema said Virginia consumer protection law allows people to seek monetary damages but not a broad injunction regulating an industry.

She did not address the science of the debate, writing that such federal agencies as the Food and Drug Administration and the Federal Trade Commission are better equipped to do so. … An attorney for Holmes vowed yesterday to appeal and file a similar lawsuit in a more consumer-friendly state. 'We're very disappointed,' said Dan Kinburn, general counsel for the Physicians Committee for Responsible Medicine, which filed the Virginia case on Holmes's behalf. 'This will encourage and assist the dairy industry in making this country fatter and sicker.'" The Post notes, "Dairy industry representatives said the ruling validated their view that consuming dairy products helps with weight loss when coupled with calorie restriction and exercise. They vowed to continue the advertising campaign. … Underlying the debate is growing concern nationally about increasing obesity among children. Researchers have split over the role of dairy products in the trend; some studies have found that children who drink too much milk are prone to becoming overweight, and others have found a weight-loss benefit from drinking milk."

Democratic Governors Meet In Washington. The AP (12/7, Tanner) reports, "With election victories behind them, Democratic governors gathered Wednesday to celebrate their first majority in 12 years, talk political strategy and share notes on the issues driving voters back at home. Governor after governor at their winter meeting turned to the backbone of modern Democratic politics -- education, health care and jobs, with many also promising a concerted effort to tackle energy policy." Democrats "emerged from Election Day with a 28-22 majority, reversing the current GOP majority and taking six seats from GOP control. Republicans had held a majority since the 1994 elections."

DCCC Increasingly Confident About Texas Runoff. Roll Call (12/7, Drucker) reports, "Although they were initially hesitant to lend a hand, national Democrats have since gone all out to aid former Rep. Ciro Rodriguez (D) as he seeks to oust Rep. Henry Bonilla (R) in Texas' 23rd district runoff set for Tuesday. With the Republican National Committee and the National Republican Congressional Committee mostly absent from Bonilla's better-funded campaign, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee has plunked down nearly $300,000 since Nov. 7 in independent expenditure advertising, hoping that Rodriguez can add to the party's House-takeover total." The Democrats' "confidence is an outgrowth of the DCCC's heavy strategic involvement in the Rodriguez campaign, from the ground up, as well as the 23rd district's new boundaries that were drawn over the summer courtesy of a Supreme Court decision mandating that the seat be brought into compliance with the Voting Rights Act." But "the Bonilla campaign isn't worried. … Bonilla campaign spokesman Phil Ricks on Wednesday claimed a strong volunteer effort and touted the help the Congressman is receiving from the state GOP. Ricks sounded particularly pleased with a new television ad released this week that features retired FBI agent Al Ortiz accusing Rodriguez of sympathizing with "Islamic Radicals.""

Jefferson Hits Opponent On Social Issues. Roll Call (12/7, Whittington) reports, "The contest to decide who will represent hurricane-ravaged New Orleans and Louisiana's 2nd district will be decided Saturday, as the clock winds down on the increasingly bitter runoff fight between Rep. William Jefferson (D) and state Rep. Karen Carter (D)." Jefferson "is the subject of an ongoing federal bribery investigation, although no formal charges have been filed and the eight-term Congressman denies any wrongdoing." The congressman "has turned to social issues in an effort to paint Carter as out of touch with the values of the largely black electorate. … In one of his latest TV ads, Jefferson informs voters that Carter has voted in favor of same-sex marriage and late-term abortions and against making human cloning a crime."

Allen Considers Challenge To Collins In 2008. Roll Call (12/7, Duran) reports, "Rep. Tom Allen (D-Maine) said Wednesday that he is 'seriously considering' running for Senate in 2008, and political watchers in the Pine Tree State say he looks and acts like someone preparing for a Senate bid." Allen "raised more than $930,000 in the previous cycle but spent only about half of it dispensing with two challengers on his way to securing a sixth term with 61 percent of the vote." Allen "presumably would square off with the state's junior Senator, Susan Collins (R), who has said she intends to seek a third term."

Presidential Race Off To Record Start. Roll Call (12/7, Kane) reports, "Shattering the pace of any previous presidential campaign, a half-dozen White House candidates already have leapt out of the gates for 2008, either formally signaling their entry into what is shaping up to be a packed field or filing paperwork freeing them to begin fundraising. …

With fundraising expectations higher than ever and the caucus and primary schedule so compacted in early 2008, the candidates, former candidates, and current and former campaign aides see nothing unusual about so many declarations for a general election that's still almost two years away." However, in the 2004 presidential race, "the first candidates to open campaign committees were former Vermont Gov. Howard Dean (D), who did so in May 2002, and" Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry (D), "who opened his fundraising operation just after Thanksgiving 2002. Neither man made their formal announcement until 2003. In the 2000 campaign, former Sen. Bill Bradley (D-N.J.) was the only candidate to open a campaign committee in 1998 -- on Dec. 4, 1998. The eventual winner, then-Texas Gov. George Bush (R), didn't open a campaign committee until March 8, 1999." Among those who have already formed an exploratory committee or a formal presidential committee: Arizona Sen. John McCain (R), Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback (R), ex-New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani (R), Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh (D) and Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack (D).

Rothenberg Says Great "Personal Story" Not Critical For Candidates. In a column titled, "Do '08 Presidential Contenders Need a Great Story?" Stuart Rothenberg writes in Roll Call (12/7), "Many presidential hopefuls have something in their life stories that can paint as a personal test or a hurdle that they overcome. The old 'born in a log cabin' chestnut is about as old as the country." However, "let's not go overboard about the value of a personal story. … A candidate's 'story' may get voters' attention, but a story is by its very nature backward-looking, while presidential contests are about the future. Ultimately, a candidate must offer more compelling reasons than a résumé to justify why he or she deserves to be nominated and elected." Rothenberg adds, "What matters most to voters in selecting a nominee for the White House? Lots of things, of course, but the most important question is whether, after months of campaigning, enough primary voters and caucus attendees in the early states think that a particular hopeful has passed the smell test. … Having an interesting story to tell is nice, but starting off with real advantages is a whole lot better."

Obama Says "You Don't Run For Vice President." On CNN's The Situation Room (12/6), Wolf Blitzer asked Sen. Barack Obama, "Do you want to be president or you want to be vice president?" Obama: "Well, you don't run for vice president." Blitzer: "So what does that mean? You want to be -- you want run for president?" Obama: "I answered the question, Wolf. I've got to go vote."

Meyerson Says GOP "Too Southern" To Win Anywhere Else. Harold Meyerson writes in the Washington Post (12/7, A31, 690K), "You've seen the numbers and understand that America is growing steadily less white. You try to push your party, the Grand Old Party, ahead of this curve by taking a tolerant stance on immigration and making common cause with some black churches. Then you go and blow it all in a desperate attempt to turn out your base by demonizing immigrants and running racist ads against Harold Ford. On Election Day, black support for Democrats remains high; Hispanic support for Democrats surges. So what do you do next? What else? Elect Trent Lott your deputy leader in the Senate. Sure locks in the support of any stray voters who went for Strom in '48." Meyerson adds, "In case you haven't noticed, a fundamental axiom of modern American politics has been altered in recent weeks. For four decades, it's been the Democrats who've had a Southern problem. Couldn't get any votes for their presidential candidates there; couldn't elect any senators, then any House members, then any dogcatchers. They still can't, but the Southern problem, it turns out, is really the Republicans'. They've become too Southern -- too suffused with the knee-jerk militaristic, anti-scientific, dogmatically religious, and culturally, sexually and racially phobic attitudes of Dixie -- to win friends and influence elections outside the South."

Egos Could Test Relations Of Ascending New York Democrats. The New York Times (12/7, Healy, 1.16M) leads with the "big" egos of New York politicians, like Sens. Clinton and Schumer, Gov.-elect Eliot Spitzer, Andrew Cuomo and Rep. Charles Rangel, whose respective "ascensions" to higher ranks will likely "test" their relationships. The Times discusses Spitzer's visit with the delegation that was marked by joking and "back-slapping." The article also discusses the state of relations between Clinton, Schumer and Spitzer.

Mary Cheney's Pregnancy Sparks Gay Marriage Debate. CNN's The Situation Room (12/6, Blitzer) reported, "The Vice President's office confirms his openly gay daughter, Mary Cheney, is pregnant. Dick Cheney and his wife, Lynne, are said to be looking forward to the birth with 'eager anticipation.' That's a direct quote. Mary Cheney is 37 years old, and has been with her partner, Heather Poe, for 15 years. The Vice President's spokeswoman would not discuss the circumstances of Mary Cheney's pregnancy." Later in the program, CNN (Snow) reported, "That arrival is already sparking widespread interest especially among gay rights advocates. … Will the Vice President's new grandchild soften conservatives' staunch opposition to gay marriage? At least one conservative says it won't make a difference." Robert Knight of the Culture and Media Institute: "Mary Cheney and her personal life shouldn't be the driving force behind public policy." Still later, Blitzer added that "Concerned Women for America put out a statement calling Mary Cheney, and I'm quoting now, 'The face of the tragic and burgeoning trend of women who don't want a father in the picture.'"

ABC World News (12/6, story 9, 0:35, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The pregnancy is causing some awkwardness for the White House. President Bush has opposed gay marriage and gay adoption. The Vice President's Office said he and Mrs. Cheney are eagerly awaiting the birth of their new grandchild."

The New York Times (12/7, Rutenberg, 1.16M) reports, "The announcement of the pregnancy…and Ms. Cheney's future status as a same-sex parent, prompted new debate over the administration's opposition to gay marriage. Family Pride, a gay rights group, noted that Ms. Cheney's home state, Virginia, does not recognize same-sex civil unions or marriages." In 2004, "Ms. Cheney worked on the Bush-Cheney re-election campaign, which won in part because of the so-called values voters who were drawn to the polls by ballot measures seeking to ban same-sex marriage."

The Washington Post's "Reliable Source" column (12/7, C2, Argetsinger, Roberts), which broke the story yesterday, says this morning "the circumstances of the pregnancy are super-secret." The Post adds, "What happens if they split up? Unless state law changes, Cheney could prevent Poe from any visitation or custody; conversely, Poe could walk away without providing child support. Can Poe sign school report cards? Depends on the school. Technically, only Cheney would be authorized to fill out all those school forms."

Conservative Jews To Allow Gay Rabbis, Same-Sex Unions. The New York Times (12/7, Goodstein, 1.16M) reports, "The highest legal body in Conservative Judaism, the centrist movement in worldwide Jewry, voted yesterday to allow the ordination of gay rabbis and the celebration of same-sex commitment ceremonies. The decision, which followed years of debate, was denounced by traditionalists in the movement as an indication that Conservative Judaism had abandoned its commitment to adhere to Jewish law, but celebrated by others as a long-awaited move toward full equality for gay people." But "in a reflection of the divisions in the movement, the 25 rabbis on the law committee passed three conflicting legal opinions -- one in favor of gay rabbis and unions, and two against. In doing so, the committee left it up to individual synagogues to decide whether to accept or reject gay rabbis and commitment ceremonies, saying that either course is justified according to Jewish law." The Washington Post (12/7, A17, Cooperman, 690K) also reports the story.

Castro Backer In Florida Has His Own Radio Show. The New York Times (12/7, Newman, 1.16M) reports, "At the far right end of the AM radio dial, a broadcast from a parallel universe emerges from the static: Come-hither advertisements from Cuba's state travel agency. Reportage from last weekend's Fidel Castro birthday parade in Havana, complete with an admiring assessment of Soviet-era tanks. Excerpts from speeches by whichever Castro brother is running the country. It is not a signal-jamming effort beamed from the Cuban coast like some kind of reverse Radio Martí. It is not, compadre, a joke of any sort." It is Francisco Aruca, "onetime Cuban political prisoner turned Castro admirer, speaking out from a little radio station on the industrial north side of Miami or, more often these days, from the comfort of his home office in the lush suburb of Pinecrest." The Times adds, "For 15 years, Mr. Aruca, founder of the first American company to run charter flights to Cuba, has doubled as on-air apologist for a man whom the vast majority of Cuban-Americans in Miami consider a despicable and murderous dictator."

Kondracke Sees Hope For Consensus On Some Health Care Issues. Morton Kondracke writes in Roll Call (12/7), "Partisan wrangling over health care could be as raucous in the new Congress as the sparring over Iraq, but in the longer run, there's reason to hope for consensus. The Bush administration and the new Democratic Congress almost certainly will be at odds over the Medicare prescription drug program, stem-cell research and funding for the State Children's Health Insurance Program." The Administration "will get nowhere -- once again -- if it proposes medical malpractice award ceilings to a Congress in which the trial lawyer lobby has gained influence. And Democrats detest health savings accounts, the GOP device to make individuals responsible for controlling health care costs." But "it's possible -- not likely, but possible -- that an agreement could be reached to expand children's health coverage." It is "also possible that Congress could help accelerate impressive Bush administration initiatives on 'value-driven' health care -- based on computerizing all medical records and providing accurate data on treatment outcomes -- and 'pay-for-performance' medicine." Kondracke adds, "A recent Gallup Poll showed that 71 percent of Americans think that US health care either has 'major problems' or is in 'a state of crisis.' And 69 percent think it's up to the federal government to fix it. That's a mandate."

Assistant Secretary Of State Says US Provided Pyongyang With Aid Details. The AP (12/7, Gedda) reports in recent discussions with North Korean officials Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill "offered specific details on the kind of economic and energy assistance Pyongyang would receive in exchange for dismantling its nuclear weapons facilities," a State Department official said Wednesday. Hill said last week the next round of six party talks "could be held in mid-December but the department official who spoke Wednesday, while not ruling out that time frame, raised the possibility of an early January meeting."

Meanwhile, AFP (12/7) reports former Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi is "weighing a third visit to North Korea to persuade the communist regime to give up its nuclear ambitions," according to reports from Japan's NHK broadcaster. Koizumi was quoted as saying, "I want to realize the denuclearization of the Korean Peninsula, which is an absolute must, although I don't interfere with Prime Minister (Shinzo) Abe's policy management."

India Nuclear Bill Stalls In House. The AP (12/7, Klug) reports legislation to allow US shipment of civilian nuclear fuel to India has "bogged down as lawmakers try to reconcile differences in the waning days of the congressional session." Ohio Rep. John Boehner "stalled a preliminary settlement on the text after an agreement was reached Wednesday morning," according to congressional aides. The aides said Boehner "appeared to be interested in attaching unrelated legislation, though they did not know what that might be." However, the majority leader's office "denied that he was holding up the bill and said talks were under way." Negotiations were expected to resume Thursday.

UN Seeks $450 Million In Aid For Palestinians. The AP (12/7, Nessman) reports UN aid groups are asking for "a record $450 million to staunch a deepening Palestinian humanitarian crisis, saying Wednesday that international sanctions and Israeli limits on Gaza exports have devastated the Palestinian economy." Despite "that gloomy assessment," a top minister in the Palestinian government offered "a rare upbeat economic picture, saying increased aid from Arab countries had allowed the government to stay afloat. But independent economists and analysts said the government was still deep in crisis." The UN is expected to officially launch its appeal Thursday, but The AP obtained an advance copy of the report.

Israel Says Abducted Soldiers Were Injured. The New York Times (12/7, Kraft, 1.16M) reports that two Israeli Army reservists whose capture "set off Israel's war with Hezbollah last summer" were "seriously wounded in the attack," an Israeli military report that emerged on Wednesday was quoted as saying. The information about the two reservists, "along with recent comments by Prime Minister Ehud Olmert that he wanted proof that the two soldiers were alive before making any decision on an exchange," has "raised speculation here that the two could be dead," the Times notes.

New Israeli Official Outlines Iran Agenda Ahead Of US Visit. The New York Times (12/7, Myre, 1.16M) reports Israel's new minister for strategic affairs, Avigdor Lieberman, is charged with the country's strategy on Iran. Lieberman, who is making his first visit to the US Thursday, will meet with American officials, including Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. In an interview on the eve of his trip, he said, "Our first task is to convince Western countries to adopt a tough approach to the Iranian problem," which he called "the biggest threat facing the Jewish people since the Second World War." However, he added, "We must also be prepared to deal alone with this problem." To date, Israel's policy is "to remain relatively low-key and to work with the United States and Europe in search of a way to halt or contain Iran's nuclear program," but Lieberman had made it "clear he has no faith in the diplomatic efforts."

Carter Aide Resigns Over Book Dispute. The New York Times (12/7, A35, Goodman, Bosman, 1.16M) reports that an adviser to former President Jimmy Carter and onetime executive director of the Carter Center has "publicly parted ways with his former boss, citing concerns with the accuracy and integrity of Mr. Carter's latest book, 'Palestine: Peace Not Apartheid.'" In a two-page letter explaining his action, Kenneth W. Stein called the book "replete with factual errors, copied materials not cited, superficialities, glaring omissions and simply invented segments." The Times says Stein's criticism is "the latest in a growing chorus of academics who have taken issue with the book, including Alan M. Dershowitz, professor of law at Harvard, who called the book 'ahistorical,' and David Makovsky, director of the Project on the Middle East Process at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy."

In an article about Stein's resignation, the Washington Post (12/7, A4, Deyoung, 690K) notes that the book as "quickly became a bestseller," and during an appearance Sunday on NBC's "Meet the Press," Carter said, "If it provokes debate and assessment and disputes and arguments and maybe some action in the Middle East to get the peace process, which is now completely absent or dormant, rejuvenated, and brings peace ultimately to Israel, that's what I want."

Paulson Seeks To Temper Expectations Ahead Of China Visit. The Wall Street Journal (12/7, A6, Solomon, 2.04M) reports that as Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson prepares to lead a delegation to China, he is "seeking to temper the expectations of lawmakers and business interests eager for action by Beijing." Paulson is "cautioning that he won't have any big announcement after the high-level visit next week," instead saying he views the meeting with Chinese leaders as the beginning of a "long term" discussion, and that "simply sitting down to discuss economic issues with top Chinese officials should be seen as progress." However, the Journal says Paulson is "likely to come under increasing pressure from members of Congress and US manufacturers, who want less talk and more action."

Focus Of Poison Probe Turns To Former Spy As Death Officially Ruled As Murder. The CBS Evening News (12/6, story 12, 0:20, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "The case of the former Russian spy who died of radiation poisoning last month is now officially a murder investigation in London. British police are now in Moscow to interview another ex-spy, Andrei Lugovoy, who met with Alexander Litvinenko in London the day he got sick. Lugovoy himself is in the hospital now being treated for radiation poisoning."

The Los Angeles Times (12/7, Holley, Murphy, 850K) reports that British and Russian investigators questioned one of the people Litvinenko met with on the day he was believed to have been poisoned, Russian businessman Dmitry Kovtun, at a Moscow hospital Wednesday, where he was apparently undergoing checks for radiation." However, questioning of Lugovoy was "put off at least to Thursday." Meanwhile, the British Foreign Office announced Wednesday that "small traces of radiation have been found at the British embassy in Moscow." Lugovoy visited the embassy "early in the investigation," which prompted the examination.

The AP (12/7, Lawless) reports Russia's ITAR-Tass news agency quoted a lawyer for Lugovoy as saying the meeting with Scotland Yard detectives would take place "Thursday or Friday." In a separate report, the AP (12/7, Ingram) says a British official told the newswire Wednesday that "Lugovoy is one of many people investigators are looking to question" and is not considered "a suspect at this point."

The Financial Times (12/7, Buckley) notes that the "upgrading of the inquiry came as British detectives in Moscow began interviewing contacts of Litvinenko" and claims that "Russian secret services had been ordered to kill him by the Kremlin," charges it dismisses as "nonsense." However, the Times says the "tangled case is threatening to create a significant rift in Russia's relations with the UK and other western partners." The New York Times (12/7, A3, Myers, Cowell, 1.16M) and the Washington Post (12/7, A18, Jordan, Finn, 690K) also report on the developments in the investigation.

Former Russian PM Says "Hidden Adversaries" Behind Poisoning. Meanwhile, former prime minister of the Russian Federation, Yegor Gaidar, details in the Financial Times (12/6) the events of his own suspected radiation poisoning late last month. Gaidar says that when he "started thinking about who could have orchestrated" his poisoning, he initially "rejected the idea of complicity of the Russian leadership almost immediately." However, "after the death of Alexander Litvinenko on November 23 in London," Gaidar says "another violent death of a famous Russian on the following day is the last thing that the Russian authorities would want." Therefore, he concludes that "most likely that means that some obvious or hidden adversaries of the Russian authorities stand behind the scenes of this event, those who are interested in further radical deterioration of relations between Russia and the west."

UN Approves Peacekeepers For Somalia. The New York Times (12/7, A7, 1.16M) reports briefly that UNSC Wednesday unanimously passed a resolution backing the formation of a peacekeeping force to "monitor the Somali government's struggle with Islamist foes, partly lifting an arms embargo and calling for peace talks." Ambassador Bolton remarked, "It may not be a complete solution to the problem, and that's one reason why we've encouraged the mediation of various parties and to have all the Somalia factions talk with one another."

The Washington Post (12/7, A24, Lynch, 690K) notes that the resolution was passed "after the United States accommodated a European request to exclude participation by Somalia's neighbors, Ethiopia, Kenya and Djibouti, in the new force." The Los Angeles Times (12/7, Farley, 850K) also reports on the move.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Senators Grill Mueller About NSA Surveillance Program. The AP (12/7, Jordan) reports in a widely-distributed story, "Senators frustrated by scant details on the Bush administration's domestic eavesdropping program on Wednesday rapped FBI Director Robert Mueller for refusing to show how it has curbed terrorist activity in the United States. Mueller said he was unable to talk about the warrantless spying program because it is classified." Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter asked, "What assurances can you provide that the program is worthwhile? Have arrests been made? Have terror cells been broken?" The AP notes, "In his opening remarks, Mueller ticked off a list of FBI cases targeting terror suspects since the 2001 attacks. … But Mueller did not say if any of the cases resulted from the secret spying program, which was revealed last year. His answer annoyed senators, who said their constitutionally protected oversight was being hampered by the administration's stonewalling."

PBS Newshour with Jim Lehrer (12/6, 7:00 p.m., Lehrer) broadcasted, "FBI Director Mueller balked today at giving the results of domestic surveillance. The eavesdropping on international calls and e-mails is done without warrants. At a hearing, Mueller faced persistent questioning from Arlen Specter, the chairman of the Senate judiciary committee." Sen. Arlen Specter, Chairman of Senate Judiciary Committee: "What assurances can you provide to this committee and the American people that the program is worthwhile? Have arrests been made? Have terrorist cells been broken up?" Robert Mueller, FBI Director: "All I can tell you, sir, is the compartment is classified. It is compartmented, and if given the permission to provide such a brief allegation we have breached the intelligence committee, we are happy to do so, sir." Lehrer: "Mueller did say that the FBI had broken up several terror plots since 9/11."

Under the headline "Mueller's Reticence Angers Senate Panel," the Washington Times (12/7, Seper, 88K) reports Mueller "was subjected to bipartisan…after refusing to discuss the Bush administration's domestic terrorist-surveillance program because it is 'classified.'" Mueller "stepped further into the breach when he told Mr. Specter the FBI had given a 'full briefing' on the program to the Senate Intelligence Committee behind closed doors. 'Well, we're very interested in that, Director Mueller, but not as interested as a full briefing to this committee,' said Mr. Specter, adding that 'this committee has oversight jurisdiction over the FBI. We're going to pursue that, Director Mueller. That is not what I view as a satisfactory response by the administration.'" Meanwhile, NPR's All Things Considered (12/6, Shapiro) called the hearing "combative," noting that "every senator brought an issue." In addition to Specter's questions about domestic surveillance, NPR reported Sen. Dianne Feinstein's criticism of FBI anti-gang priorities, as well as criticism of the Amerithrax probe from Sens. Charles Grassley and Patrick Leahy.

Senate Democrats May Press Administration On Terrorism, Privacy Concerns. The New York Times (12/7, Lichtblau) reports, "Leading Senate Democrats put the Bush administration on notice Wednesday that they intended to press for a fuller accounting on a wide range of counterterrorism programs, including wiretapping, data-mining operations and the interrogation and treatment of detainees." The Times continues, "Democrats have appeared divided at times over how aggressively to challenge the administration on its terrorism policies, in part because of concerns that they risked playing into Republican accusations that they were soft on terrorism. … But Senator Patrick J. Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, who will take over next month as chairman of the Judiciary Committee, made clear at a committee hearing Wednesday that he wanted to investigate actively the effectiveness and legality of many programs. … 'The administration's gone to unprecedented lengths to hide its own activities from the public while at the same time collecting an unprecedented amount of data on private citizens,' Mr. Leahy told Robert S. Mueller III, the director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation." The Times adds, "As the sole witness at the hearing, Mr. Mueller bore the brunt of the Democrats' criticism. But their sharp questions often went well beyond the F.B.I.'s purview, delving into areas like the National Security Agency's eavesdropping program, the Central Intelligence Agency's interrogations of Qaeda suspects and the Department of Homeland Security's use of profiling scores to assess the risks posed by travelers. … As a first step toward what Mr. Leahy described as an effort to roll back the administration's curtailment of rights, he and Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania, proposed legislation that would seek to restore the rights of all terrorism suspects to challenge their detentions in court. … Brian Roehrkasse, a spokesman for the Justice Department, said that while the administration would review the Leahy-Specter proposal, the process approved by Congress allows enemy combatants to challenge their detention and 'goes well beyond what is required for lawful prisoners of war under both international and domestic law.'"

Leahy Says FBI, DOJ Oversight Will Be One Of His "Highest Priorities." In its story focusing on Mueller's comments about the Weldon probe leak, Bloomberg (12/7, Schmidt) also reports, "Senator Patrick Leahy, the Vermont Democrat who will take over as committee chairman next year, promised to press the FBI on privacy issues related to personal information the government collects to protect against terrorist attacks. 'There is a growing concern in this country that our government knows too much about us,' Leahy said. Leahy told Mueller that 'oversight of the FBI and the Department of Justice will be one of my highest priorities next year.'"

FBI Seeks More Funds To Avoid Tech Upgrade Delays. Government Executive (12/7, Pulliam) reports, "The FBI's $425 million effort to upgrade its case management system is at risk of delays if Congress does not provide additional funds in the next stopgap spending measure, the bureau's chief told lawmakers Wednesday." GE continues, "Testifying before the Senate Judiciary Committee, FBI Director Robert Mueller said the bureau needs $157 million to begin the second phase of building the system, known as Sentinel, in February as planned. … President Bush included $100 million for the project in his fiscal 2007 budget request. According to Mueller, the Office of Management and Budget has helped the FBI find the additional $57 million, using funds left over from the first phase of the effort and unspent balances in other accounts. … The House version of the fiscal 2007 Science, State, Justice, Commerce and related agencies spending bill, which includes FBI funding, meets the administration's $100 million request. But the Senate version provides an appropriation of only $40 million. The bill has yet to be completed." GE adds, "The Senate did not grant the full request because the FBI failed to fully respond to a March 24, 2006, letter from the Judiciary Committee relating to the bureau's modernization efforts. Language in the report accompanying the appropriations bill stated that the funding levels would be reconsidered if FBI officials answer the committee's outstanding questions. … The current continuing resolution to keep money flowing to agencies in the absence of final fiscal 2007 appropriations is set to expire Dec. 8. Agency officials have asked that when lawmakers extend it, they provide $80 million for Sentinel."

Officials Fear Al Qaeda Could Strike In UK. The Financial Times (12/7, Fidler) reports, "Britain's security services have concluded that al-Qaeda is rebuilding its headquarters' operation in Pakistan and that the UK is the western country mainly at risk from the development, according to UK government officials. The conclusion, drawn from examinations of past plots and other evidence, runs counter to conventional wisdom that al-Qaeda has been in retreat as an operational force and has become essentially a "brand" that inspires radical Muslims to commit acts of terror." The Times adds, "The theme was addressed in public last month in a speech by Dame Eliza Manningham-Buller, director-general of the UK's domestic security service. She said the service knew of some 30 plots and had identified 1,600 people actively engaged in plotting, or facilitating, terrorist acts here and abroad. … UK government officials, speak-ing on condition they not be named, say they have evidence that some groups receive direction from Pakistan, in particular from the lawless tribal areas near the Afghan borders."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Gonzales To Tour Supermax Prison In February. The Rocky Mountain News (12/7, Burnett) reports, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales plans to tour Supermax prison with Sen. Ken Salazar in February, Salazar's spokesman said today." The News continues, "Salazar said he hopes the Feb. 21 tour will bring much-needed attention to the nation's highest-security federal prison, which has seen a decrease in staff and increased concerns about security since it opened in Florence in 1994. .. .The prison is home to inmates such as 9/11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui, 1993 World Trade Center bomber Ramzi Yousef and Oklahoma City bombing conspirator Terry Nichols." The News adds, "In September, a Justice Department inspector general's report criticized the prison for not properly screening terrorists' mail and other communications. A federal indictment also revealed that a drug kingpin had used coded messages to conduct business in Los Angeles from inside Supermax."

The AP (12/7) reports, "This year an arbitrator found staffing levels had made the facility more dangerous, with some shifts going unfilled. In September, a Justice Department report criticized the prison for not properly screening mail and other communications." The AP adds, "Gonzales had committed to a tour when he met with Salazar last month, when he restated the Bureau of Prison's commitment to add 18 staff members to the prison by the end of the year."

Local Television. KJCT- TV (12/6, 10:00 p.m.) in Grand Junction, Durango, and Montrose broadcasts, "Senator Ken Salazar and US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales will tour the Supermax prison in Florence next February. Salazar says he hopes the tour will bring more attention to security and staffing concerns at the nation's highest-security federal prison. The prison houses the nation's most dangerous inmates."

KKCO- TV (12/6, 10:00 p.m.) in Grand Junction, Durango, Montrose, broadcasts, "Glen questions about the security of one of the prisons holding the nation's most notorious criminals is prompting a visit from federal officials. Florence, Colorado Supermax security prompts investigation Senator Ken Salazar announced he will visit the Supermax prison near Florence Colorado along with Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. The prison has been criticized for being understaffed. And that mail is not adequately screened."

KMGH- TV (12/6, 4:00 p.m.) in Denver, "Alberto Gonzales will visit Supermax in February. It houses the nation's most notorious prisoners."

US-Bound Cargo To Be Tested For Radiation At Four Foreign Ports. USA Today (12/7, 9A, Hall, 2.27M) reports the Homeland Security and Energy departments will announce today that beginning next year, "containers at ports in Korea, Oman, Honduras and the United Kingdom" will be scanned for radiation before being loaded onto US-bound ships in "the first phase of a program that could expand to ports worldwide." Korea is "one of the world's largest ports" and will only have some cargo containers run through detectors, but "officials expect most or all will be" scanned at the smaller ports. "Either way, the program should deter anyone aiming to sneak weapons onto a cargo ship," Homeland Security Deputy Secretary Michael Jackson said.

EPA To Start Final 9/11 Cleanup Program. The New York Times (12/7, Depalma, 1.16M) reports, "More than five years after contaminated dust from the World Trade Center seeped into apartments and offices throughout Lower Manhattan, the federal Environmental Protection Agency announced plans yesterday to start a final indoor cleanup program next month, despite widespread criticism that the program is seriously flawed." Agency "officials said residents and owners of commercial buildings below Canal Street would have 60 days to sign up for the voluntary program, which will test for asbestos, lead, vitreous fibers and harmful soot that may have come from the collapse of the trade center. If any one of the contaminants is found, the space will be professionally cleaned at no cost to the resident or owner. … Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, who in 2004 forced the environmental agency to test indoor spaces for contamination, called the program announced yesterday 'totally inadequate.'"

NYTimes Urges Democrats To Adopt All 9/11 Panel Recommendations. The New York Times (12/7, 1.16M) editorializes, "Weeks before they take majority control of the Capitol, the Democrats are reported to be wriggling out of one of their most important campaign vows: to repair Congressional oversight of the nation's intelligence agencies. Congress was found to be nothing less than 'dysfunctional' on this duty by the Sept. 11 commission, which wisely recommended a full-scale revamping of the committee structure. … Now that they can taste power again, however, the victors seem to be having second thoughts. Instead of attempting wholesale committee reform in the first weeks of Congress, Democratic leaders may punt the idea toward oblivion in some sort of a study panel, according to The Washington Post. Nothing could be more disappointing to voters. … Surely, the leaders of the new Congress know they will be risking the nation's security, far more than their credibility, if they retreat from the vow to do a stronger job of oversight."

Nagin Says Federal Government Has Abandoned New Orleans. In a front page article, USA Today (12/7, 1A, Eisler, Heath, 2.27M) reports on an interview with New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin in which he "accused the federal government…of abandoning its legal obligation to help his city recover from the devastation of Hurricane Katrina." He "insisted that even the city's most flood-prone areas should be rebuilt — albeit 'smarter and safer.' He said that can't happen unless promised federal aid begins to flow." Though Nagin said "local officials have not been able to access" most of the $900 million approved by the federal government to rebuild New Orleans' infrastructure, the head of FEMA's recovery office in Louisiana, James Stark, "said most of the federal money already has been turned over to Louisiana" and that the agency "has been working to speed up the funding process."

Under the headline "'We're Going To Do It.'" USA Today (12/7, 13A, 2.27M) runs an excerpt from its interview with Nagin and City Council members Oliver Thomas Jr., Cynthia Hedge-Morrell and Arnie Fielkow. Asked what must be done to make the recover process in New Orleans work, Nagin said, "The main thing we need right now is the $900 million that is pending through the Federal Emergency Management Agency for infrastructure repairs. The second thing is the dollars our citizens need to rebuild their homes and their lives." Nagin said only 44 citizens have "received a check" through the Road Home program. Nagin added later that the program is "not meeting the needs of our citizens. It needs to move more quickly with more dollars. We have to get to a point where I can say to a citizen, you can't live here or you shouldn't live here because of the risk, but here's how we move you to a better place to rebuild your life."

GAO Says FEMA Wasting Millions In Katrina Aid. The Washington Post/AP (12/7, A12, Yen) reports investigators for the Government Accountability Office said Wednesday that the federal government "is squandering tens of millions of dollars in Hurricane Katrina disaster help, in some cases doling out housing payments to people living rent-free." Meanwhile, FEMA "has recouped less than 1 percent of the $1 billion that investigators contend it wasted on fraudulent assistance." GAO's Gregory Kutz told a Senate hearing that the office's "work shows for individual assistance payments, at least tens of thousands of individuals took the opportunity to commit fraud." He added "that his previous $1 billion estimate of wasted aid was now 'likely understated.'" FEMA spokesman Pat Philbin said "the agency has sought to upgrade the registration process and strengthen its procedures for verifying names and addresses."

USA Today (12/7, 7A, Hall, 2.27M) reports, "Among the latest examples of waste were duplicate payments to people claiming the same damage to their homes from two hurricanes." Sen. Susan Collins "called the new revelations about FEMA 'truly alarming.'" NPR (12/6, Anne, Kelly) reported on its website that Collins said the agency "has yet to strike a proper balance between expedited assistance and good stewardship of taxpayers' funds. Current practices invite and enable fraud, harming the very people the program is designed to help."

Louisiana Disputes FEMA Bill For Payments On Fraudulent Claims. The New York Times (12/7, Eaton, 1.16M) reports Louisiana officials "have gone to court to try to prevent the Federal Emergency Management Agency from collecting about $60 million from the state," arguing that the state should not be responsible for fraudulent claims paid by the agency. "The federal government has asked a judge to dismiss the lawsuit, contending that Louisiana cannot refuse to pay charges it disagrees with — even when the charges are the result of fraudulent claims — and that the state has no right to audit FEMA's spending." The figure in dispute "includes $45 million withheld because the state estimates that about 12 percent of FEMA's other needs spending went to people who were probably not eligible for it."

WAR NEWS:

Iraq Study Group Report Seen As Rebuke Of Bush Policies. To say that the release of the Iraq Study Group Report dominates news coverage would be a major understatement. Stories about or related to the release of the 142-page report by the panel headed by ex-Secretary of State James Baker and ex-Rep. Lee Hamilton took up 48 minutes of the three major network news broadcasts Wednesday night, with ABC giving the topic 13 and one-half minutes, NBC just over 16 minutes, and CBS a full 20 minutes. Major newspapers across the country have their own front-page reports and detailed analyses. Most media analyses suggest the release of the eagerly anticipated document puts great pressure on President Bush to chart a new course for the US in Iraq. Much of the coverage is very favorable toward the ISG and its report, which is being portrayed as a blunt rebuke of the Administration's Iraq policies.

ABC World News (12/6, lead story, 2:10, Gibson, 8.78M) said the report "read a bit like a report card on the Bush Administration's conduct of the war and the marks were not good." ABC (Karl) added, "The commission calls not just for a change in military strategy but also a complete overhaul of US foreign policy in the Middle East."

NBC Nightly News (12/6, lead story, 3:15, Williams, 9.87M) said "10 prominent Americans appeared before reporters after working for nine months on a plan for the US in Iraq. Between them they have hundreds of years of government experience, Republicans and Democrats who today delivered a blunt bipartisan and grim assessment." NBC (Gregory) added, "This report is a harsh review of the President's handling of the Iraq war, a rejection of the President's recent claim that the US is winning in Iraq. The report concludes just the opposite, that the current approach is not working." A bit later on NBC Nightly News (12/6, story 5, 2:05, Williams, 9.87M), Tim Russert said, "The one thing that resonated today, whether you're liberal, conservative, Democrat, Republican, for the war or against the war, was the grimness of this report. They used the word 'dire.' … When 10 Americans in a bipartisan way come together in a unanimous report and say it's grave and getting worse, it was heard throughout official Washington."

In the most negative of the three network openings, the CBS Evening News (12/6, lead story, 2:20, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "The US military confirms that 10 more American soldiers were killed in Iraq today, some in combat, others by roadside bombs. With each death, with every passing day, so many of us ask, 'Is there any way out of this nightmare?' Today we got an answer from a bipartisan commission. … The committee does recommend a new diplomatic offensive to end the violence in Iraq, one that would include Iran and Syria, something the President has rejected in the past." The CBS Evening News (12/6, story 3, 1:00, Axelrod, 7.66M) additionally said, "From the outset, the President's aides have set he will not outsource his foreign policy. This report calls for several things that would force the President to alter his course, if not pull a 180-degree turn, and that hasn't exactly been a hallmark of this presidency to date."

A harsh AP (12/6, Flaherty, Espo) report appearing in well over 100 newspapers or on their web sites says the ISG concluded that "President Bush's war policies have failed in almost every regard," warning of "dwindling chances to change course before crisis turns to chaos with dire implications for terrorism, war in the Middle East and higher oil prices around the world." The Washington Post (12/7, A1, Abramowitz, Wright, 690K) says the "panel of prominent elder leaders yesterday offered a stinging assessment of virtually every aspect of the U.S. venture in Iraq and called for a reshaping of the American military presence and a new Middle East diplomatic initiative to prevent the country from sliding into anarchy," while the he Los Angeles Times (12/7, Richter, 850K) says the report used "uncompromising and dismal terms" to say "continuing deterioration in Iraq could inflame the entire region in a deadly war that would further curtail U.S. influence throughout the world."

USA Today (12/7, 1A, Nichols, Slavin, 2.27M) said the "much-awaited report" calls for "U.S. troop withdrawals by 2008 to prevent" Iraq's "slide toward 'chaos.'" The Wall Street Journal (12/7, A1, Dreazen, King, 2.04M) also focuses on the call for drawing down troop strength, saying the report offers a "prescription for withdrawing most U.S. troops by a specific date and dismissal of calls to partition Iraq or send additional American forces there." McClatchy (12/7, Hutcheson) reports the "eagerly anticipated report" called for a "get-tough approach that would set clear milestones for the Iraqis in conjunction with a gradual withdrawal of U.S. troops." The Financial Times (12/7, Sevastopulo, Daniel, Luce) says the report "called for a radical change of course in US policy."

The New York Times (12/7, A1, Sanger, 1.16M) cites the report's "unusually sweeping and blunt language" in its 79 recommendations, which "included a call for direct engagement with Syria and Iran as part of a 'new diplomatic offensive,' jump-starting the Israeli-Palestinian peace effort, and a clear declaration that the United States would reduce its support to Iraq unless Baghdad made 'substantial progress' on reconciliation and security." The Baltimore Sun (12/7, Davis, 257K) calls it "a grim and strongly worded report."

The Chicago Tribune (12/7, Silva, 617K) says Bush was presented "with both a pointed critique of his handling of the war and a road map for changing course in Iraq that would require the president to transform the military mission and recalibrate in fundamental ways his approach to Middle East diplomacy." The Houston Chronicle (12/7, A1, Hedges, Roth, 530K) says the report "painted a dire portrait of the situation in Iraq while calling for all American combat brigades to be withdrawn by the first quarter of 2008, barring unexpected developments."

With a slightly different focus, the Christian Science Monitor (12/7, LaFranchi, 59K) says the report "avoids some controversial proposals. This reflects the panel's bipartisan makeup as well as a desire not to be dismissed by the White House out of hand. But it does call for increased pressure on the Iraqi government to make progress in key areas of reconciliation and governability -- and to withdraw US support if progress is not made. … One downbeat note greeting the report is that, no matter how good some of its recommendations may be, it may simply have been overtaken by the deterioration of conditions on the ground in Iraq."

In a front-page news analysis, the New York Times (12/7, Stolberg, 1.16M) writes, "In 142 stark pages, the Iraq Study Group report makes an impassioned plea for bipartisan consensus on the most divisive foreign policy issue of this generation. Without President Bush, that cannot happen." While the ISG members "gave a nod to Mr. Bush, adopting his language in accepting the goal of an Iraq that can 'govern itself, sustain itself and defend itself,'" the Administration's "talk of Iraq as a beacon of democracy in the Middle East is absent, as is any talk of victory."

The Washington Post (12/7, Kessler, Ricks, 690K) also runs an analysis piece on its front page, saying the report "might well be titled 'The Realist Manifesto.' From the very first page, in which" Baker and Hamilton "scold that 'our leaders must be candid and forthright with the American people,' the bipartisan report is nothing less than a repudiation of the Bush administration's diplomatic and military approach to Iraq and to the whole region." The report "reflects the foreign policy establishment's disdain for the 'neoconservative' policies long espoused by President Bush and his aides." Also in the Washington Post (12/7, A2, 690K), Dana Milbank says the ISG "placed an improvised explosive device beneath the Bush administration's Iraq policy."

An AP (12/6, Raum) news analysis says that now that Bush "has the outlines of a bipartisan exit strategy for Iraq and a new secretary of defense to help carry it out," the "pressure on him to change course is now politically enormous."

NBC Nightly News (12/6, story 6, 2:15, Williams, 9.87M) ran an "In Depth" report on "reaction we are able to gauge from across the country." NBC (Allen) noted that Wednesday was the "eve of that day of infamy" when Japan attacked the US at Pearl Harbor, adding that "even these military families disagree with the Iraq study group's sober assessment of the war." One said, "I don't think we are done there yet." But another said, "Get everybody out of Iraq. It will be another Vietnam if not worse." The CBS Evening News (12/6, story 14, 2:40, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "When the story is written about what finally got the United States out of Iraq, it will have less to do with the Baker-Hamilton report than with this: the mounting toll that turned so many Americans against the war; more than 2,900 dead, more than 22,000 wounded."

Bartlett Says Bush Will Present "One Single Way Forward." Counselor to the President Dan Bartlett spoke for the White House on PBS, MSNBC, and CNN. On PBS' NewsHour (12/6, Suarez), he said, "It's been a constructive dialogue today. The Administration is looking at all of these recommendations very carefully. As we stated, we're not going to have an instant analysis of every piece of information coming out just yet. There is a robust review under way by the Administration, by the military leadership, by the national security staff. So there's a lot of activity under way, but the President was deeply grateful for the service to the country that these people provided by producing this report." On MSNBC's Hardball (12/6, Barnicle), Bartlett said, "President Bush recognizes a sense of urgency when it comes to helping, not only Iraq get on a better path and what role the neighborhood can play in that, but also how important the Middle East peace process can be."

On CNN's The Situation Room (12/6, Blitzer), Bartlett said, "We do want to have as quick an assessment as possible. As you know, there is a very comprehensive assessment going on by the administration, his military leadership, the National Security Council staff. And the President will be meeting with members of his Administration in the next week or two to also get their findings. The President will have one single way forward that he will present to the American people, hopefully before the end of the year, so the American people, our allies in the region and everybody, for that matter, will know quite as clearly as possible about the way forward."

USA Today (12/7, 2A, 2.27M) says the ISG "isn't the only review of U.S. policy in Iraq: The Bush administration has launched its own appraisal. Last month, President Bush asked the National Security Council to coordinate studies that in some cases had been underway for months." National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley "hasn't set a deadline for a final report but says it will be completed in 'weeks, not months.'"

Recommendations Could Be Hard Sell On Capitol Hill. NBC Nightly News (12/6, story 2, 2:20, Williams, 9.87M) reported on the "reaction here on Capitol Hill and this question of how easy or hard it may be to implement even some of this report's key recommendations." NBC (Mitchell) added, "The Baker-Hamilton group overcame its divisions now we will see if Congress can do the same. Leaders of the study group knew their report would be a tough sell on Capitol Hill. Democratic leaders' response sounded a lot like 'we told you so.'" Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi: "They said we must transition our troops out of Iraq. We begin by changing the mission. Democrats have been saying that all along." Mitchell said the "study group's controversial call for direct talks with Iran and Syria" also found Capitol Hill critics. Sen. Joseph Lieberman: "I see it as a non-starter. Why do I? Iran has exactly the opposite interests that we do in Iraq." Sen. John McCain: "If the price of negotiations with Iran is their nuclear weapons program that is not good enough."

ABC World News (12/6, story 3, 2:25, Stephanopoulos, 8.78M) said, "This report ratified a consensus here in Washington. Republicans and Democrats agree that the current strategy has failed, that the situation is slipping, and that a serious change of course is necessary. Now, there is a lot of disagreement over the 79 recommendations. But as a practical matter, Capitol Hill is now in a holding pattern. Everyone here is waiting to see what the President does with the report."

CNN's The Situation Room (12/6, Blitzer) reported, "On Capitol Hill, the early reaction to the Iraq Study Group's plan of action in Iraq is mostly favorable. But after a bitter election and with Democrats poised to take power, lawmakers may not necessarily be ready to put all their old battles over Iraq behind them." CNN (Bash) continued, "Democratic leaders insist time and time again that they're ready and willing to work with the President on a new bipartisan approach to Iraq if he is willing to make major changes there. But what this bipartisan report did was, at least initially, stoke the bitter partisan Iraq divide."

The Hill (12/7, Schor) says incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid said he "felt vindicated by the report and that it would lead to the beginning of military withdrawal." Reid said, "The President has the ball in his court now."

Sen. Barack Obama said on CNN's The Situation Room (12/6, Blitzer), "I thought that the Iraq Study Group did a terrific job of providing, for the first time, in a bipartisan fashion, a realistic assessment of what's taking place there. And many of the recommendations that they put forward mirrored recommendations that I made in a speech in Chicago three weeks ago. … This now gives us an opportunity, as Democrats and Republicans, and as Americans, to come together and say what are the tasks and objectives that we can set for ourselves that will lead to a more acceptable outcome."

Sen. Chuck Hagel said on PBS' NewsHour (12/6, Ifill), "We have a very significant contribution that's just been made here by 10 very important Americans. … I have a sense that the impending disaster in Iraq is unwinding at a rate that we can't quite calibrate. … The fact is the future of Iraq will be determined by the Iraqi people. It's not going to be determined by us."

Sen. Lindsay Graham said on Fox News' Your World (12/6, Cavuto) said, "I appreciate their recommendations. But I am in this thing to win. I believe it's the central battlefront on the war on terror. If you believe that, you throw everything you have as a nation to win. We've never had enough troops. The reason there's chaos in Iraq is because the insurgency has bloomed and moderation has been oppressed."

Sen. Christopher Dodd said on PBS' NewsHour (12/6, Ifill), "To pick up on Jim Baker's suggestion that we send a message to the American people and to others, particularly in Iraq and elsewhere, that this is something that we can generally support -- there may be differences on specifics -- but overall I think it's the right direction, and we ought to be doing that."

Rep. Phil Gingrey said on MSNBC's Tucker (12/6, Carlson), "I think the President responded in the appropriate fashion. He said every recommendation, all 79 of them, will be looked at. They won't necessarily be rubber-stamped."

The CBS Evening News (12/6, story 5, 2:40, Couric, 7.66M) reported on the "key recommendation of this commission" to create an "Iraq support group involving many other countries, including Syria and Iran. The President has frozen them out to this point, so will there be a thaw?" CBS (Axelrod) added, "Recommendation No. 9 suggests the United States should engage directly with Iran and Syria, something Mr. Bush has repeatedly rejected. Today, the Administration seemed to draw limits on this idea of expanded diplomacy, at least with Iran because of its nuclear program." Tony Snow, White House Press Secretary: "I'm telling you that there may be a difference between one-on-one talks with Iran, which is something that we have ruled out." Axelrod: "The report also concludes there will be no peace in the Middle East until the US deals directly the Israeli/Palestinian conflict. That's an idea the Administration seemed to be open to today."

NBC Nightly News (12/6, story 3, 0:45, Engel, 9.87M) said that in Lebanon, "there is a hope that this could be the start not just of a new policy in Iraq, but throughout the Middle East, one that revitalizes the Arab-Israeli peace process, and tries to prevent the conflict in Iraq from spreading beyond the borders. But there is also concern that if Washington engages in serious negotiations with Iran and Syria, then the smaller states in the Middle East, namely Lebanon and Israel, are worried that they will have to pay the price for those negotiations by offering concessions. Many tonight in this region are asking if President Bush is really a statesman, a negotiator."

Report Gets Mixed Reaction In Iraq. ABC World News (12/6, story 4, 2:45, Gibson, 8.78M) reported that "in Iraq itself," a deputy prime minister "said, 'There is no doubt that the government of Iraq carries a heavy burden.' But an influential Sunni group, the Association of Muslim Scholars, said that the report is unrealistic in the solutions it provided. And that group questioned whether US troops could successfully train Iraqi forces." The CBS Evening News (12/6, story 7, 0:50, Palmer, 7.66M) said, "The report does appear to bolster" Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki "by giving him something he wants very much, and that is more control over the Iraqi security forces sooner rather than later. And he's said that he's onside with the diplomatic initiative in the report. In other words, he will send envoys to the neighbors Iran and Syria to ask if they'll help in stabilizing Iraq."

The Washington Post (12/7, A1, Raghavan, 690K) reports that Iraqis "expressed fear that the report's recommendations, if implemented, could weaken an already besieged government in a country teetering on the edge of civil war. 'It is a report to solve American problems, and not to solve Iraq's problems,' said Ayad al-Sammarai, an influential Sunni Muslim politician." USA Today (12/7, 4A, Soriano, 2.27M) reports on the political debate in Iraq over the report.

The New York Times (12/7, A25, Wong, Al-Saiedi, 1.16M) says that according to "conservative Shiite legislator" Sami al-Askari, Maliki was pleased "because the report seemed to affirm an argument that Mr. Maliki and other Shiite leaders had been making to President Bush -- give the Iraqi government more control over the security forces, and the war could be won." But the New York Times (12/7, A1, Gordon, 1.16M) also reports that the "experience of American commanders shows the difficulties in rapidly handing over security responsibilities to Iraq," and military experts say the recommendation "underestimates the challenge of building a capable Iraqi security force." Retired Army Chief of Staff Jack Keane, who advised the ISG, "described that goal as entirely impractical. 'Based on where we are now we can't get there,' General Keane said in an interview." USA Today (12/7, 4A, Brook, Kelley, 2.27M) says the recommendations "would put short-term strains on military people and equipment, while helping with the military's long-term challenges."

Even Called-For Troop Drawdown Would Leave "Tens Of Thousands" In Iraq. The CBS Evening News (12/6, story 4, 2:30, Martin, 7.66M) said that "even if most combat brigades can get out of Iraq by early 2008, tens of thousands of American troops would still be in the fight, both as trainers embedded in Iraqi units and as commandos conducting raids against Al Qaeda operatives." The CBS Evening News (12/6, story 8, 2:10, Couric, 7.66M) ran a feature on preparations to train Iraqi forces.

Wolf Pleased By Commission's Results. NBC Nightly News (12/6, story 10, 2:00, Williams, 9.87M) talked briefly with Rep. Frank Wolf, saying "this whole Iraq commission was his idea, and today he was feeling grateful and hopeful. Are we at our best when our best and get together and hammer out a problem like this?" Wolf: "The answer to that is just yes. That is the way it was during World War II. … I feel good today."

Biden Says Proposals "Necessary, But Not Sufficient." In a USA Today (12/7, 13A, 2.27M) op-ed, Sen. Joseph Biden writes that the report "is a first step toward a bipartisan way forward in Iraq. The fundamental changes it proposes are necessary, but not sufficient to achieve the objective most Americans share: to leave Iraq without leaving chaos behind. The report's most valuable contribution is to make clear that staying the course in Iraq is not an option." But "absent a political settlement, refocusing the mission of our remaining troops on training and engaging Iraq's neighbors will not stabilize Iraq."

Study Group Urges Agencies To Order Civilians To Iraq. The Washington Post's (12/7, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "Federal agencies supporting the Iraq war and reconstruction should order their civilian employees to fill key jobs in the combat zone if not enough volunteers step forward," the Iraq Study Group said yesterday. The recommendation "grew out of a sense that civilian agencies are not contributing enough personnel to Iraq, adding to the burdens on the US military. The group offered little detail on the staffing recommendation." The Post notes that it is rare for agencies to "reassign employees based on where they are needed," since "unions discourage forced reassignments and, at many agencies, only senior federal executives are at any real risk of such transfers because they are seen as a mobile part of the government's workforce."

More Commentary. The New York Times (12/7, A38, 1.16M) editorializes, "The much-anticipated report from the bipartisan panel is precisely about political cover. That is a good thing, if only Mr. Bush has the sense to embrace it. Iraq is so far gone that nobody expected the panel to come up with a breakthrough solution. … Its real mission was to avert the worst scenario, in which a stubborn George W. Bush spends the next two years blindly insisting he will accept nothing short of victory, while Iraq keeps spiraling out of control and the Iraqis get no closer to being able to contain the chaos after the Americans leave."

The Washington Post (12/7, A30, 690K) editorializes that the ISG report "outlines a military strategy for Iraq that has already been embraced in large measure by the Iraqi government and U.S. military commanders, if not explicitly by President Bush. It foresees a year-long shift of U.S. forces from fighting insurgents and preventing sectarian war to advising and supporting an Iraqi army that would take responsibility for those missions. … As the study group concedes, this last-ditch strategy to stabilize Iraq might not work. But it is an option worth trying, and one Americans and Iraqis can agree on. … What's missing from the study group report, unfortunately, is any evaluation of what should be done if the new strategy doesn't work."

The Wall Street Journal (12/7, A18, 2.04M) editorializes, "The way to success in Iraq lies in stronger U.S. support for Baghdad's Shiite-led governing coalition, not in some bipartisan strategic muddle ginned up for domestic political purposes. This is not to say that yesterday's Study Group report…serves no useful purpose. In calling for a withdrawal of most U.S. troops by 2008 -- if security conditions allow -- the report rejects any rapid withdrawal or deadline. Likewise, it reinforces the case Mr. Bush has been making about the ugly consequences of failure in Iraq for American interests."

The Los Angeles Times (12/7, 850K) editorializes that the report "distills the emerging conventional wisdom in Washington, laced with a measure of wishful thinking. Yes, persuading Iran and Syria to help stabilize Iraq, contrary to the administration's stance, is a worthy pursuit, though it isn't clear why Syria and Iran would want to do so, at least in the immediate term. And yes, settling the Israeli-Palestinian conflict would indeed reduce tensions throughout the Arab world, though linking that issue to the commission's brief was a stretch that plays into the hands of anti-American extremists in the region."

In a second editorial, the Los Angeles Times (12/7, 850K) says, "Independent commissions have a long and (mostly) honorable history in the United States, and it would be a mistake to dismiss the 79 recommendations of the Iraq Study Group simply because they are familiar. Such commissions often have an influence that lasts beyond their final report." The ultimate success of the ISG "lies less in what the group proposed than in whether its recommendations come to be seen as a turning point in U.S. involvement in Iraq."

The Financial Times (12/7) editorializes that the report "pulls few punches, except perhaps in its almost histrionic overuse of the conditional could to describe events already under way ('neighbouring countries could intervene' in Iraq; 'the global standing of the US could be diminished' and so on)." The report offers "sane suggestions. The question is: will a Bush administration trapped in denial act on them and, even if it does, will it be too late?"

In his Washington Post (12/7, A31, 690K) column, David Ignatius writes that the ISG "achieved the goal of any blue-ribbon commission: It stated the obvious, emphatically. … This report asks the world to help us find our way back home. Even if its proposals don't succeed, Baker-Hamilton can still accomplish its purpose, to 'enable the United States to begin to move its combat forces out of Iraq responsibly.'"

In his Washington Post (12/7, A31, 690K) column, George F. Will writes that the ISG, "like the policy it was created to critique, was overtaken by the unexpectedly rapid crumbling of the U.S. position in Iraq since the ISG was formed in March. … By what the ISG did not recommend -- e.g., many more troops and much more money -- it recognized that the deterioration is beyond much remediation."

In his Los Angeles Times (12/7, 850K) column, Jonah Goldberg writes, "The commissioners are latter-day Laodiceans, whom the Book of Revelation describes as 'neither cold nor hot … [but] lukewarm.' As a result, most of the report hits stratospheric heights of banality. … The commission is making the same core mistake that was made in the Vietnam era: treating a war like a political problem to be haggled, spun and bartered."

In a Wall Street Journal (12/7, A18, 2.04M) op-ed, Eliot Cohen of the Johns Hopkins University School of Advanced International Studies writes that the ISG itself "reflects the vain hope that well-meaning, senior, former public officials can find ideas that have not already occurred to people inside government; that those new ideas can redeem incompetent execution and insufficient resources; that salvation can come from a Washington establishment whose wisdom was exaggerated in its heyday;" and "that a public commission can do the work of oversight that Congress has shirked for five years in the misguided belief that it would thus support an administration struggling to do its best in a difficult situation. This is no way to run a war, and most definitely, no way to win it."

In a Washington Post (12/7, A31, 690K) op-ed, Michael J. Glennon of the Tufts University Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy writes, "As a matter of sound policy, as well as constitutional principle, Congress should participate in weighing recommendations on future military action.

Whatever military option is selected, its success will depend upon broad support from the American people. Congressional involvement will not guarantee that support, but congressional exclusion will almost surely preclude it."

Baker, Hamilton Say Bush Will Take Report Seriously. Iraq Study Group co-chairmen James Baker and Lee Hamilton were interviewed by all three broadcast networks as well as Fox News. On NBC Nightly News (12/6, story 4, 3:15, 9.87M), Brian Williams asked Baker, "When you're with this President, do you, can you, speak truth to power?" Baker: "He wants me to, and I do. I give him very candid advice, frank advice. Occasionally, he will take it. Sometimes he doesn't, sometimes he does. But yes, you can speak truth to this President." Asked where the ISG ranks "on all the service you've provided to your country," Baker said, "At the very top of the difficult issues. And there were a lot of difficult issues that I confronted during those 12 or 13 years but this is at the very top." On ABC World News (12/6, story 7, 3:10, Gibson, 8.78M), Baker said, "Presidents have been known to change their minds. It may be -- he's been known to change his. And it may be that you will see some mind changing. But you may not. There's no -- this is nothing more than a report. It is a suggestion. But it is the only bipartisan way forward."

On the CBS Evening News (12/6, story 6, 3:15, 7.66M), Katie Couric asked Hamilton if it is possible "that even if all 79 recommendations are implemented, this thing is lost, that we could be at the point of no return?" Hamilton: "Well, it's certainly possible. I really don't think it's likely. But you cannot ignore the possibility that the whole thing could come apart." As for President Bush's reaction, Hamilton said, "I was pleasantly surprised with his openness as he talked to us." Continuing on that theme on Fox News (12/6, Hume), Hamilton said, "I was personally very encouraged. I think the other members of the group were, as well. He said, first of all, he is going to take it very seriously. He said he was going to read it carefully. He said that it presented an opportunity to bring the country together. I think he sees the potential of it."

ISG's Main Goal Said To Be To Get Bush To "Change His Mind." The Los Angeles Times (12/7, McManus, 850K) observes that while "some bipartisan commissions try to change public opinion on contentious national issues" and others "try to help Congress find compromise solutions to thorny problems," the ISG "had a different -- and unusual -- goal: persuading President Bush to change his mind about staying the course in Iraq. 'This is highly unusual,' an adviser to the group said today, after the panel released its final report. 'It's one thing for people inside the administration to tell the president what to do. But for an outside group to say, "Here, son, let us give you a road map for your foreign policy?" That's remarkable.'"

ISG Managed To Work With Rare Bipartisanship. The Washington Post (12/7, A26, Baker, Wright, Linzer, 690K) takes a look at how the ISG went about its work, saying its process was "marked by that rarest of qualities in a polarized era: bipartisanship. At a time when Washington prefers confrontation to compromise, five Republicans and five Democrats sat down to tackle the country's most urgent crisis and came up with a document they all could sign. It proved to be a nine-month study of how to bridge not only Iraq's deep divide but also America's." The Los Angeles Times (12/7, Miller, 850K) says Baker "was a remarkably familiar presence in a remarkably familiar role -- talking diplomacy in his Texas twang, seeking solutions for a crisis in Iraq, and trying to rescue a president named Bush." The Washington Post (12/7, C1, Montgomery, 690K) also has a feature on the actual distribution of the report around Washington.

ISG Members Discuss Their Efforts And Hopes. Ex-Sen. Charles Robb, an Iraq Study Group member, said of President Bush on MSNBC's Hardball (12/6, Barnicle), "I think that the reception that we got this morning was very positive. Obviously, he's going to consult with others, he's going to get input from other groups. But I think all of us were pleasantly surprised that he was as supportive of the concept and of the unity of the report. And each of us had an opportunity to discuss elements of the report with him, and he seemed to fully understand the gravity of the events and/or actions that we were talking about. But only time will tell in terms of what decisions he ultimately makes."

Ex-Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, an Iraq Study Group member, said on MSNBC's Hardball (12/6, Barnicle), "I thought it was impressive that this group of 10 people, give Democrats and five Republicans, with a very serious, complicated issue, could come up with 79-some unanimous recommendations. I thought it was a remarkable performance really. And what we need to go forward now in this very tough situation is a broad consensus in our country. The American people must begin to feel like this is a way we should approach it and this is something that we should support. I hope that the Congress will feel the same way, or at least most of them."

Ex-Secretary of State Lawrence Eagleburger, an Iraq Study Group member, said on CNN's The Situation Room (12/6, Blitzer), "Our job now is to try to figure out how we get from where we are now, which is a mess, and everybody agrees with that, to where we should be...and can we do it in a bipartisan fashion?"

Iraq Study Group member Leon Panetta said on CNN's The Situation Room (12/6, Blitzer), "The goal here is to try to provide some degree of stability in Iraq so they can govern themselves, they can defend themselves and they can operate as an independent government. That's really what we're seeking."

Iraq Study Group member Vernon Jordan said on CNN's The Situation Room (12/6, Blitzer), "I have been serving on presidential commissions since 1965. … This has been the toughest. This has been the most difficult. But, from a standpoint of civility, it's been first-class, especially in this town, where hostility and polarization have taken the front seat, and civility a backseat. This process put civility in the front seat. And, hopefully, it will be instructive to the Congress and to the Administration and to the American people."

Bush, Blair To Discuss Iraq. The AP (12/7, Riechmann) reports, "President Bush faces urgent pressure to find a fresh strategy in Iraq as a new defense secretary heads to the Pentagon and a scathing bipartisan commission report says his war policies have failed and that 'time is running out.'" AFP (12/7) quotes Bush national security spokesman Gordon Johndroe saying the President and Blair "have a number of issues to discuss, including Iraq, the broader war on terror, the NATO commitment to Afghanistan, Sudan, as well as free and fair trade." AFP adds "US and British officials have steadfastly denied that Blair's visit was timed to coincide with the release of the grim Iraq report."

Ten US Troops Died In Iraq Wednesday. The Washington Post (12/7, A18, Trejos, 690K) reports 10 US troops "died in Iraq on Wednesday, the U.S. military reported, matching the highest number of U.S. service members killed on a single day in the past year. It was also a deadly day for Iraqi civilians, with at least 40 killed in car bombings and mortar attacks across the capital." The US troops died in four incidents, according to a military spokesman who "declined to provide details about how or where they were killed because family members were still being notified."

US, Iraq "Quietly Talking" With Insurgent Leaders. The Christian Science Monitor (12/7, Enders, 59K) reports that "both Baghdad and Washington" are "quietly talking with Iraq's insurgent leaders in an effort to end the unrelenting violence. US officials have not commented on reports of these recent meetings with resistance-group representatives. But Arab journalists, politicians, and officials in Jordan say they've occurred." The meetings "have come amid pressure from two key Shiite politicians on Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to alter course. The opposition has also stepped up efforts to outflank his increasingly unpopular rule. And in the US, the White House is sifting recommendations from the Iraq Study Group and other reviews as discontent grows over the administration's strategy."

Suicide Bomber Strikes Outside US Security Firm In Kandahar. The New York Times (12/7, A25, Gall, 1.16M) reports a suicide bomber "blew himself up on Wednesday outside the offices of an American security firm in the southern city of Kandahar, killing two American security officers and nine Afghan members of the staff."

DOJ:

Federal Inmate Charged With Mailing Threat Letters To Judge, USAs. The Springfield (MO) News-Leader (12/5) reported, "An Oregon man was indicted by a federal grand jury for mailing threatening letters to a federal judge and former U.S. attorney, the current U.S. attorney for the Western District of Missouri announced Monday. Bruce Dewayne Jensen, 29 — serving a sentence in the U.S. Medical Center for Federal Prisoners — was charged in a three-count indictment returned Wednesday." The News-Leader notes that the case "was investigated by the FBI and the Medical Center for Federal Prisoners."

Dayton Signals Support For Paulose As Minnesota US Attorney. The AP (12/7) reports, "Minnesota's acting U.S. attorney picked up key support Wednesday for permanent confirmation, but it wasn't immediately clear whether Rachel Paulose could expect a vote before Congress adjourns this year." The AP continues, "Paulose met Wednesday with Sen. Mark Dayton, who hadn't taken a position on her nomination because he said she hadn't sought a meeting. Afterward, he said she had his support." The AP adds, "Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., had already backed Paulose, calling her 'an extremely competent and capable professional.' But the Senate Judiciary Committee generally doesn't vote on a nominee without the support of both of a nominee's home-state senators. … Paulose, 33, has been acting U.S. attorney for nine months, and President Bush nominated her to the permanent post four months ago. If the Senate fails to take up her nomination before adjourning next week, Bush can resubmit her next year."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Fannie Mae Announces Financial Restatement. The Wall Street Journal (12/7, A4, Hagerty, 2.04M) reports, "Fannie Mae took another step toward resolving its accounting fiasco by announcing a restatement of results that reduced retained earnings as of June 30, 2004, by $6.3 billion." But "the long-awaited restatement by the government-sponsored mortgage company increased stockholders' equity by $4.1 billion as of the same date. That is because of big increases in the value of mortgage securities held by Fannie that were reclassified as being available for sale as part of correcting past accounting errors. Those increases more than offset the reduction in retained earnings." The restatement "comes two years after regulators found that Fannie had violated more than a dozen accounting rules, partly in an effort to make earnings growth appear smoother and to trigger maximum bonuses for executives."

The New York Times (12/7, Dash, 1.16M) reports, "Federal regulators, meanwhile, said they planned to file a lawsuit before the end of the year in an effort to recover millions of dollars from Fannie Mae's former top two executives, whose bonuses were tied to the manipulated earnings. Franklin D. Raines, the former chairman and chief executive, and J. Timothy Howard, who had been chief financial officer, were ousted from the company in December 2004, and investigators have laid much of the blame on their shoulders. … A lawyer for Mr. Raines declined to comment, and a lawyer representing Mr. Howard did not return phone calls yesterday. A Fannie Mae spokesman also declined to comment." The Washington Post (12/7, D1, Hilzenrath, 690K) also reports the story.

The AP (12/7, Gordon) reports, "Over the last two years, Fannie Mae has disclosed a passel of new accounting problems that had been uncovered in several areas, including its core business of issuing securities backed by the billions of dollars of home mortgages annually that it buys from lenders and bundles together for resale to investors worldwide. Other problems were revealed in loans, houses acquired through foreclosures, interest on delinquent home loans and reverse mortgages. … Fannie Mae escaped criminal prosecution over the accounting failure. The Justice Department had pursued a criminal investigation, but federal prosecutors said in August that they had shut down their probe without bringing any action. The SEC still could bring civil actions against individual executives, including people no longer at Fannie Mae, with the burden of proof less stringent than in criminal prosecutions."

Home Depot Probe Finds Backdated Options Grants. The Wall Street Journal (12/7, A3, Zimmerman) reports, "Home Depot Inc. said an internal investigation found that the company routinely backdated stock options for 20 years, from 1981 to 2000, and as a result it understated compensation expense by $200 million." The Journal continues, "With fiscal 2006 sales of $81.5 billion, the home-improvement retailer is one of the largest companies to admit to backdating stock options. The practice stopped in the fall of 2000 at the same time that current Chief Executive Bob Nardelli took the helm at the retailer. During the previous two decades, the company was run by founders Bernie Marcus and Arthur Blank, but neither founder received stock options. The company wouldn't say who did receive the awards and who made the decision to backdate them." The Journal adds, "Home Depot's admission that executives backdated options beginning more than 25 years ago is the earliest finding to date, and means the practice began far earlier than the technology boom when stock options became a popular compensation tool. In Home Depot's case, the practice goes back to its inception as a public company."

USA Today (12/7, 1B, Farrell) reports, "Home Depot disclosed in September that the Securities and Exchange Commission has begun an informal inquiry into the company's stock option practices and the U.S. Attorney's Office in New York has asked for information." USA adds, "For Home Depot's annual option grants and some quarterly grants from 1981 through November 2000, the 'stated grant date was routinely earlier than the actual date on which the grants were approved by a committee of the board of directors,' the company's statement said. 'In almost every instance, the stock price on the apparent approval date was higher than the price on the stated grant date.' … The company blamed 'management personnel, who have since left the company,' for the practice."

The Financial Times (12/7, Ward) reports, "The investigation, by a sub-committee of Home Depot's board, concluded that no intentional backdating had taken place since Bob Nardelli, the current chief executive, took charge in 2000, and cleared all current management and directors of wrongdoing." The Times adds, "Home Depot launched the inquiry in August after becoming the largest US company to be ensnared in the scandal over backdating of stock options to increase the potential value of compensation packages. … More than 160 companies have acknowledged that they are either facing regulatory inquiries or carrying out internal investigations of the way they handed out stock options. Home Depot said the unrecorded expenses would not have a material impact on its financial statements."

Pediatrix Probe Finds Backdated Options. Bloomberg (12/7, Pettypiece) reports, "Pediatrix Medical Group Inc. said a preliminary review found evidence that stock options were backdated and a board member has resigned." Bloomberg continues, "The company, the largest U.S. provider of care for premature babies, may have to record additional compensation expenses of $28 million for the period from 1995 through 2006, according to a statement distributed today by Business Wire." Bloomberg adds, "Pediatrix is among at least 186 companies that have disclosed internal or federal investigations into how they grant stock options to executives. At least 79 companies have announced they must restate previously reported financial results, and more than 60 executives and directors at companies under investigation have left their jobs."

GCs Fall Victim To Options Probes. Corporate Counsel (12/7, Osborne) reports, "Nothing in memory has ever caused as many GCs to lose their jobs as quickly as stock options backdating. In little more than a year, 12 general counsel have stepped down amid options problems at their companies. These legal chiefs constitute about a quarter of the 40-plus executives who have lost their jobs in the steadily expanding options controversy. Indeed, backdating has forced out as many GCs as CEOs." Corporate Counsel continues, "By all indications, the casualty list will only grow. 'I expect that we will see more general counsel lose their jobs,' says Erik Lie, the University of Iowa business professor whose research into backdating kindled the current firestorm." Corporate Counsel adds, "Some of these GCs won't deserve their fate, Lie adds: 'My sense is that a lot of innocent people might be implicated in this, including, possibly, general counsel.' Indeed, a review of government documents and official company statements about options-related investigations shows that in some cases, the GC appears to have been little more than a fall guy. In other instances, however, company and government reports have directly faulted in-house lawyers for failing to intervene when grant dates on options were deliberately altered to enrich their recipients." Corporate Counsel notes, "So far the U.S. Department of Justice and the Securities and Exchange Commission are scrutinizing option grants at more than 130 companies. But Lie thinks that another 70 may have engaged in backdating, based on his statistical analysis of 8,000 businesses that issued options between 1996 and 2005."

Ouster Of Insurance Giant's CEO After Options Probe Examined. The Wall Street Journal (12/7, A1, Bandler, Forelle) reports, "Over the past 15 years, the board of UnitedHealth Group Inc. couldn't have been more supportive of its chairman and chief executive, William McGuire. Directors lavished close to $2 billion in compensation on him, counting stock options, as he built UnitedHealth into one of the country's largest health insurers. … Last week, Dr. McGuire left his job, following a vote by the same board to dump him. It acted unanimously in October after concluding that his explanations for a pattern of unusually well-timed stock-option grants didn't add up. Dr. McGuire thus became one of the biggest casualties in the options backdating scandal, which so far has swept away more than 60 corporate officials, including 16 CEOs." The Journal continues, "How did one of America's most pliant boards turn on its star chief executive? Dr. McGuire's support slowly leached away over the course of a six-month internal investigation. Documentation that could support his defense was sparse. A board-ordered statistical analysis undercut his arguments. And his closest board ally was sidelined by a conflict of interest that unsettled other directors. In the end, directors felt pressure after their lawyer told them federal regulators appeared likely to charge the UnitedHealth chief. … Now, Dr. McGuire and the board are girding for tense negotiations over how much of his giant cache of stock options, many still unexercised, he'll be able to take with him. He has already agreed to surrender about $200 million of those options' value, and people close to the situation say the company hopes to get back at the very least $250 million more. He is still likely to end up with more than $1 billion, although last week a federal judge hearing a shareholder lawsuit temporarily barred him from exercising any options or receiving any retirement pay."

Rep. Frank May Try To Roll Back DOJ Guidelines On Privilege Waivers. The Washington Post (12/7, D3, Johnson) reports, "Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.) yesterday held out an olive branch to business interests, announcing that he would be open to cooperating on trade, immigration and outsourcing if industry gave ground on union drives, health-care reforms and minimum-wage proposals." The Post continues, "At a briefing to introduce his legislative agenda, Frank, the incoming chairman of the House Financial Services Committee, addressed several hot-button issues, including a mounting push by business interests to slash what they consider burdensome regulations. … The lawmaker said he had met with leaders of the Securities and Exchange Commission and an accounting industry oversight board to urge them to give businesses some relief from a costly audit rule prescribed by the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley law. Over the next two weeks, the agencies are set to present proposed changes to the rule, which requires that auditors review corporate financial controls to prevent fraud and mistakes." The Post adds, "He reserved judgment on proposals that would make it more difficult for consumers to sue businesses, auditors and corporate board members, saying that the issue fell under the jurisdiction of another congressional panel. … But Frank said he agreed with several other recommendations, including indicting companies only as a last resort and rolling back controversial Justice Department guidelines that urge companies to waive their attorney-client privilege." The Post notes, "Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty has been considering changes to a memo that says when prosecutors should bring criminal charges against businesses, but he has not released any revisions. In the meantime, Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) is set to introduce legislation to supersede those guidelines as early as today."

Frank Says Economic Divide Country's "No. 1 Problem." The AP (12/7, Aversa) reports, "Incoming House Financial Services Committee Chairman Barney Frank said Wednesday he plans to delve deeper into why some Americans are not reaping the benefits of a mostly healthy economy, which he called the 'No. 1 problem' facing the country." Frank, "in a wide-ranging discussion with reporters, highlighted some of his priorities once he takes over the committee, when the new Democratic-controlled Congress convenes in early January. While the economy's growth, as measured by gross domestic product, has been expanding at a decent pace, the inflation-adjusted wages of workers have lagged. … There is an 'increasing disconnect between growth in the gross domestic product and the well-being of the average citizen,' Frank said."

HP Reportedly Ready To Settle California Civil Complaint Over Pretexting. CNET News (12/7, Fried) reports, "The California attorney general's office is expected to announce Thursday that it has settled civil complaints with Hewlett-Packard over the company's spying tactics, CNET News.com has learned." CNET continues, "The civil complaints are separate from the criminal charges already brought forward by the attorney general's office. Five people, including former HP Chairman Patricia Dunn, are facing felony charges in connection with HP's campaign to determine the source of unauthorized media leaks. All five have pleaded not guilty." CNET adds, "A lawyer for the attorney general's office confirmed that an announcement is scheduled for Thursday, but would not confirm or deny the civil settlement. CNET News.com reported last week that the state's top prosecutor was considering a civil complaint over HP's tactics. … As part of its effort to uncover the source of news stories, HP investigators employed the practice of 'pretexting,' or using false pretenses, to obtain the phone records of more than a dozen people, including board members, journalists and HP employees. The company also employed physical surveillance and sent a bogus tip with an electronic tracer to a CNET News.com reporter. .. After the company's tactics came to light, Congress held hearings, and the FBI and Justice Department also launched probes. HP also faces a formal SEC inquiry into the matter."

New York Judge Seeks Settlement In BOA-Parmalat Case. The Financial Times (12/7, Michaels) reports, "A judge in New York has ordered Bank of America and the former auditors to Parmalat to set out in writing their stances on a settlement in the multibillion dollar damages case surrounding the collapse of the Italian dairy company." The Times continues, "Judge Lewis Kaplan has also told Parmalat itself to submit what it would accept to settle the case, telling all groups involved to consider a global settlement and to send letters relating to a deal to Henry Pitman, another judge." The Times adds, "Judge Pitman is to review the letters and start to assess the possibility of a global settlement in the week of December 18, according to a transcript of a hearing presided over by Judge Kaplan at the end of November and obtained by the Financial Times. … Bank of America and auditors Grant Thornton and Deloitte are being targeted for damages as it is alleged they helped prolong fraud at the company, which collapsed at the end of 2003. None has admitted wrongdoing."

Korean Probe Of Lone Star Yields No Charges Against Company. The Wall Street Journal (12/7, B10, Ramstad, Yoon) reports from Seoul, South Korea, "Prosecutors here said they would charge former government officials and bankers for fraud in the 2003 sale of a controlling stake in Korea Exchange Bank to Lone Star Funds. But they brought no charges against the Dallas-based private-equity firm that has been trying to sell its stake in the bank since March." The Journal continues, "The prosecutors said in a news conference Thursday morning in Seoul that KEB managers and government officials worked with Lone Star to make the nation's fifth-largest bank look financially troubled in order to get regulatory approval for the 2003 deal. They called the transaction -- in which Lone Star paid $1.2 billion for 51% of the bank – 'inappropriate' but not illegal and said they continue to investigate." The Journal adds, "The prosecutors said they would indict 15 people in the matter, but they identified only two: Byeon Yang Ho, a former official at the Ministry of Finance and Economy, and Lee Kang Won, former chief executive officer of KEB. … Their probe began in late March, just a week after another Korean bank, Kookmin Bank, agreed to buy Lone Star's and other shares in KEB amounting to a 65% stake for $6.6 billion. Lone Star's profit in the deal would have amounted to about $4.5 billion. … The size of that deal and Lone Star's resulting profit shocked politicians and the Korean public. Many were upset when foreign investors over the past two years made big money by selling the control of Korean banks they had purchased in the wake of the country's economic collapse in the late 1990s."

WSJ Lauds Judge's Ruling In Lerach's Enron Suit. The Wall Street Journal (12/7) editorializes, "One reason the tort bar files so many frivolous lawsuits is that there have been very few penalties for its legal abuses. So congratulations are due to a Texas judge who last week ordered class-action kingpin Bill Lerach to pay up for his latest wretched excess." The Journal continues, "Federal Judge Melinda Harmon's good deed came at the end of a high-profile suit against Alliance Capital. She dismissed the case in summary fashion and invoked a little-used legal rule that requires the Lerach firm to pay Alliance's legal fees. While the plaintiffs might have had cause for filing the suit, the judge said, by the end of discovery it was clear 'the continuance of the claim against Alliance was at that point without merit' and so the Lerach firm must pay for dragging Alliance past that point. … We'd call that justice, with the caveat that Judge Harmon is probably too generous in saying Mr. Lerach had a reason to sue in the first place. … The suit was a Lerach Special, a novel attempt to pry money from a company only tangentially involved with the Enron debacle. An Alliance executive, Frank Savage, had served on Enron's board from 1999 to 2001. During his Enron tenure, he'd signed a registration statement for a bond issue that included false financial statements. Mr. Lerach's elastic legal theory was that Alliance had put Mr. Savage on the Enron board, and thus the company was liable for his actions." The Journal notes, "To be sure, Mr. Lerach's client was the University of California Board of Regents and no babe in the tort woods. Like many public pension representatives, the California regents have become willing fronts for the tort bar. But Judge Harmon is right that the real culprit here is Mr. Lerach, whose former firm, Milberg Weiss, was indicted this year for paying kickbacks to plaintiffs in its suits. Let's hope more judges take their duty to protect the integrity of the courts more seriously and make the loser of a frivolous lawsuit pay."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Mueller Tells Senate Committee Public Corruption Is FBI's Top Criminal Priority. The AP (12/7, Jordan) reports, "More than 1,000 government employees, including hundreds of police officers, have been convicted over the last two years in FBI corruption cases against crooked public officials, Director Robert Mueller said Wednesday." The AP continues, "In prepared testimony to the Senate panel that oversees the bureau, Mueller called public corruption cases the FBI's 'top criminal investigative priority.' … Public corruption 'erodes public confidence and undermines the strength of our democracy,' Mueller said in his testimony. 'Unchecked, it threatens our government and our way of life.' … His remarks also outlined strides the FBI has taken to protect the nation against terror attacks since 2001." The AP adds, "Over the last year, the Justice Department has targeted about a dozen high-profile House and Senate lawmakers in corruption cases – including three Republicans in the month before the Nov. 7 election that shifted power in Congress to Democrats. … Overall, 177 federal officials have been convicted in corruption cases over the last two years, Mueller said. During the same time, the FBI investigated cases against 158 state officials, 360 local officials and more than 365 police officers. It was not immediately clear how many police officers represented local, state or federal law enforcement agencies. … Last year alone, the FBI saw a 25 percent rise in its public corruption investigations, resulting in 890 indictments and 759 convictions, Mueller said. There are 2,118 cases still pending, he said." USA Today (12/7, 7A, 2.27M) briefly reports on Mueller's testimony, under the headline "FBI Corruption Probes Snare Officials, Officers."

The Washington Post (12/7, A9, Eggen) reports, "Congress isn't the only place where public corruption is on the rise. … More than 1,000 federal, state and local government employees across the country have been convicted in government corruption cases over the past two years, including hundreds of crooked police officers and others who have dipped into the taxpayers' till, FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III said yesterday." The Post continues, "The numbers underscore the extent to which public corruption has become a primary, if little-noticed, focus of FBI criminal investigators, taking its place alongside preventing terrorism as one the bureau's fundamental missions." The Post adds, "All told, public-corruption investigations have surged by 30 percent in the past four years, to more than 2,000, officials said. The FBI now dedicates more than 600 agents and 15 percent of its criminal investigative resources to government graft. … The highest-profile cases have been in Congress, including the probe into the web of corruption surrounding former lobbyist Jack Abramoff that led to guilty pleas from former congressman Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio) and some Capitol Hill aides, and a separate investigation that led to a guilty plea from former congressman Randy 'Duke' Cunningham (R-Calif.). The FBI also prompted a showdown with House leaders earlier this year after it searched the Capitol Hill office of Rep. William J. Jefferson (D-La.) in connection with a probe of financial deals he was involved in. … But most of the FBI's corruption inquiries focus on state legislatures, city halls and police stations, Mueller said. The list of convictions over the past two years includes 158 state officials, 360 local officials and 365 police officers, Mueller said. One hundred seventy-seven of the convictions involved federal officials." The Post notes, "Law-enforcement experts said it is impossible to say whether the increase in corruption cases reflects a rise in criminality among public officials or the greater emphasis at the FBI on such prosecutions. … The number of FBI agents assigned to corruption cases has ballooned from 451 in 2001 to 618 in 2006, officials said, and Mueller has made corruption the top priority for the bureau's criminal investigative division."

Local Television. WMBC- TV (12/6, 5:00 p.m.) New York, broadcasted, "The FBI's top man tells a Senate panel that public corruption is the Bureau's top criminal investigative priority. Robert Mueller tells the Senate Oversight Committee more than 1,000 crooked government employees have been convicted in the past two years. Among those were 360 police officers. The bureau saw a 25% jump in public corruption investigations last year."

WSPA- TV (12/6, 5:00 p.m.) in Greenville, Spartanburg, Asheville, broadcasts, "Fighting public corruption is the top priority of the FBI according to the bureau chief Robert Mueller. Today he told a Senate panel the fight against terror gets the most attention. But the FBI has busted more than 1000 government employees in the past two years in corruption cases."

WBBH- TV (12/6, 4:00 p.m.) Ft. Myers, Naples, broadcasts, "Fighting terrorism is important, but public corruption is the FBI's top investigative priority. FBI director, Robert Mueller told a Senate panel more than 1,000 crooked government employees have been convicted over the past two years. That includes more than 360 police officers. And a dozen high profile House and Senate members."

WZVN- TV (12/6, 11:00 p.m.) Ft. Myers, Naples, broadcasts, "Conviction of 1,000 crooked government employees in the past two years. FBI director Robert Mueller explains they have seen a 25 percent hike last year in public corruption investigations. The Justice Department targeted dozen high-profile House and Senate members necessary corruption cases just in the past year alone." WGME- TV (12/6, 5:30 p.m.) in Portland, Auburn also broadcasted this story.

FBI Investigating Leak Of Weldon Probe. Bloomberg (12/7, Schmidt) reports, "The Federal Bureau of Investigation is conducting a leak investigation into the disclosure several weeks before the congressional elections that the FBI is probing U.S. Representative Curt Weldon, the agency's director said." Bloomberg continues, "FBI chief Robert Mueller told the Senate Judiciary Committee today that the agency is pursuing 'a series' of leak probes of its agents, including one involved in the Weldon matter. The Pennsylvania Republican, who lost his seat on Nov. 7, was involved in a tight race when the news of the investigation broke. … 'I was exceptionally disappointed, and that is being charitable in terms of my response,' Mueller said about the leak. 'It is unfair in advance of an election, but, as importantly to us, it adversely affected the investigation.'" Bloomberg adds, "The FBI probe of alleged influence peddling was first reported Oct. 13 by McClatchy Newspapers, which cited an anonymous law enforcement agent. Three days later, agents raided the home of Weldon's daughter and five other targets. … The FBI is probing whether Weldon used his political influence to steer business to help his daughter Karen win consulting deals, a person familiar with the matter has said. … Mueller said that at least one of the bureau's leak probes is being handled as a criminal investigation. He told the senators that he believes investigators are having 'some success' in discovering who the leakers are but declined to give any details."

In a third widely-distributed story, the AP (12/7, Jordan) also reports, "Mueller described himself as 'exceptionally disappointed, and that is being charitable, in terms of my response upon hearing about the leak.' … Senators scolded Mueller about the leaks," with Specter saying "the disclosures were 'just disastrous' for suspects who have not been charged, much less proven guilty." The AP adds, "Disclosing information a grand jury is considering is a serious crime, and such leaks often aim "to sway public opinion in favor of the government," said Martin Pinales, president of the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers. … On the other hand, leaks may sometimes be the price of having an open government in a democracy, said Ronald Collins, a scholar at the First Amendment Center."

Mueller Apologizes For Agent's Comments. WRC-TV (12/6, 5:00 p.m.) in Washington DC, broadcasts, "FBI Director Robert Mueller apologized for an agent's comments. The woman was a woman at the University Of Vermont and killed in October after a chance meeting with alleged killer Brian Rooney. Lawyers tried to get the murder charges dismissed. After Agent Fuller wrote or what was described as an inflammatory column about the case, Patrick Leahy chastised the agents and Muller responded."

US Charges Son Of Former Liberian President With Torture. The Miami Herald (12/7, Weaver) reports, "A federal grand jury in Miami today indicted the son of former Liberian President Charles Taylor on torture charges in what is believed to be the first criminal case of its kind in the country." The Herald continues, "Charles McArthur Emmanuel, 29, accused of committing atrocities in Liberia as the former head of a paramilitary unit in his father's government, already is in custody in the Federal Detention Center in Miami. He faces sentencing Thursday on a separate passport-fraud conviction. … Emmanuel, a U.S. citizen born in Boston who is known as 'Chuckie' Taylor, admitted that he falsified his application for a passport to enter the United States from Trinidad on March 30. He was arrested by U.S. Customs and Border Protection agents upon his arrival at Miami International Airport." The Herald adds, "His father, who was arrested the day before in Africa, faces a U.N.-backed war crimes trial for alleged atrocities during Sierre Leone's civil war. The elder Taylor also has been linked to killings, kidnappings, torture and other violence in Liberia, where his son headed the 'Demon Forces,' the security unit blamed for many of the alleged atrocities."

The Washington Post (12/7, A14, Smith) reports, "The indictment involves a rare use of a U.S. human rights law against a foreign national or a U.S. citizen over an act committed outside U.S. territory. Taylor's son allegedly committed the torture in the Liberian capital of Monrovia in July 2002, while he headed an 'antiterrorist unit' charged with protecting Taylor." The Post continues, "The son…has been in a Florida jail for the past nine months on charges of trying to enter the United States on a false passport. In a court pleading in that case, his attorney said that Belfast, 29, has 'consistently denied any criminal acts while in Africa.'" The Post adds, "Human Rights Watch, an advocacy group, had been lobbying the Bush administration to invoke the statute against Taylor since his arrest at the Miami airport after a flight from Trinidad. Amnesty International, which said in 2002 that at least 150 human rights abusers were living in the United States and called the country a 'haven for torturers,' had separately been pressing the Justice Department to invoke the 1994 criminal statute. … The charges are 'important for Liberia, but also important because it opens a precedent,' said Elise Keppler, a lawyer in Human Rights Watch's international justice program. .. .Until now, however, the government had preferred to seek extradition rather than criminal indictments. 'These cases are hard cases,' Julie L. Myers, head of the Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) agency, said at a news conference yesterday. 'In this case alone, we had agents from . . . three different agencies flying all over the world to get evidence.' … Myers called the indictment a milestone. She said it will send 'a clear message that the United States will not be a safe haven for human rights violators.'"

The Washington Times (12/7, Seper) reports, "Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher said the indictment, handed up in U.S. District Court in Miami, accuses Roy Belfast Jr., 29, who also is known as Charles Taylor Jr., Charles Taylor II and Charles McArthur Emmanuel, with one count of torture, one count of conspiracy to torture, and one count of using a firearm during the commission of a violent crime. … Mrs. Fisher said the indictment charges Belfast, who was born in the United States, with participating in the July 2002 torture in Monrovia, Liberia, while he was serving as chief of a violent paramilitary unit during his father's regime." The Times adds, "According to the indictment, the victim -- who was not identified -- was abducted from his home and transported to various locations, ultimately arriving at the residence of Mr. Taylor, who was then president of Liberia. It said Belfast observed questioning of the victim at this location before he was transported to the residence of a co-conspirator for continued interrogation. … While at the residence, the indictment said, Belfast and others tortured the victim, including burning his flesh with a hot iron, burning various parts of his body with scalding water, repeatedly electrically shocking the victim's genitalia and other body parts, and rubbing salt into the victim's wounds. … Belfast is in federal custody in connection with a criminal charge of passport fraud, to which he pleaded guilty on Sept. 15. He admitted lying on his passport application by listing his father as 'Steven Daniel Smith' rather than Charles Taylor or his stepfather, Roy Belfast. His sentencing is scheduled for today."

The New York Times (12/7, Johnston) reports, "The three-count indictment said the victim, who is not named, was a political opponent of the Taylor government. The victim was taken from his home to several locations, including the president's residence, and later to the home of a co-conspirator in the Liberian security service. … There the man was repeatedly burned with a hot iron and scalding water, the indictment said. He was given electric shocks and salt was rubbed into his wounds. The interrogation was carried out at gunpoint, the indictment said. … The United States attorney in Miami, R. Alexander Acosta, said these acts violated federal law. 'Such conduct is criminal and constitutes torture, and must be prosecuted,' he said."

The AP (12/7, Anderson) reports, "Because Emmanuel, 29, was born in the United States, prosecutors charged him under a 1994 law making it a crime for a U.S. citizen to commit torture or war crimes abroad. Emmanuel is already in custody in Miami awaiting sentencing for falsifying his father's name to get a passport he used to enter the U.S. from Trinidad in March." The AP notes, "Alice Fisher, assistant U.S. attorney general for the Justice Department's criminal division, said the indictment was the first time charges under the torture laws had been brought. Emmanuel faces a potential life prison sentence. … Emmanuel's father, meanwhile, faces trial next spring in The Hague, Netherlands, on charges of war crimes and crimes against humanity for allegedly overseeing the murder, rape and mutilation of thousands of people during Sierra Leone's bloody 10-year civil war, many hacked to death with machetes. Taylor has pleaded not guilty."

AFP (12/7) reports, "Taylor on Wednesday was charged with one count of torture, one count of conspiracy to torture and one count of using a firearm during the commission of a violent crime, the Justice Department said in a statement. … Specifically, he is charged with participating in the torture of a person in July 2002 who had been abducted from his home and taken to the residence of a member of the Liberian Special Security Service. … 'The allegations in this case include acts of torture, such as burning flesh with a hot iron, burning flesh with scalding water, and applying electric shocks,' US Attorney Acosta said in the statement."

Tennessee County Official Sentenced To Two Years In Prison For Bribery. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (12/7) reports former Shelby County Commissioner Michael Hooks Sr. "was sentenced Wednesday to slightly more than two years in prison for bribery." He "is one of 11 people, including five current or former state lawmakers, charged in an undercover FBI investigation code-named Tennessee Waltz. Judge J. Daniel Breen noted Hooks' guilty plea and statements of remorse in sentencing him to 26 months, less than the federal guidelines." The AP notes, "Hooks grew up in the home of his uncle, Benjamin Hooks, 81, the former national director of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. The elder Hooks said he had advised his nephew to admit his wrongdoing." The Memphis Commercial Appeal (12/7, Buser, 163K) notes, "Breen and federal prosecutors were clearly impressed by Hooks' admission of guilt and his refrain from criticizing the FBI's Tennessee Waltz investigation that recorded his downfall. 'He has accepted responsibility about as sincerely and publicly as he can,' Asst. U.S. Atty. Tim DiScenza told the judge. By comparison, former state senator Roscoe Dixon's defense in his bribery trial included allegations of entrapment and racism."

Tennessee Professor Suggests Probe Racially, Politically Motivated. WMC-TV Memphis (12/6, Hartman) reported on its Web site from a broadcast story, "A cloud of public corruption is looming over Shelby County; troubled elected officials bear a common thread which is impossible to ignore." Rhodes College Prof. Charles McKinney "says citizens must be able to trust their elected officials as well as the government agencies monitoring them. Specifically, McKinney says, the FBI. McKinney adds, 'What does it mean that the vast majority are Democratic or, perhaps more importantly, are African-American. If somebody is targeting Democrats, the vast majority of them, that's going to mean one of two things: one, they're targeting Democrats, and two, they're targeting African-American Democrats. If that is, in fact, the case,' says McKinney. McKinney says that this case is another unfortunate example of the peeling and stripping away of public trust."

Former US Army Contractor Pleads Guilty To Taking Bribes. The AP (12/7) reports, "A former director of contracting for the Army pleaded guilty in federal court to accepting more than $350,000 in cash, as well as airline tickets and hotel rooms, as bribes in exchange for awarding contracts at an Army recreational facility in Germany, prosecutors said Wednesday." Steven Potoski of Shriesheim, Germany, "a former civilian Army employee, pleaded guilty to one count of bribery and three counts of filing false tax returns, Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher for the Criminal Division said in a statement released from Washington." The AP notes, "In all, Potoski accepted over $350,000 in bribes from 15 contractors or subcontractors, two American contractors, 12 German contractors, and one British contractor, Fisher said. Bribes also came in the form of home renovations, automobile maintenance, airline tickets, hotel rooms and furniture, among other things."

Pennsylvania State Senator Seeks Removal Of Corruption Trial Judge. The Philadelphia Inquirer (12/7, Shiffman, 385K) reports, "State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo says the federal judge supervising a grand jury investigation of him should step aside, citing a long history of 'political animosity' between the judge and senator. U.S. District Judge Legrome D. Davis has declined to recuse himself, saying he bears no animosity to Fumo, who strongly opposed the judge's nominations to the Philadelphia Court of Common Pleas and the federal bench. In a sealed order issued in July, Davis called Fumo's prior opposition nothing more than 'political gamesmanship.' A federal appeals court agreed with Davis, and now Fumo has appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court." The Inquirer notes, "The FBI and IRS are trying to determine whether Fumo used a South Philadelphia charity, Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods, for personal or political advantage."

Philadelphia Mobsters Fear FBI Intensifying Investigations. The Philadelphia City Paper (12/6, McGarvey) reported, "Many mobsters in the Philadelphia Cosa Nostra are dreaming of a jail-free holiday season, but they're worried that all they'll get for Christmas are chunks of coal taking the form of federal racketeering indictments. Fueling concerns is the fact that undercover feds have been seen closely monitoring alleged mob meeting places in South Philly, Northeast Philly, Cherry Hill and Margate. It seems as if purported boss Joseph 'Uncle Joe' Ligambi is the focus of attention. 'The FBI is following Ligambi around the clock,' a mob associate tells City Paper. 'A lot of people think something big is coming down the pike.'" However, "one local defense attorney who has represented mobsters says he thinks the feds are merely floating indictment rumors because they've wiretapped the local mob. 'It's called "tickling the wire,"' the attorney explains. 'The police tell the press. The press tells everyone else and when the gangsters hear about it, they start blabbing to each other over the telephone. The FBI hopes that someone will panic and say something incriminating.'"

FBI Says Gang Members Increasingly Infiltrating US Armed Forces. The European edition of Stars and Stripes (12/7, Robson) reports, "U.S. criminal gangs have gained a foothold in the U.S. military and are using overseas deployments to spread tentacles around the globe, according to the FBI. FBI gang investigator Jennifer Simon said in an e-mail to Stars and Stripes this week that gang members have been documented on or near U.S. military bases in Germany, Italy, Japan, South Korea and Iraq. 'It's no secret that gang members are prevalent in the armed forces, including internationally,' Simon said, adding that the FBI is preparing to release a report on gangs in the military." Stars and Stripes adds, "Gang-related activity in the military is highly underreported, and the Army is the only branch of the military that collects gang-related statistics, she wrote. 'It's often in the military's best interest to keep these incidents quiet, given low recruitment numbers and recent negative publicity. The relaxation of recruiting standards, recruiter misconduct and the military's lack of enforcement (gang membership is not prohibited in the Army) have compounded the problem and allowed gang member presence in the military to proliferate,' Simon said."

Federal Judge Directs Maryland Officials To Test Recruiting Doctors For Executions. The AP (12/7, Witte) reports, "A federal judge considering challenges to Maryland's practice of execution by lethal injection wants the state to explore whether general surgeons, anesthesiologists and other more highly trained medical personnel would be willing to take part in executions." The AP continues, "Lawyers for death row inmate and convicted murderer Vernon Evans Jr. argue the people who currently carry out lethal injections are not qualified to know if an inmate is properly anesthetized before being put to death." The AP adds, "They have argued Evans' veins are so damaged from intravenous drug use that current execution protocol would subject him to "an unnecessary risk of unconstitutional pain and suffering." … They have asked U.S. District Judge Benson Legg to require the state to add a general surgeon and either an anesthesiologist or a certified nurse anesthetist to the lethal injection team." The AP notes, "Attorneys representing the state have argued such specialists are not needed because an execution is not a medical procedure. … The state also has argued that finding such specialists would be difficult. The American Medical Association, the American Society of Anesthesiologists and the American Nurses Association strongly discourage members from having anything to do with lethal injections. … But Evans' lawyers have argued there are medical specialists willing to take part. They have cited a study in the Annals of Internal Medicine that found 19 percent of surveyed physicians expressed a willingness to inject the drugs. The 2001 study also found 41 percent of the doctors surveyed would do at least one of the AMA-prohibited actions."

Judge Sets Bail For Two Of Three Charged With Sex Trafficking In Colorado. The AP (12/5) reported, "A federal magistrate set bail at $20,000 each for two people accused of running a prostitution ring but ordered a third suspect held without bail." Wai Chong Kong and Kit Chi Ho "were ordered Monday to wear monitoring bracelets on their ankles if released on bail. Magistrate Judge O. Edward Schlatter denied bail for Kah Poh Cheah…who prosecutors said is in the United States illegally on an expired visa. The three were arrested last month on suspicion of operating brothels out of four Denver-area apartments. Authorities said some of the prostitutes were working to pay off debts of up to $18,000 for fake visas that got them into the United States illegally from Asia." The Rocky Mountain News (12/5, Burnett) notedd Kit Chi Ho "wept as she asked a federal judge Monday to let her go home to her two young children. … On Monday, a federal grand jury returned an 18-count indictment, accusing each defendant of conspiracy and seven counts of transport of an individual for prostitution. Kong also is charged with two counts of money laundering, and Ho and Cheah each are charged with two counts of using interstate facilities to promote prostitution."

Virginia Man Pleads Guilty To $8.3 Million Investment Fraud. The AP (12/7) reports that a "Richmond man accused of cheating more than 350 investors out of about $8.3 million pleaded guilty Wednesday to mail fraud and money laundering. James E. Brown Jr. faces a maximum of 120 years in prison and fines of up to $16 million on each count when he is sentenced March 14 by U.S. District Judge Richard Williams, according to federal prosecutors. Brown was arrested in September after an investigation by the FBI, the U.S. Postal Inspection Service and the Internal Revenue Service. Authorities charged that Brown, owner and president of Brown Investment Services, promised investors he could double their money every 30 business days through trading on the Foreign Currency Exchange Market." The AP notes, "Little of the money was invested, and Brown paid early investors with cash coming in from subsequent investors to lull them into believing the investments were paying off as promised."

Former Fort Bliss Soldier Pleads Guilty To Child Porn Charges. The El Paso Times (12/7, Fonce-Olivas) reports, "A 27-year-old former Fort Bliss soldier pleaded guilty Wednesday in U.S District Court to charges of producing and possessing child pornography, the office of U.S. Attorney Johnny Sutton announced. Gary Alan Hernandez Jr., a former first lieutenant in the 204th Military Intelligence Battalion, pleaded guilty to one count of production and one count of possession of material involving the sexual exploitation of children." The Times notes, "As part of his guilty plea, he admitted that on April 16, 2005, he enticed a minor female to engage in sexually explicit conduct that would be photographed and distributed on the Internet. He was arrested Aug. 3, 2005, by FBI agents."

Florida Prosecutors Drop Charges In Girls Gone Wild Video Series Case. The AP (12/7) reports from Panama City, FL, "All but eight of the dozens of felony charges once faced by producers of the Girls Gone Wild video series about young women baring their breasts and acting in other sexual situations have been dropped by prosecutors due to a lack of evidence in the case that is set for trial next year." The AP continues, "Assistant State Attorney Mark Graham said he can support only second-degree felony charges of using children in sexual performances in his case against producer Joseph Francis, Francis' companies and employees. … The remaining charges could be dropped at a Jan. 3 hearing when a judge considers a defense motion to dismiss all charges in the 2003 case." The AP adds, "Graham filed the motion to reduce the charges on Monday in response to the request from Francis' attorney Aaron Dyer for all charges to be dropped because of police misconduct. A judge in July threw out evidence investigators gathered while searching Francis' condominiums and private jet because of problems with the search warrants. … A federal civil lawsuit against Francis filed by the two women filmed is pending."

Maryland Pastor Fatally Shot Outside Church. The Washington Post (12/7, B01, Partlow, Harris) reports, "A well-known Prince George's County minister who runs a transitional home for poor families died yesterday after being gunned down on the steps of his church in the morning." The Post continues, "The Rev. Milton L. Moore was outside the entrance of the Warriors for Christ Ministries in Suitland about 7 a.m. when he was struck in the upper body and bullets shattered a glass door, police and relatives said. He died at 4:25 p.m. … The shooting happened outside the three-story beige brick ministry building at 2420 Brooks Dr., which shares a parking lot with Drew-Freeman Middle School. Vernell Simon, 66, who lives across Brooks Drive from the ministry building, said he heard five or six shots, followed minutes later by sirens." The Post adds, "People inside the ministry building told police that they heard arguing outside before the shots. .. .Moore, 50, was shot once in the upper body, police said. … Several advocates for the homeless in Prince George's said Moore's ministry plays an important role in the county's social safety net and helps people get off the streets until they can find more permanent shelter."

Police Say Same Person May Have Killed Virginia Elderly Women. The Washington Post (12/7, B6, Jackman, 690K) reports, "Two elderly women slain three months apart in Springfield may have been killed by the same person -- someone with ties to their community who happened to come along, saw them alone and pounced on the opportunity to attack them, Fairfax County police said yesterday. 'I'm not going to say it's a serial killer,' Capt. Michael Spradlin, head of Fairfax's criminal investigations bureau, said at a news conference. But he said investigators decided that the cases were linked after looking at the common elements." The Post notes, "There was no indication that the women knew each other, Spradlin said. … Police have been discussing the cases with analysts from the FBI's Behavioral Sciences Unit, but Spradlin said he did not want to release any possible profile of the killer, for fear of limiting tips on potential suspects."

CIVIL LAW:

Family Sues US Mint Over Confiscation Of Rare Coins. The AP (12/7, Loviglio) reports from Philadelphia, "A family is suing the U.S. Mint, saying it illegally seized 10 gold coins that are among the rarest and most valuable in the world that the family found among a dead relative's possessions." The AP continues, "The lawsuit, filed Tuesday in U.S. District Court in Philadelphia, accuses the Mint of violating the Constitution and breaking federal forfeiture laws by refusing to return the 1933 'double eagle' coins to the family after it handed the coins over to have their authenticity confirmed." The AP adds, "Plaintiffs Joan S. Langbord and her sons, Roy and David, are seeking the immediate return of the coins, said their attorney, Barry H. Berke. … Defendants named in the suit include the Mint, the Treasury Department, and officials in those agencies. … The coins, which Mint officials have said are so rare that their value could not be calculated, feature a flying eagle on one side and a figure representing liberty on the other. There were 445,500 minted in 1933, but they were melted down before being released into circulation when President Franklin D. Roosevelt took the country off the gold standard. … A handful escaped, however. Two were deliberately set aside and are at the Smithsonian Institution. The Mint has said any others in existence were obtained illegally, but agreed after a lengthy court battle to allow one of the coins to be sold at auction in 2002 for $7.59 million - the highest price ever paid for a coin - after its owner agreed to split the proceeds with the Mint. … Langbord, who discovered the coins in 2003 in a safe deposit box belonging to her deceased father, longtime Philadelphia jeweler Israel Switt, was aware of that case and contacted the Mint to disclose the coins' existence and 'attempt to reach an amicable resolution of any issues that might be raised,' the lawsuit states. … She handed the coins over to the Mint to be authenticated, but the Mint refused to give them back, saying they must have been stolen from the Philadelphia Mint in the early 1930s because they had never been in circulation, according to the lawsuit."

Bankruptcy Filings Down After One Year Under New Law. The AP (12/7, Caterinicchia) reports, "Bankruptcy filings have dropped dramatically in the year since a law went into effect aimed at curbing abuse of the system. But it's too soon to gauge the act's effectiveness, the legislation's most ardent supporters said Wednesday at a hearing held to study the law's impact." The AP continues, "About 750,000 personal bankruptcy cases were filed in the month before the law went into effect Oct. 17, 2005, compared to fewer than 500,000 cases in the past 12 months. … Many consumers rushed to file ahead of the new law, which requires a 'means test' that determines whether filers qualify to have their debt erased under Chapter 7 or must file for a type of bankruptcy that requires repayment of a percentage of their debt over time. … 'Means testing is a workable system,' says Clifford J. White III, director of the Justice Department's Executive Office for U.S. Trustees, which has responsibility for the bankruptcy system. But White added that the test's long-term effectiveness is unknown since the number of filings has been so low." The AP adds, "White, who testified before the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on Administrative Oversight and the Courts, also urged the mandating of 'smart forms' that would automate most court procedures involved in bankruptcy filings. That could help keep the bankruptcy system efficient if the number of filings increase in the future as trends indicate they will, he said. … From January to September, the personal and business bankruptcies dropped to 443,750 from 1.41 million in the year-ago period, according to data released Tuesday by the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts. Personal filings fell to 429,522 from 1.38 million, while business bankruptcies declined to 14,228 from 26,275 in the same period. … But the subcommittee's incoming chairman, Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., said the bill may not go far enough in distinguishing between people who were financially ruined for legitimate reasons like job loss or the death of a spouse, and those who are 'reckless high rollers.'"

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Probe Clears Florida Police In 2005 Drug Raid Death. The St. Petersburg (FL) Times (12/7, Tisch) reports, "Federal prosecutors have determined that a Pinellas sheriff's deputy did not violate the civil rights of a St. Petersburg man who was shot and killed in April 2005 during a drug raid." The Times continues, "Jarrell S. Walker, 19, was shot to death by Deputy Christopher Taylor after a SWAT team burst into Walker's home as part of a drug investigation April 12, 2005. … Deputies found drugs and guns in the home. Walker, who was unarmed, was shot twice in the back." The Times adds, "The FBI said in May 2005 that it would investigate whether Walker's civil rights were violated. … 'After careful consideration, we concluded that the evidence does not establish a prosecutable violation of the federal criminal civil rights statutes,' said Mark J. Kappelhoff, section chief of the criminal section of the U.S. Department of Justice's Civil Rights Division, in a letter to the Sheriff's Office." The Times notes, "The shooting prompted controversy and criticism from some community leaders, especially in St. Petersburg's African-American community. Walker was black; Taylor is white. … The Pinellas-Pasco State Attorney's Office ruled the shooting justifiable homicide because, it said, Walker was reaching for something under a couch and refused repeated orders to show his hands. A loaded handgun was found nearby. … However, Pinellas-Pasco State Attorney Bernie McCabe noted in a report: 'I cannot help but note that this is another relatively young black male who has met his death at the hands of law enforcement in Pinellas County.' He urged the Sheriff's Office to review its policy on deadly force. … Sheriff Jim Coats did just that, changing policy to make it more clear when deadly force should be used. … The federal civil rights review came at the request of the St. Petersburg NAACP, whose leadership disagreed with McCabe's decision to clear Taylor of wrongdoing."

Protestors Urge Action After Atlanta Police Shootings. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (12/7, Simpson) reports, "Vowing to go to jail for their cause, about 50 protestors blocked traffic on Memorial Drive Wednesday in the latest march to draw attention to police shootings in DeKalb County." The AJC continues, "Marchers who made the short trek from the county jail complex to nearby I-285, included former DeKalb NAACP president John Evans and state Rep. 'Able' Mable Thomas (D-Atlanta). … Some of the marchers said they were willing to be arrested for the cause. No police were on the scene shortly after 11 a.m." The AJC adds, "The march is the third of its kind in recent weeks. This year, DeKalb police have been involved in 12 deadly shootings. One officer has been killed. … Some community activists have called for the U.S. Justice Department to investigate. The DeKalb County District Attorneys office has agreed to review all of the shootings."

Group Sends Letter To Gonzales. WAGA- TV (12/6, 12:00 p.m.) broadcasts in Atlanta, "We want to ask Mr. Vernon Jones how much more a mother has to cry for their child, how much more kids have to cry for their parents. And the group has written a letter to US Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez. They have not heard back yet. So they will be going to the county commission's meeting next Tuesday."

Columnist Decries Slow Pace Of NYC Police Shooting Probe. In his column for the New York Times (12/7), Bob Herbert writes, "I don't know whether the undercover cops who shot and killed Sean Bell and wounded his two friends should be criminally indicted. I wasn't there and not enough information has emerged publicly to make a determination. … What I do know is that the investigation of this shooting in Jamaica, Queens, in which the victims were unarmed and seemed to have no intention of threatening the police, is not being conducted in a timely or effective fashion." Herbert continues, "While the local community is seething with anger over the shooting, there are investigators scrambling like mad to find dirt to throw on the victims and locate any evidence that might, however remotely, tend to justify the shooting. But the authorities have not even asked the cops, who fired 50 bullets at the car with the three men inside, what happened. That is insane." Herbert adds, "The office of the Queens district attorney, Richard Brown, is leading the investigation into the shooting. For procedural reasons that have to do with concerns about inadvertently conferring some degree of immunity on the officers, the D.A. has asked the Police Department not to interview the officers who shot at the car. … But the D.A.'s office has been moving in super-slow motion on the case, and no one from that office has interviewed the cops, either. Mr. Brown told me yesterday that he has a tremendous amount of additional information to gather before his office attempts to speak to the cops. … The truth is that neither the Police Department nor the district attorneys in New York are equipped to properly investigate controversial police shootings. The prosecutors and the cops have a special, co-dependent relationship that exists around-the-clock, year-in and year-out. They work together all the time on criminal cases and other matters. They view one another as members of a close-knit criminal justice family. They watch each other's backs. … The interests of the larger community can be served only when problematic police shootings are thoroughly and fairly investigated by objective, impartial and independent investigators. … A special investigative office, which could look at these incidents and encounters only after the fact, is not enough. There is also a need for Mayor Bloomberg and Police Commissioner Ray Kelly to become proactive, to acknowledge that racism is still an issue in the Police Department and to overhaul police training and address poisonous police attitudes in an effort to prevent these senseless tragedies."

New York Anti-Terror Unit Sued For Anti-Muslim Rhetoric. The AP (12/7, Neumeister) reports, "A celebrated police anti-terrorism cyber unit became a beehive of anti-Muslim rhetoric after a city consultant unleashed hundreds of hateful e-mails saying Muslims and Arabs were all potential terrorists, a unit member said in a lawsuit filed Tuesday." The AP continues, "The Department of Correction lieutenant, listed as John Doe Anti-Terrorism Officer on the lawsuit in U.S. District Court in Manhattan, said he was subjected to a hostile work environment, great emotional anguish, public humiliation and illegal retaliation. .. The Egyptian-born man asked for unspecified damages, saying he had suffered severe emotional distress, mental anguish, depression, physical injuries, illness, loss of pay and benefits and loss of advancement opportunities as a member of the elite anti-terror unit." The AP adds, "The man, described in the lawsuit as 'a proud Arab-American, a practicing Muslim and a patriot,' blamed the city for failing to respond to his repeated complaints about the contractor, who was alleged to have sent e-mails saying 'Burning the hate-filled Koran should be viewed as a public service at the least' and 'Without Islam, there wouldn't be any Islamic terror.' … He said the hateful rhetoric, unchecked by supervisors, infected the workplace, where other employees felt comfortable making anti-Muslim comments and jokes and where a high-ranking police official thought it was OK to say, 'All Arabs are animals.'"

Judge To Decide On Osceola, FL, Voting Plan. The Orlando Sentinel (12/7, Pino) reports, "A 17-month-long battle over how Osceola elects county commissioners could come to a close in federal court today." The Sentinel continues, "The remaining issue before U.S. District Judge Gregory A. Presnell is whether the county's proposal to create a system of at-large and single-member seats by increasing the size of the board to seven commissioners will pass legal muster." The Sentinel adds, "Presnell issued an injunction halting commission elections in June and ruled in October that the 'racially polarized' county's at-large voting system penalizes Hispanics in violation of the Voting Rights Act. … On Wednesday, commissioners voted 4-0 to accept a redistricting plan drafted by the U.S. Department of Justice, rather than a plan drawn up by county experts, after Presnell this week rejected a key part of the county's proposal. Commissioner Paul Owen was absent." The Sentinel notes, "In drawing proposed new district lines, Osceola had used 2005 U.S. Census population estimates and a county database of certificates of occupancy to distribute the approximately 59,000 people who have moved to the county since 2000. Presnell said he was "unconvinced" by the data and ordered the county to submit a plan using 2000 Census figures by Wednesday. … 'I'm going to support the resolution' to adopt the Justice Department's plan, Commissioner Tom Franklin said. 'But I think we should express our concern that the court did not allow us enough time to seek public input.' … The plan adopted Wednesday has district lines that do not require two commissioners to face each other in an upcoming election. As a result, Assistant County Attorney George Nickerson said, the Justice Department will accept staggered elections. In its initial proposal, the agency has wanted all five commission seats on the ballot at the same time."

ANTITRUST:

Texas Man Indicted For E-Rate Fraud. The AP (12/7) reports, "A contractor was indicted in Texas on Wednesday and charged with defrauding a federal program that provides computers and Internet access to economically disadvantaged schools and libraries." The AP continues, "A federal grand jury in McAllen, Texas, returned a nine-count indictment alleging that the former president and owner of ATE Tel Solutions Inc. — Rafael G. Adame — committed wire fraud, according to the Justice Department." The AP adds, "The E-Rate program is funded by telephone customers through a special fee included in their bills. The indictment alleges Adame submitted fraudulent charges on behalf of his company to the program's administrator, collecting $141,273 in payments. … The Justice Department said that including Wednesday's filing, 14 individuals and 12 companies have been charged as part of an ongoing investigation into the program. Thus far, defendants have agreed to pay fines and restitution totaling more than $40 million." The AP notes, "The indictment alleges Adame, by making false representations on invoices filed with the E-Rate administrator, received payments in excess of what was authorized and for work that was not performed."

Antitrust Probes Roil Municipal Bond Market. Bloomberg (12/7, Selway, Braun) reports, "The first-ever antitrust probe of the municipal bond market is roiling an industry that states and cities depend on to finance everything from garbage trucks to schools." Bloomberg continues, "U.S. Justice Department prosecutors subpoenaed more than a dozen banks and insurers three weeks ago, seizing documents from three brokers in a search for evidence of bid rigging. Lawyers say it's the biggest criminal investigation of the almost 200- year-old market, where municipalities have more than $2 trillion of debt outstanding. … 'You don't want to have something like this going on,' said Robert Doty, a Sacramento, California-based adviser with American Governmental Financial Services Co., who is the vice chairman of the National Association of Independent Public Finance Advisors. 'It's just bad for the reputation of the market.'" Bloomberg adds, "JPMorgan Chase & Co., the third-largest bank in the U.S., American International Group Inc., the world's largest insurance company, and Financial Security Assurance Holdings Ltd., a unit of Brussels-based financial services company Dexia SA, are among the companies that received subpoenas. JPMorgan declined to comment. AIG and Financial Security spokespeople said the companies are cooperating with the probe. … The investigation stems from an Internal Revenue Service review that found scores of municipal bond deals robbed federal taxpayers of more than $100 million. Banks and other financial firms arranged to sell guaranteed investment contracts in a way that increased their fees at the expense of the U.S. government, said Charlie Anderson, manager of field operations for the IRS's tax-exempt bond division."

The Wall Street Journal (12/7, C1, Hudson, Richardson) reports, "Federal regulators tried to clean up corruption in the municipal-bond market in the 1990s. … But with the muni market caught in a new, wide-ranging investigation, it looks like little has changed." The Journal continues, "In recent weeks, the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission have issued subpoenas to Wall Street firms seeking information on an array of muni-market investment products, according to people close to the banks. In November, the Federal Bureau of Investigation raided offices of some firms that act as go-betweens for municipalities and the banks. The Justice Department acknowledged it was investigating 'anticompetitive practices' in the industry. And the Internal Revenue Service is examining whether consultants and underwriters have used financial sleight of hand to evade federal taxes. … 'There's a lot of bad deals out there -- and the industry is very blasé,' said Charles Anderson, field manager of the IRS's municipal-bond unit, in an interview." The Journal adds, "The Justice Department has issued subpoenas to most of the big investment banks on Wall Street, according to several people close to the banks. The top underwriters of municipal bonds over the past 15 years include Bank of America Corp., Bear Stearns Cos., Citigroup Inc., Goldman Sachs Group Inc., J.P. Morgan Chase & Co., Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc., Merrill Lynch & Co., Morgan Stanley and UBS AG. All declined to comment officially, but several people close to the banks said that most or all of the firms had received subpoenas in recent weeks. … Some people familiar with the probes cautioned that hard details about the nature of the latest investigations are hard to come by. One person close to a big Wall Street bank said the probes 'could take several years.'"

Delta Pilots Union Opposes Merger With US Air. USA Today (12/7, Adams) reports, "On a day of escalating rhetoric from two airlines, the chief of Delta Air Lines' pilots union warned Wednesday that a merger with US Airways (LCC) would leave 'thousands' of Delta employees jobless." USA continues, "The remarks by Lee Moak, chairman of Delta's Air Line Pilots Association, came as US Airways CEO Douglas Parker pressed for access to Delta's books to move ahead on his company's bid to acquire Delta out of Chapter 11 bankruptcy." USA adds, "US Airways has made a hostile takeover offer of $8.5 billion in cash and stock for Delta, the USA's third-biggest airline, which is in Chapter 11. US Airways says a merger would make both airlines stronger and more competitive in the USA and abroad. It would be the world's biggest airline. .. .Executives at Delta have rebuffed the offer, saying that it's too risky and that Delta is better off alone." USA notes, "Moak's warning of job losses contrasts with US Airways' public promises not to lay off any employees or halt air service to any cities if the two airlines merge. Because both US Airways and Delta operate a shuttle service serving Washington, New York and Boston, Parker has said one of the shuttles would have to be sold to avoid federal antitrust violations. … In an interview, Moak said the union's analysis of US Airways' offer finds 'at least 1,000 Delta pilots and several thousand other Delta employees would be terminated' as a result. … Only Delta's pilots are unionized. That union is one of Delta's largest unsecured creditors and is represented on the creditors' committee. Other Delta workers, such as flight attendants, mechanics and reservations agents, are not unionized and have no contract protections."

US Air Reiterates Commitment To Merger. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (12/7, Hirschman) reports, "US Airways called for Delta Air Lines' directors and creditors to 'fully and fairly' evaluate its $8.6 billion takeover bid and reiterated Wednesday its commitment to pursue the controversial deal." The AJC continues, "Some airline analysts had concluded the acquisition was falling apart when US Airways CEO Doug Parker was quoted in USA Today on Wednesday morning saying his carrier would abandon the hostile takeover if Delta wasn't convinced of its benefits. Parker's comments were made during a Tuesday meeting with the newspaper's editors and reporters. … 'We have to get to a point where all are working together on this or it's not going to happen,' Parker said in USA Today. 'This is all about convincing Delta's management that this plan makes sense.'" The AJC adds, "On Wednesday afternoon, however, Parker issued a written statement proclaiming US Airways is 'fully committed' to purchasing Delta and calling for the Atlanta-based airline's board and creditors to move to a detailed study of a combined operation. … Parker didn't deny telling USA Today that US Airways would only pursue a consensual deal. But a US Airways spokeswoman said Parker's written statement was meant to clear up 'misperceptions the article may have caused.'"

SF Chronicle, MediaNews Plan Ad Sales, Distribution Sharing Deal. The AP (12/7, Kravets) reports, "MediaNews Group Inc. and the San Francisco Chronicle plan to consolidate some of the business operations of their Bay Area newspapers, but will refrain from doing so pending the outcome of a federal antitrust trial challenging the deal, both companies said Wednesday." The AP continues, "Last week, U.S. District Judge Susan Illston tentatively blocked MediaNews and the Chronicle's owner, Hearst Corp., from merging local distribution and national ad sales. Illston said such a deal could pave the way for "price manipulation" and make it harder for new competitors to enter the market." The AP adds, "New York-based Hearst Corp. has invested $300 million in a complex deal that gives MediaNews three more Bay Area newspapers -- on top of the seven it already owns, including the Oakland Tribune. Hearst's investment helped Denver-based MediaNews finance the purchase of Hearst rivals Contra Costa Times, the San Jose Mercury News and Monterey County Herald earlier this year. … In issuing the temporary restraining order against the alliance, Illston said she had been under the impression that Hearst's investment was solely an equity stake, but an April 26 memo had surfaced suggesting it actually was a bid to merge operations." The AP notes, "Illston's comments bolstered San Francisco businessman Clint Reilly's federal antitrust claims against the publishers. … In court briefs and in interviews Wednesday, the publishers said they planned to move forward with the consolidation by winning the right to do so at trial by proving the plan is not anticompetitive. Executives have said the two companies had not engaged in any discussions to merge operations since the letter was written."

Telemundo, Grupo Xtra Request For Network Sets Off Mexican Media Dispute. The New York Times (12/7, Malkin) reports, "Night after night for almost two weeks, Mexican television news has shown exposés on how poor people suffer from the high cost of medicines. … The images of the ill and dying have been heart-wrenching. Legislators lament the lack of regulation. Corner pharmacies barely fend off failure. The new health minister concedes that high prices are a problem." The Times continues, "It may be merely a coincidence that Mexico's two competing television companies, Televisa and TV Azteca, have each chosen to focus on this particular social problem at the same time. … Their separate reporting comes to exactly the same conclusion. The culprits who drive the prices so high are two pharmaceutical distributors who together control 70 percent of the market. And both news teams single out the same one for particular opprobrium: Grupo Casa Saba, a $2 billion company controlled by the reclusive octogenarian billionaire Isaac Saba Raffoul. … What neither Televisa nor TV Azteca mentions is that Mr. Saba has his eye on another business: television." The Times adds, "Mr. Saba is the Mexican partner of Telemundo, the NBC Universal unit that is the No. 2 Spanish-language television broadcaster in the United States. In September, Telemundo and another company Mr. Saba owns, Grupo Xtra, formally requested a license for a broadcast television network. … Both Televisa and TV Azteca say that their coverage is driven only by news judgment. … Within weeks, the license request set off a nasty dispute between Telemundo and TV Azteca, leading to lawsuits and countersuits. Last week, Telemundo asked the Federal Communications Commission in the United States to deny the renewal of the broadcasting license to KAZA, the Los Angeles affiliate of Azteca's growing network based in the United States. The dispute comes just as Felipe Calderón takes office as president. Mr. Calderón, who campaigned on a promise to increase competition, has said that Mexico should have a third broadcast company. … The decision over whether to authorize a new network, which would be awarded by public auction, could prove to be the new government's first big test when it comes to taking on powerful business interests."

Japan Tobacco Discussing Takeover Of Gallaher. The Financial Times (12/7, Saigol, Wiggins)

reports, "Japan Tobacco, the world's third-biggest tobacco company, has made a takeover approach for Gallaher, the UK group that owns the Benson & Hedges and Silk Cut brands. … The approach is expected to trigger a counterbid for Gallaher, which has a market value of £6.4bn ($12.6bn)." The Times continues, "Philip Morris is the most likely suitor. BAT and Imperial Tobacco might also be interested but they would face heavy competition issues. … People familiar with the situation said on Wednesday night the talks were at a preliminary stage. The two companies have had one discussion." The Times adds, "Gallaher has been the subject of persistent takeover speculation in recent weeks. The UK company's shares have risen strongly over the past two months, gaining 13 per cent to close on Wednesday at 979p. … On Thursday, shares of Japan Tobacco surged 5.5 per cent to Y533,000 in midday trading in Tokyo. … Gallaher said on Wednesday night it had received an approach but declined to name the company involved. It said there was no certainty an offer would be made." The Times notes, "Japan Tobacco, which also owns food and pharmaceutical businesses, controls about 70 per cent of the Japanese tobacco market. A former state-owned monopoly, it sells the Camel and Winston brands outside the US. Japan Tobacco's international tobacco business is stronger than its domestic operations."

News Corp Nears Deal To Regain Liberty's Stake. The Wall Street Journal (12/7, A3, Angwin) reports, "A two-year standoff between News Corp. and its second-biggest shareholder, Liberty Media Corp., is nearing an end in a deal that will return Liberty to a powerful position in the media sector and solidify News Corp. Chairman Rupert Murdoch's control of his company, say people close to the situation." The Journal continues, "Under an agreement, which could be finalized in the next few weeks, News Corp. will buy Liberty's $11 billion stake in the media giant in exchange for News Corp's 38.6% stake in satellite-TV firm DirecTV Group Inc., some cash and some smaller News Corp. assets. … While the two sides have been discussing a deal along these lines for several months, significant progress has been made this week, according to people close to the situation." The Journal adds, "The biggest bone of contention has been the soaring stock price of DirecTV, which has risen more than 20% to above $23 since news of the talks broke in mid-September. … But while the two shareholdings are now roughly equal in price, Liberty executives believe the DirecTV stock was inflated by deal speculation, a point Liberty Chief Executive Greg Maffei made to investors at a media conference yesterday. By adding some cash and other assets to the swap, News Corp. will reduce the effective price it is getting for its DirecTV shares. … The main reason to add the assets, however, is to ensure the deal is tax-free for Liberty. Mr. Maffei estimated Liberty would save billions of dollars in taxes on the cash-and-asset swap."

Professor Warns Against Antitrust Probes Of Private Equity Funds. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (12/7, A18), Josh Lerner, the Jacob H. Schiff professor of investment banking at Harvard Business School, writes, "Some 53 years ago, Judge Harold Medina dismissed charges brought by the Justice Department against 17 leading investment banks. A case built up over a decade of investigations and almost three years of trial collapsed when the government was unable to show that the industry's collaborative practices constituted an anti-competitive conspiracy. The judge observed that activities that the government depicted as nefarious were 'nothing more nor less than a gradual, natural and normal growth or evolution by which an ancient form has been adapted to the needs of those engaged in raising capital.' … Now the trust-busters have again launched an inquiry into collusion in financial services, this time focusing on private equity firms such as Kohlberg, Kravis & Roberts. … The concern this time involves teaming up to bid in auctions of firms going private rather than jointly underwriting public corporate offerings. But it is hard not to feel that history is repeating itself. For not only is this investigation sure to fatten the profit pools of dozens of securities law firms, but the fundamental errors that Judge Medina flagged half a century ago seem destined to be repeated." Lerner continues, "Far from being a static industry with ossified giants, private equity features brutal competition and enormous dynamism. Groups that were dominant just a few years ago…have dramatically downsized or announced their intention to cease operations after experiencing investment missteps and succession problems. Meanwhile, new organizations have amassed enormous sums of capital in short periods. For instance, one of the Justice Department's targets, Silver Lake Partners, was only established in 1999. Since then, it has raised $6 billion in equity, and in light of its great success, is now raising a larger fund. … Thus, the reality of the market seems dramatically different from the typical setting where "trust-busters" are mandated to work. Moreover, the behavior in the Justice Department's cross-hairs -- deal sharing -- is an important aspect of this competition that benefits all of us." Lerner concludes, "Even if the antitrust threat dissipates, there is a broader lesson here. When one considers private equity's substantial successes in this decade, it is clear that the industry thrives on its extraordinary flexibility and ability to take risks. … Private equity is a dynamic industry, at whose heart is taking calculated risks based on limited information. Washington must understand that the many benefits private equity provides by facilitating economic growth are unlikely to be sustained if the heavy hand of government intrudes, whether through litigation or regulation."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

DOJ Tells Alabama County To Continue Greenways Program. The Birmingham (AL) News (12/7, Bouma) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department has rejected Jefferson County's plans to close its greenways program, leading to an 11th-hour scramble to write a new arrangement that all sides agree is legal." The News continues, "The county cannot meet its obligations under a federal agreement by assigning the ultimate financial and legal responsibility to the nonprofit Freshwater Land Trust, as the County Commission voted in November." The News adds, "Jefferson County agreed in 1996, in a federal case, to spend 10 years buying land in the Black Warrior and Cahaba rivers watersheds as penance for polluting the waterways for decades with broken sewers. … All sides agree that the county met its obligation to finish buying land in the $30 million program by the Saturday due date. And lawyers agree the nonprofit Freshwater Land Trust should oversee the land, as the county has planned. … But the 1996 court settlement requires the county to keep financial responsibility for major problems and the legal responsibility of ensuring that the land is preserved." The News notes, "Bill Weinischke, senior attorney for the Justice Department, said he could not say what would happen if the county missed the deadline by a few days but completed it in time for the county commission to vote on it during its Tuesday meeting. … Fines are allowed under the 1996 consent decree, but the Justice Department has not threatened any."

Interior Department AG Finds Pervasive Problems In Royalty Program. The New York Times (12/7, Andrews, 1.16M) reports, "An eight-month investigation by the Interior Department's chief watchdog has found pervasive problems in the government's program for ensuring that companies pay the royalties they owe on billions of dollars of oil and gas pumped on federal land and in coastal waters. In a scathing report to Congress, the Interior Department's inspector general says the agency's data are often inaccurate, that its officials rely too heavily on statements by oil companies rather than actual records and that only about 9 percent of all oil and gas leases are being reviewed." The "report undermines claims by top Interior officials that the department is aggressively pursuing underpayments and outright cheating by companies that drill on property owned by the American public." It "comes as lawmakers in both parties have been attacking the Interior Department for failing to correct blunders that department officials now concede could cost the government as much as $10 billion over the next five years. It also reinforces complaints by critics, from auditors within the agency to lawmakers in both parties, who have said that enforcement has become superficial, prone to errors and overly deferential to oil companies."

The Washington Post (12/7, D3, Mufson, 690K) reports, "The agency that collects royalties from oil and gas producers lacks the data, coordination and manpower to keep track of companies operating on federal land and in federal waters, a report by the Interior Department's inspector general said." It "criticized the Minerals Management Service for relying on 'compliance reviews,' which depend on information provided by the companies, rather than detailed audits, independent information or site visits."

The AP (12/7, Talley) says, "With 'inaccurate and incomplete' data and compliance reviews that 'do not adequately evaluate company-reported volume and allowance data,' the Inspector General said there was a high risk 'the MMS may not detect underpaid royalties.' As a result, the MMS cannot determine the true cost and benefits of the royalty program, and has no complete picture just how much oil companies owe the government." The AP adds, "MMS Director Johnnie Burton, in a response letter to the Inspector General, said that she agreed that more could be done to raise compliance levels. In a press release, the MMS said it would act quickly to implement new measures recommended by the Inspector General, including, 'strengthened procedures, improved administrative controls and enhanced tracking systems.'"

The Houston Chronicle (12/7, Ivanovich, 530K) reports the IG "recommended agency officials insist companies turn over actual source documents — such as tank gauge reports — for at least one test month." The Chronicle adds, "Responding to the report today, Rep. Darrell Issa, R-Calf., chairman of a House subcommittee that has been examining the Minerals Management Service, said agency officials 'don't seem to have any concept of independent collection or independent analysis.' ... Rep. Edward Markey, D-Mass., a frequent critic of the White House's energy policies, said the Devaney report 'underscores how poorly the Bush Administration's Minerals Management Service has been overseeing oil and gas drilling activities on public land.'"

Judge Blocks US From Reversing Roadless Rules. The Christian Science Monitor (12/7, Knickerbocker) reports from Ashland, OR, "Six years after the Bush administration came to office seeking to reverse Bill Clinton's order for protecting roadless areas on federal lands, the issue continues to smolder. … A federal judge has blocked the administration from lifting protections on nearly 50 million acres of backcountry. Several governors are suing Uncle Sam over the issue. And other governors are pushing ahead with their own plans to balance environmental protection with mining, logging, oil and gas development, and other commercial uses." The Monitor continues, "At stake are vast areas of federal land, most of it forested tracts across the Ameri-can West where the sound of road-building bulldozers has never been heard. Environmentalists say such areas are valuable for wildlife habitat, preserving water and air quality, and providing a wildernesslike experience. Many hunters and fishermen want them kept pristine as well. .. .But many areas also are potential sources of timber, minerals, gas, and oil. Developing such natural resources can be done in a way that protects the environment, administration and industry officials assert." The Monitor adds, "In September, US Magistrate Elizabeth Laporte in San Francisco ruled that the Bush administration's repeal of the 2001 Roadless Area Conservation Rule, as the Clinton order is called, violates both the Endangered Species Act and the National Environmental Policy Act. .. .In another opinion last week, Judge Laporte blocked plans to extract natural resources in roadless areas, including some 300 controversial oil and gas leases in seven western states the US Forest Service issued in recent years. … Administration officials made 'a clear error of judgment' in attempting to open up roadless areas without the proper environmental assessments, Laporte ruled. .. .The administration had sought to require governors to petition Washington if they wanted to protect federal roadless land in their states. Laporte ruled that illegal as well. But not before governors in Virginia, North and South Carolina, New Mexico, and California had petitioned the federal government for full protection of roadless areas in their states. .. Meanwhile, governors in other states - Idaho, Colorado, and Utah among them - want to lift or ease some of the restrictions imposed by the Clinton rule."

States Developing Own Plans To Cut Mercury Emissions. The Christian Science Monitor (12/7, Clayton, 59K) reports, "Facing a mandate to slash toxic mercury emissions from coal-fired power plants, 23 states are thumbing their noses at a federal cleanup plan and are instead developing their own far tougher plans to deal with mercury." But "doing so has caused many of them to miss a federal Nov. 17 deadline to submit their plans to the Environmental Protection Agency. Now, the EPA is ratcheting up the pressure. This week, the agency is expected to publish names of more than 20 states that could have the federal plan imposed on them if they don't submit tougher plans by next spring." The Monitor adds, "What it all adds up to is a major state-led rebellion over mercury emissions that dwarfs, for example, an 11-state push to create regional greenhouse-gas reduction programs without federal support. If successful, the revolt could weaken a key element of the federal mercury rules: an emissions-trading system popular with the utility industry and already in place for air pollutants like nitrogen oxides."

Small Print In Tax Bill Would Delay EPA Rule. The AP (12/7, Heilprin) reports, "Farmers would be off the hook for costly air pollution cleanups under an obscure provision slipped into a tax bill that may be the last act of this Congress. Buried in the fine print of the bill filed Wednesday, the measure by Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, would forbid the Environmental Protection Agency from applying the Clean Air Act to dust and soot from farms until 2012." Environmentalists "complain the moratorium would grant farmers a five-year holiday from the EPA's health standards for fine particles and soot, which protect people living downwind."

Police Officers Wounded In Shootout On Nevada Indian Reservation. The AP (12/7) reports, "A tribal police chief, another officer and two residents of a home on the Walker River Paiute Reservation were wounded in a shootout Wednesday as the officers tried to serve an arrest warrant at the house, authorities said. The four men were flown by emergency services helicopters to a hospital in Reno, about 100 miles to the north, FBI spokesman David Staretz said. … Staretz said both officers were wearing body armor and their injuries weren't considered life-threatening. Staretz also said he was told the other men, a father and son, didn't sustain serious injuries, although a spokesman for the Regional Emergency Medical Services Authority in Reno said one of the men was in critical condition." The AP notes, "The nature of the arrest warrant wasn't immediately known, although Staretz said it may have been drug-related since DEA personnel were at the scene. A neighbor described the house as a known hangout for drug users."

House GOP Leaders Drop Efforts To Push Indian Casino Bill. The Hill (12/7, Snyder) reports, "House Republican leaders have apparently dropped a late attempt to pass a bill that limits off-reservation Indian gaming, after several tribes raised objections." The Hill continues, "House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), who opposes one tribe's effort to build a casino in his district, supported the last-ditch effort to push the bill, which had previously been introduced by Rep. Richard Pombo (R-Calif.), outgoing House Resources Committee chairman, gaming lobbyists said. … But the measure proved too controversial to fit into a short lame-duck session." The Hill adds, "Tribal officials and their lobbyists have urged Congress to wait instead for the Department of the Interior's own effort to update its rules governing Indian gaming. … A public-comment period on the proposed rule closes next Friday, with a final rule expected sometime late next spring. … 'We felt like there was a regulation out there and that we ought to let the regulation go forward,' one gaming lobbyist said. … But Brian Kennedy, a spokesman for the House Resources Committee, said that the Pombo measure provided stronger protection against the spread of casinos than is contemplated by Interior." The Hill notes, "In September, a majority of House members voted to approve the Pombo bill, but the measure failed because it did not receive the two-thirds support it needed to pass on the suspension calendar. …. An Interior staff member startled a gathering of tribal officials and Indian lobbyists yesterday morning when he announced that both Hastert and Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) planned to try to push the bill through. … 'The room was packed with D.C. lobbyists there on behalf of their tribal clients,' one lobbyist in attendance wrote in an e-mail to The Hill. 'Most are in strong opposition to the bill.'"

Seminole Tribe To Buy Hard Rock Restaurant, Casino Chain. The Wall Street Journal (12/7, Sanders, Berman) reports, "British gambling-and-leisure company Rank Group PLC said Thursday it will sell the Hard Rock Cafe restaurant-and-casino chain to the Seminole Tribe of Florida for $965 million." The Journal continues, "The Hard Rock business includes 124 Hard Rock Cafes, four Hard Rock Hotels, two Hard Rock Casino Hotels, two Hard Rock Live! concert venues, and stakes in three unbranded hotels. Rank said it would keep the Hard Rock Casino in London but under the Rank Gaming brand. … 'We have maximized the value of Hard Rock through this disposal following a thorough strategic review and competitive auction,' said Chief Executive Ian Burke said." The Journal adds, "The sale, which is subject to shareholder approval, is scheduled to be completed in March. .. The deal shows the long-term maturation of U.S. Indian tribes that have made hundreds of millions of dollars in the gambling business. From roots as operators of small bingo-hall outposts on their reservations, some have become potent entrepreneurs on a wider stage. … The deal for Hard Rock -- a 35-year-old chain based around rock-music memorabilia -- is high-visibility proof of that evolution. Hard Rock posted $70 million in operating profit on $500 million in revenue last year." The Journal notes, "The Seminoles have been a target of the Internal Revenue Service, which in the past few years has stepped up its examination of tax-free bonds used by the Seminoles and tribes in California to build casinos. The tribe issued $415 million of tax-free bonds to build the Tampa and Hollywood casinos, which the IRS deemed illegal. In October 2005, the tribe said it would issue $730 million in bonds to pay off the original tax-free bonds and consolidate debt."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Caribbean Native Pleads Guilty In New York To Drug Conspiracy. The Rochester (NY) Democrat & Chronicle (12/7, Craig) reports, "A Caribbean native whom Justice Department officials had been trying to extradite to the United States for a decade — before finally succeeding last year — pleaded guilty Wednesday to a drug conspiracy that involved a 1992 shipment of 28 pounds of cocaine seized en route to Rochester." The D&C continues, "Noel 'Zambo' Heath, who became somewhat of a folk hero to some residents in the twin-island nation of St. Kitts and Nevis during his fight against extradition, admitted in federal court here to a role in the drug trafficking conspiracy." The D&C adds, "Heath, who was once identified by the White House as an international drug kingpin, could be sentenced to between 70 and 87 months under the terms of the plea agreement. He is scheduled to be sentenced by U.S. District Judge David Larimer in April. … 'We were hopeful to get him back to his family as soon as possible,' said his attorney, Jeffrey Lichtman.In 1992 federal authorities heard Heath on a wiretap, apparently from his St. Kitts home, plotting the shipment of cocaine to Rochester. Using information gleaned from the wiretap, police pulled over a tractor-trailer on the New York Thruway near Victor and discovered the 28 pounds of cocaine, which had a street value then of about $1 million. … Federal authorities eventually identified Heath as a key player in the drug trafficking, and a federal grand jury in Rochester indicted him in 1995. Justice Department officials then initiated extradition proceedings for Heath to face criminal charges in Rochester, but he successfully staved off extradition. Sometimes Heath was aided by sympathetic political powers in St. Kitts."

Court Upholds Florida Man's Conviction In Painkiller Case. The St. Petersburg (FL) Times (12/7) reports "Even those who prosecuted and convicted Richard Paey sympathize with the wheelchair-bound man serving 25 years for drug trafficking - for obtaining the drugs he needs for his debilitating pain. Count among those sympathizers the 2nd District Court of Appeal. The problem, a majority of the court ruled Wednesday, is that they can't help Paey. They upheld his conviction and sentence by a 2-1 vote, but passed on this advice: Get the governor to commute the sentence." The Hudson man "was arrested by the Pasco County Sheriff's Office and the federal Drug Enforcement Administration in 1997 after buying more than 1,200 painkillers with fake prescriptions."

Judge Upholds California's Medical Marijuana Law. In San Diego, the AP (12/7, Hoffman) reported a state judge on Wednesday "upheld California's law permitting the use of medical marijuana for medical purposes, rejecting a lawsuit by three counties challenging the decade-old statute. The counties, led by San Diego, argued that local governments shouldn't be bound to uphold state laws that are weaker than the federal blanket ban on marijuana. … Superior Court Judge William R. Nevitt, Jr., wrote in his ruling counties would not be breaking federal law by giving out state identification cards. … The ruling affirmed a tentative judgment Nevitt issued in November."

The San Diego Union-Tribune (12/7) reports Nevitt "ruled that state law enforcement officials are not obligated to arrest and prosecute people who violate federal laws."

The North County Times (12/7) reports Nevitt, "rejected the county's argument that California's voter-approved Compassionate Use act should be pre-empted by federal law. Federal law says marijuana has no medicinal value and its use is illegal in all situations."

Local TV Coverage. XETV-TV, San Diego (12/6, 10:00 p.m.) aired, "Several counties joined San Diego in the lawsuit. It was filed after local county-officials refused to issue ID cards to medical-marijuana users. But, today, Judge William Nevitt upheld that state law. It was approved by voters in 1996.he said today's ruling does not decide if marijuana really has medical-benefits."

KUSI-TV, San Diego (12/6, 6:00 p.m.) aired, "A victory tonight for supporters of medicinal marijuana in San Diego County. A judge rejected San Diego County's [dispute over] the medical marijuana law. San Diego and two other counties sued, saying federal law supersedes the state law. The tentative ruling was issued last month."

KGTV-TV, San Diego (12/6, 6:30 p.m.) aired, "San Diego County lost a challenge to the state's medical marijuana law. They sued, arguing that [local] governments shouldn't uphold state laws that are overwritten by the federal ban on marijuana. Today a state judge ruled that counties would not be breaking federal law by giving out state marijuana I D cards."

Survey Says Nearly 1 Million Addicted To Drugs In Afghanistan. The AP (12/6) reported, "The first nationwide survey on drug use, conducted last year by the Ministry of Counter Narcotics and U.N. Office on Drugs and Crime, found nearly 1 million addicts in [Afghanistan]…including 60,000 children under age 15. Drugs of choice range from hashish, opium and heroin to pharmaceutical medicines. An estimated 5,000 children are addicted to opiates, and the remainder take cough syrup and other drugs, the survey found. The actual numbers are probably much higher, especially for children and women, the report said."

Tajikistan Cited Among Leading Transit Routes For Drugs From Afghanistan. The AP (12/7) reports Central Asia's poorest county "is also one of the world's leading transit routes for heroin, opium and other drugs from Afghanistan. … In Tajikistan, the scars still remain from a traumatic civil war that ended nine years ago. Now, new wounds are being inflicted on this mountainous nation -- from the dramatic spike in the trafficking of drugs grown in neighboring Afghanistan, smuggled north through Tajikistan en route to Russia and Europe, and increasingly consumed by Tajiks. … The UN ranked Tajikistan fifth worldwide in heroin and morphine seizures, and fourth for opium."

Former Colorado Firefighter Seeks New Trial On Weapons Charge. The Rocky Mountain News (12/6, Burnett) reported, "A former Denver firefighter convicted of selling an illegal machine gun to an undercover federal agent is requesting a new trial, saying prosecutors failed to turn over evidence that could have led to his acquittal. Stan Ford was scheduled to be sentenced Friday. But U.S. District Court Judge Robert E. Blackburn said the sentencing should be postponed until Ford's motion for a new trial is heard." The Mountain News noted, "The U.S. Attorney's office says it did provide Ford's lawyers with copies of all communications. It also disputes that the messages at issue would have been enough to acquit Ford."

More Judges Packing Heat Behind Bench. The National Law Journal (12/7, Bronstad) reports, "Despite increased security at courthouses following shootings in Chicago and Atlanta about one year ago, many judges are bringing their own guns into their courtrooms for protection." The Journal continues, "Earlier this month, a Florida judge was ordered to accept mentoring after warning a defense attorney that he was 'locked and loaded.' In May, a judicial ethics committee of the New York State Unified Court System found that it was ethical for a judge to carry a pistol into his courtroom. … In Nevada, Oklahoma and Texas, incidences of violence in the past year have prompted new laws or solidified rules allowing judges to bring guns into courtrooms. … 'Judges in our courthouse have been carrying guns almost all the time,' said Cynthia Stevens Kent, a Texas judge in the 114th District Court, where a man in a family law case killed his ex-wife and son last year on the steps of a Tyler courthouse. … 'We feel strongly about providing adequate security, but it comes down to personal responsibility. And you've got to take responsibility for your own safety,' Kent said." The Journal notes, "Security concerns were raised last year after a rape suspect grabbed a deputy's gun and killed an Atlanta judge and others. One month earlier, a litigant had killed the husband and mother of a Chicago federal judge who ruled against him. … Some states allow judges to arm themselves."

IMMIGRATION:

Fewer Illegal Immigrant Arrests Reported Along US-Mexico Border. The AP (12/7, Caldwell) reports, "The number of illegal immigrants being arrested at the U.S.-Mexico border has dropped sharply in the first two months of this fiscal year, with some Border Patrol sectors seeing a drop of up to 63 percent." The AP continues, "Arrests along the border in Texas, New Mexico, Arizona and California have dropped about 27 percent, or by nearly 43,000 illegal immigrants, since Oct. 1, compared to the same time last year, Border Patrol officials in Washington said." The AP adds, "Reports of the decrease come about a month after Border Patrol officials announced a nearly 9 percent drop in arrests from 2004 to 2005. If the downward trend continues it would mark the first sustained decrease in illegal immigrant arrests since shortly after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, said Assistant Chief Patrol Agent Xavier Rios." The AP notes, "It's nearly impossible to know whether the drop in arrests really means that fewer people are coming across the border. … T.J. Bonner, president of the union that represents the majority of agents, said agents on the ground estimate that they only catch 25 percent to 33 percent of illegal immigrants. … Border Patrol officials acknowledge that they don't know how many people make it across the border every year. But they insist that the drop in arrests, which varied widely — the San Diego Sector marked a 3 percent drop while the Yuma, Ariz., and Del Rio, Texas, sectors each showed a 63 percent dip — is a sign that recently launched border security efforts are working."

Town Threatens To Withdraw Business Licenses Of Those Who Hire Illegals. The New York Times (12/7, Hamill, 1.16M) reports from Altoona, PA, "Since June, when Hazleton, Pa., some 130 miles east of here, began debating what to do about illegal immigrants, more than 60 local governments in 21 states have followed its lead and considered new ordinances to drive them away. At least 15 have approved the measures, typically intended to punish landlords who rent to illegal immigrants and business owners who employ them." Altoona, "an old railroad town nestled in an Appalachian Mountain valley about 100 miles east of Pittsburgh, is one of those 15. It approved its ordinance, which threatens to withdraw the business licenses of employers and rental licenses of landlords who hire or rent to illegal immigrants, in October." But "it does not fit the same pattern. … If Hazleton, where the immigrant population grew sharply in just a few years, started the current trend for dealing with a surge in illegal immigrants, Altoona may be the beginning of the next wave: trying to prevent a situation from developing in the first place."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Senate Votes 95-2 To Confirm Gates As 22nd Secretary Of Defense. The confirmation of Robert Gates to succeed Donald Rumsfeld as secretary of defense was almost entirely overshadowed by coverage of the release of the Iraq Study Group report. ABC World News (12/6, story 6, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) briefly reported on the Gates confirmation, which came of a 95-2 Senate vote. Republican Sens. Jim Bunning and Rick Santorum voted against Gates, "citing his criticism of the war and his view that the U.S. should engage Iran as part of a solution" according to the AP (12/6, Flaherty), while Sens. Evan Bayh, Joseph Biden, and Elizabeth Dole did not vote. The Hill (12/7, Schor) notes the two votes against Gates.

On CNN's The Situation Room (12/6, Blitzer), Counselor to the President Dan Bartlett said, "Expect the new secretary of defense to be sworn in fairly quickly, before the end of the year." The New York Times (12/7, A24, Cloud, 1.16M) reports White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said Gates would "formally begin work on Dec. 18, more than a week after his confirmation, because he wanted to participate in fall commencement at Texas A&M University before resigning as the school's president." Fox News' The Big Story (12/6, Emanuel) also said Gates will start on the 18th.

The Los Angeles Times (12/7, Spiegel, 850K) says Gates "won over critics of the administration's handling of the war on both sides of the aisle during an adulatory confirmation hearing Tuesday." The Washington Post (12/7, A11, Tyson, 690K) reports both Republicans and Democrats "lauded Gates's frankness after a day of testimony Tuesday in which he acknowledged that the United States is not winning in Iraq, and said that historians would have to judge whether the decision to invade Iraq in March 2003 was correct. He also pledged to take a fresh approach to Iraq in which 'all options are on the table.'" USA Today (12/7, 1A, Page, Jackson, 2.27M) says President Bush's selection of Gates could suggest Bush is willing to weigh changes in Iraq policy.

The Hill (12/7, Tiron) says defense industry insiders do not expect Gates to make "any major changes in budget and policy decisions that could curtail their business, at least for now." The DOD budget for 2008 must be submitted about a month and a half after Gates takes office, and "there will be very little Gates can change regarding a process begun months ago and nearly finished, several defense insiders said. But he will come into his own after a few months and be able to influence the 2009 defense budget, lobbyists said."

Blair Agrees With Gates Assessment That Iraq War Not Being Won. BBC.com (12/6) reports British Prime Minister Tony Blair agreed with Gates' "assessment that the war in Iraq is not being won. Asked by Tory leader David Cameron at prime minister's questions if he agreed with Robert Gates' assessment of the war, Mr Blair said: 'Of course.'"

Senate To Consider Vietnam Trade, Tax Bill. The AP (12/7, Abrams) reports, "In the final hours of Republican rule, the Senate put forward an all-purpose bill covering everything from normalized trade with Vietnam and tax breaks for millions of taxpayers to an expansion of offshore oil drilling. The House, while preparing its own tax and trade agenda, gave conservatives perhaps their last chance for a while to vote on an abortion bill. It was defeated." As of late last night, "House and Senate negotiators were still struggling to come up with a common approach to the tax and trade package." Senate Finance Committee leaders "said they were bringing to the floor as early as Wednesday the session-ending package that would renew expired or expiring tax breaks for businesses and middle income individuals and trade items affecting economic relations with Vietnam, Haiti, Africa and Andean nations." The tax portion, said Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley, gives "continued tax relief to families paying college, teachers buying classroom supplies and producers of clean energy from sources such as wind." The House "put off until Thursday any vote on its Vietnam trade bill as lawmakers pondered whether to combine it with the tax break measure. … It remained uncertain whether the House and Senate could come together on a package that would not be so laden with expensive programs that it becomes unpassable."

The Washington Post (1/27, D1, Montgomery, 690K) says "several senators yesterday raised objections to the bill, blocking its path to a full vote in the Senate and raising alarm among business lobbyists concerned about the fate of the largest of the tax breaks, a credit for research and development worth $7.5 billion in this fiscal year alone." Meanwhile, "with time running out on the 109th Congress, Senate negotiators were still trying to resolve differences with the House, which must also approve the package." The Post adds, "Business organizations and their members were waging a fierce lobbying campaign on behalf of the research credit, urging lawmakers to prevent it from expiring. California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) and Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano (D) sent letters adding their support, and former Michigan governor John Engler, now president of the National Association of Manufacturers, warned lawmakers that 'failure is not an option.' As of late yesterday, business lobbyists remained hopeful that the research credit would be preserved."

House GOP Fails To Pass Abortion Bill. The Los Angeles Times (12/7, Levey, 850K) reports, "House Republicans opposed to abortion rights failed Wednesday in their bid to pass a controversial measure that would have required women seeking abortions to be informed that some fetuses feel pain." Although "it was clear the bill would have stalled in the Senate, the abortion opponents hoped the House vote would provide a symbolic victory before control of Capitol Hill passes to Democrats in January. Instead, the vote dealt social conservatives a final setback in a two-year congressional session that has not produced a major piece of antiabortion legislation." The bill received "majority support, 250 to 162," but "that fell short of the two-thirds margin required under rules that limited debate." The New York Times (12/7, Hulse, 1.16M) notes "proponents of the measure said that they do not expect the new Democratic majority, whose leadership strongly supports abortion rights, to bring up such measures, and that they will press the leadership to allow a second vote under regular rules." But "Republican officials said they had no plans to revisit the issue."

Khalilzad, Williamson Emerge As Top Candidates For UN Post. The AP (12/7, Lederer) reports that speculation on a new US ambassador to the United Nations to succeed John Bolton is focusing on US Ambassador in Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad and a former deputy ambassador at the UN, Richard Williamson. However, there "also are a number of other Republicans and even some Democrats whose names have been floated among diplomats at UN headquarters," including Rep. Jim Leach and Undersecretaries of state Nicholas Burns and Paula Dobriansky. Among the Democratic candidate reportedly being considered are former senators George Mitchell and Sam Nunn.

Bush's DOD IG Nominee Withdraws. The AP (12/6, Solomon) reports David Laufman, President Bush's nominee for Defense Department inspector general, "has withdrawn from consideration." He "sent Bush a letter last week withdrawing from consideration after the Senate Armed Services Committee declined to hold a vote on his nomination before Congress recessed this year." Incoming chairman Carl Levin "has raised concerns about Laufman's nomination. The White House formally withdrew Laufman's name on Wednesday."

Warner Leaving Armed Services Chair But May Seek Reelection. The Norfolk Virginian-Pilot (12/7, Eisman) reports that though Sen. John Warner is stepping down as chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, he "told reporters he's 'leaning in favor' of seeking re-election in 2008." His comments "came as he marshaled bipartisan Senate support for President Bush's nomination of Robert Gates to be secretary of defense and pleaded for more bipartisanship in the debate over the future of America's role in Iraq."

High Court's Reduced Docket Noted. The New York Times (12/7, Greenhouse, 1.16M) reports, "On the Supreme Court's color-coded master calendar, which was distributed months before the term began on the first Monday in October, Dec. 6 is marked in red to signify a day when the justices are scheduled to be on the bench, hearing arguments. The courtroom, however, was empty on Wednesday, and for a simple reason: The court was out of cases. The question is, where have all the cases gone? … The reasons for the decline all grow out of forces building for decades. The federal government has been losing fewer cases in the lower courts and so has less reason to appeal. As Congress enacts fewer laws, the justices have fewer statutes to interpret. And justices who think they might end up on the losing side of an important case might vote not to take it." The Times adds, "In a divided court, in a divided country, the court's reduced role is perhaps not surprising, nor is it necessarily a bad thing. … In private conversations, the justices themselves insist that nothing so profound is going on, but rather seem mystified at what they perceive as a paucity of cases that meet the court's standard criteria. The most important of those criteria is whether a case raises a question that has produced conflicting decisions among the lower federal courts."

Election Decimated Ranks Of GOP Moderates. The Washington Post (12/7, A29, Goldfarb, 690K) reports, "Iowa Rep. Jim Leach (R) seemed a natural to weather voters' antiwar sentiment this fall. His independent streak and moderate views had engendered the allegiance of his Democratic-leaning district for the past 30 years, and he broke with his party and President Bush in October 2002 by voting against the Iraq war. Yet on Election Day, voters in Iowa's 2nd Congressional District ousted him in favor of an untested Democrat, a college professor -- a testament to the vulnerable position that Republican moderates found themselves in all year. … With the defeat of Leach and several other Republican moderates Nov. 7, the Democrats' victory in the midterm election accelerates a three-decade-old pattern of declining moderate influence and rising conservative dominance in the Republican Party. By one measure, the GOP is more ideologically homogenous now than it has been in modern history. The waning moderate wing must find its place when the Democratic majority takes over in January." The Post adds, "Eight of the House's 20 most moderate Republicans lost their seats: Rob Simmons and Nancy L. Johnson (Conn.); Jeb Bradley and Charles Bass (N.H.); Michael G. Fitzpatrick and Curt Weldon (Pa.); Sue W. Kelly (N.Y.); and Leach. Also, moderate GOP Rep. Sherwood L. Boehlert (N.Y.), is retiring, and he will be replaced by Democrat Michael A. Arcuri, the Oneida County district attorney." On the Senate side, "the defeat of Lincoln D. Chafee (R-R.I.), a critic of the war who declined to vote for Bush's reelection in 2004, underscored the same trend."

Snowe Seeking Overhaul Of Centrist Coalition. Roll Call (12/7, Pierce) reports, "Sen. Olympia Snowe (R-Maine) quietly is laying the groundwork to overhaul the Senate Centrist Coalition into a regular bipartisan working group that eschews ideological labels." Snowe, who "co-chairs the coalition with Sen. Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.)," said "she wants to change the name of the group and hopes to invite a broader cross-section of the Senate to attend breakfasts or lunches, potentially on a weekly basis, that are designed to foster bipartisanship in the new Congress." Snowe "noted that the meetings need not be focused on a particular issue, but should merely offer a place to go for building relationships and friendships. Still, she cautioned that she is continuing to vet her ideas with Lieberman and others, and that nothing has been decided yet."

Blue Dogs Pledge To Seek Bipartisan Consensus. The Hill (12/7, Joseph) reports, "In a luncheon yesterday, members of the fiscally centrist Democratic Blue Dog Coalition promised to build bipartisan consensus to establish "fiscal sanity" and attempt to improve government accountability, transparency and oversight. 'This country is desperate for the middle, desperate for common-sense solutions,' said Rep. John Tanner (D-Tenn.)." President Bush "has invited members of the centrist Blue Dog and New Democrat coalitions to the White House on Friday to discuss areas 'of mutual cooperation,' in the words of one Democratic aid."

Lott Win Made Possible By Defections Of Collins, Warner. The Hill (12/7, Bolton) reports, "Sen. Trent Lott's (R-Miss.) stunning return to the Senate leadership was made possible by the last-minute defections of Sens. John Warner (R-Va.) and Susan Collins (R-Maine) from Sen. Lamar Alexander's (R-Tenn.) rival campaign for Republican whip. Ironically, four years earlier, Warner and Collins helped drive Lott from leadership by giving his rivals support at crucial moments during the controversy over his comments at the 100th birthday party of the late Sen. Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.)."

Lott Selects His Team. Roll Call (12/7, Billings) reports Lott "has opted to dramatically cut the size of the GOP vote-counting team in the next Congress, assembling a group of eight loyalists, led by South Dakota Sen. John Thune, to aid in the party's floor efforts. Insiders suggested the size and membership of the whip team could be a sign that Lott is likely to rely heavily on his own experience and floor know-how to keep his party unified in the 110th

Congress." In addition to Thune, "who will serve as Chief Deputy Minority Whip, Lott has brought on GOP Sens. Richard Burr (N.C.), Larry Craig (Idaho), Norm Coleman (Minn.), James Inhofe (Okla.), Olympia Snowe (Maine), John Sununu (N.H.) and David Vitter (La.) to round out his team. Thune, Burr, Vitter, Coleman and Sununu are in their first terms."

Hensarling Wins Race For RSC Post. The Hill (12/7, O'Connor) reports, "Rep. Jeb Hensarling (R-Texas) triumphed yesterday in his bid to chair the conservative Republican Study Committee during the 110th Congress, beating Rep. Todd Tiahrt (R-Kan.) 57-42." Hensarling, "an outspoken second-term conservative who has faced off with Republican leaders on budget and spending issues, won the chairmanship despite Tiahrt's nomination by the group's three remaining founders."

Kilpatrick To Head Black Caucus. The AP (12/7, Ben Evans) reports, "The Congressional Black Caucus on Wednesday tapped Rep. Carolyn Cheeks Kilpatrick as its chairwoman for the next two years, when black lawmakers will wield more power in Congress than ever." Kilpatrick , "a former school teacher and the mother of Detroit Mayor Kwame Kilpatrick, was chosen unanimously. She succeeds Rep. Mel Watt, D-N.C."

Democrats Gather Lobbyists' Donations Following Midterm Wins. The Wall Street Journal (12/7, A4, Cummings, 2.04M) reports, "Democrats may be promising a clampdown on lobbyist freebies once they take control of Congress. But ahead of that push, party leaders are collecting lobbyists' checks, while Democratic staffers angle for jobs inside their well-appointed offices. Verizon Communications Inc. earlier this week sponsored a reception for newly elected Missouri Sen. Claire McCaskill. Illinois Democratic Rep. Melissa Bean was the beneficiary of a Tuesday night fund-raiser in the new Capitol Hill offices of the US Chamber of Commerce." The Journal notes, "Some companies and lobbyists began shifting more donations to Democrats before Election Day. But Political Money Line, an organization that tracks political giving, reported last month that federal political action committees -- the kitties used by corporations and organizations to make donations -- held back $280 million in the final days of the midterm races. That is money now being tapped to welcome the old and new Democratic leaders back to town."

Morris Suggests Ethics Reforms. Dick Morris writes in The Hill (12/7), "Just in case the incoming Democratic majority is serious about real ethics reform, here are a few ideas for its members to consider: Ban spousal and family employment by campaign committees and PACs. … Those who have hired spouses and family members include: Reps. Richard Pombo (R-Calif.), wife and two brothers; Zoe Lofgren (D-Calif.), husband's law firm; Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.), wife and step-daughter; John Doolittle (R-Calif.), wife; Ralph Hall (R-Texas), daughter-in-law; Pete Stark (D-Calif.), wife; Buck McKeon (R-Calif.), wife; Ron Lewis (R-Ky.), wife; Bart Stupak (D-Mich.), wife; Jim Costa (D-Calif.), cousin; Dana Rohrabacher (R-Calif.), wife; Dave Reichert (R-Wash.), nephew; Chris Cannon (R-Utah), three daughters; Lincoln Davis (D-Tenn.), sister-in-law and daughter; Louie Gohmert (R-Texas), wife; Tim Bishop (D-N.Y.), daughter; Bob Filner (D-Calif.), wife; J.D. Hayworth (R-Ariz.), wife; Bob Inglis (R-S.C.), wife; Elton Gallegly (R-Calif.), wife; Sherwood Boehlert (R-N.Y.), wife; John Sweeney (R-N.Y.), wife; Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.), wife; Ed Pastor (D-Ariz.), nephew; John Shadegg (R-Ariz.), son; and Howard Berman (D-Calif.), brother Michael's political consulting firm; Sens. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.), son; and Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.), son and daughter during vice presidential race; and ex-Reps. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), wife; and Tom DeLay (R-Texas), wife and daughter." Other proposals: "Ban immediate family members of senators or congressmen from lobbying Congress. … Restore presidential power to line-item veto earmarks in appropriations bills and reverse the anti-impoundment legislation passed during the Nixon administration. … Require lobbyists to disclose the specific bills that they are lobbying for or against on the lobbying registration forms. Ban all privately paid travel by members, including use of corporate jets. … Require both chambers to work a full week, instead of the two- to three-day schedule they've had for the past few years."

WPost Comments On House's New Monday To Friday Schedule. The Washington Post (12/7, 690K) editorializes, "When Democrats take over the House next year, the regular workweek will stretch to a backbreaking five days -- up from the now-customary Tuesday-through-Thursday arrangement. Members of the House and Senate -- no doubt reeling from the two weeks they've worked since the election -- will have a mere four weeks off after they leave town Friday." The Post adds, "Hard to believe, but the new leadership actually expects them to come to work on Jan. 4 rather than enjoy the usual elongated holiday break as they wait around for the president to deliver his State of the Union address in late January. In the Senate, the weeklong March break is being eliminated and the two-week April vacation cut in half. This kind of punishing schedule is enough to unite lawmakers of both parties, in both chambers, in a chorus of behind-the-scenes bipartisan grumbling. What, us work?"

Frank Derails Bill Giving Thatcher Congressional Gold Medal. Roll Call (12/7, Akers) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column, "What a kick in the pants, or the skirt, as the case may be, to former British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher. A revised floor schedule for Wednesday was sent out advising, 'H.R. 6136 -- Margaret Thatcher Congressional Gold Medal Act HAS BEEN PULLED.'" Roll Call adds "a GOP leadership source told HOH that the reason the bill was pulled was because Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.) objected to it." Frank "explained to HOH in a telephone chat that he opposed giving Thatcher a gold medal because the bill 'hadn't gone through the regular rules' procedure and, frankly, it 'was being used by Republicans for partisan purposes. She was a very conservative person.'"

House Denounces French City For Naming Street After Convicted US Murderer. The AP (12/7, Hefling) reports, "The House passed a resolution Wednesday denouncing a French city for naming a street in honor of Mumia Abu-Jamal, who was sentenced to death for shooting a Philadelphia police officer 25 years ago this month. 'We must stand together as one and send a strong message to the world that cop-killers deserve to be punished, not to be celebrated,' said Rep. Mike Fitzpatrick, a Philadelphia-area congressman who authored the resolution." The vote "came a few days shy of the 25th anniversary of the shooting of Daniel Faulkner, a 25-year-old officer shot after he pulled over Abu-Jamal's brother on Dec. 9, 1981."

Performance Of Medicare Drug Program Said To Defy Critics. David Wessel writes in the Wall Street Journal's (12/7, A2) "Capital" column, "The Medicare prescription-drug benefit…was panned by critics when it was in previews. Now, after a year's run, the elderly audience seems to be applauding, public and private actors are clicking better in the very complex production, and costs are below initial estimates." Although the program's launch was "marred" with problems, critics' "worst fears haven't materialized. That fact is often overshadowed by continuing partisan bickering over the program's design and by persistent public suspicion of drug makers, insurers and pharmaceutical-benefit managers." Now, "Democrats argue the program could be even cheaper if the government, rather than private insurance plans, used its clout to negotiate with drug makers." But "they may have trouble delivering: The official congressional scorekeepers aren't persuaded that the government would actually save money." And "unless Democrats can take credit for saving money, it will be hard to make the benefit more generous."

WSJournal Says NASA Should Offer Prize For Moon Base, Instead Of Building It. The Wall Street Journal (12/7, A18, 2.04M) editoriallizes, "NASA announced this week that it plans to establish a permanent moon base by 2024, a mere generation from now." The Journal adds, "As good as this sounds, we're left to wonder why NASA shouldn't go further. It did not release a budget estimate for the project -- perhaps because the experience with the space station, which was supposed to cost $40 billion but will now likely go above $100 billion, was chastening. But whatever the estimate is, here's a counteroffer. Say NASA believes it can build a permanent moonbase for $100 billion in today's dollars. Why not take half of that and offer it as a bounty to the first private company to build the station and man it. A prize in the neighborhood of $50 billion is bound to attract plenty of interest -- and that number is probably much less than a realistic guess of what it would cost NASA in the end. The taxpayer would save 50% of NASA's cost to build the base, and the result would be much more likely to be attractive to the private interests that NASA wants to draw to the project."

Gasoline Price Increases Likely To Continue Until Christmas. USA Today (12/6, Hagenbaugh, 2.27M) reports, "The recent rise in gasoline prices will likely continue until Christmas, making the trip home for the holidays more costly than at Thanksgiving. The nationwide average retail price of a gallon of regular gasoline has risen 8 cents since the end of October." USA Today adds, "On Monday, the average price was $2.297 a gallon, the highest in two months and 15 cents higher than a year ago ... . A number of analysts, including those at Wachovia and Moody's Economy.com, say prices will likely inch higher through December." USA Today points to rising oil prices, declining gasoline inventories, and increased demand as reasons for higher pump prices.

Survey Finds Affordable Housing Has Dwindled. USA Today (12/7, 7A, El Nasser, 2.27M) reports, "The supply of affordable housing continued to dwindle this year despite weakening home prices, according to one-third of local housing officials who responded to a survey by the National League of Cities. Three-fourths of those surveyed say housing costs are significantly limiting home ownership opportunities for lower-income residents and young families. The survey was sent to officials in 1,167 cities." USA Today adds, "Housing prices in many areas skyrocketed in recent years as interest rates dropped. Demand fueled teardowns and rehabilitation of older homes. That took cheaper housing off the market."

Stocks Down Yesterday. NBC Nightly News (12/6, story 9, 0:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street today, investors pulled back a bit. The Dow was down more than 22 points [to close at 12,309.26]. NASDAQ lost 6 and a half points [to close at 2,445.86] on the day." The Wall Street

Journal (12/7, C1, McKay, 2.04M) reports "the broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index slipped 0.1%, or 1.86 points, to 1412.90, up 13% on the year."

Investors Face Choices When Class-Actions Die. The Wall Street Journal (12/7, D1, Koppel, Davies) reports, "Is there life after your class-action lawsuit dies? … A ruling earlier this week undercut a class action against 55 Wall Street investment banks, and dashed hopes for small investors who bought hot stocks that went public during the dot-com bubble and then plummeted as it burst." The Journal continues, "The decision likely means that thousands of investors would have to file individual suits to try to recover billions lawyers claim they lost by investing in initial public offerings, mostly of technology companies, in the late 1990s and 2000." The Journal adds, "Class-action suits let individuals band together to pursue big defendants with more power than they could on their own. But the Second U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New York ruled that this case in its current form couldn't proceed as a class action, in part because plaintiffs' individual claims were not sufficiently similar to be grouped together. … Attorneys say it will be difficult, if not impossible, for small investors to find lawyers who will pursue such suits for them on an individual basis. Claims, they estimate, would need to be worth anywhere from a hundred thousand to several million dollars to make pursuing them worth a lawyer's time. Christine Hurt, a professor at the University of Illinois College of Law who has written about the IPO case, estimates that the average retail plaintiff suffered losses of less than $20,000. … Meanwhile, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce says the appeals-court decision was a major victory for any businesses that face dubious class-action claims." The Journal notes, "The decision marks the latest win for institutions and individuals fighting regulatory and legal action in the wake of massive stock-market losses earlier in this decade. … Still, investors have won some victories against Wall Street banks in bubble-era disputes."

Federal Judge Rules Virginia, Not Individuals, Can Sue Dairy Industry. The Washington Post (12/7, B07, Markon) reports, "Catherine Holmes saw the ads for the so-called 'dairy diet' and thought it would be a tasty way to lose a few pounds. After all, she loves buttermilk, yogurt and cheese. … Instead, the Arlington woman says, she gained three pounds on the diet, which dairy companies have spent hundreds of millions of dollars promoting. She sued the industry. … But a federal judge has ruled that under Virginia law, Holmes and other people can't take on the industry in court -- only a government entity such as the Virginia attorney general's office can. The decision last week by U.S. District Judge Leonie M. Brinkema in Alexandria threw out the lawsuit Holmes filed last year." The Post continues, "In her ruling last Thursday, Brinkema said Virginia consumer protection law allows people to seek monetary damages but not a broad injunction regulating an industry. She did not address the science of the debate, writing that such federal agencies as the Food and Drug Administration and the Federal Trade Commission are better equipped to do so. … An attorney for Holmes vowed yesterday to appeal and file a similar lawsuit in a more consumer-friendly state. 'We're very disappointed,' said Dan Kinburn, general counsel for the Physicians Committee for Responsible Medicine, which filed the Virginia case on Holmes's behalf. 'This will encourage and assist the dairy industry in making this country fatter and sicker.'" The Post notes, "Dairy industry representatives said the ruling validated their view that consuming dairy products helps with weight loss when coupled with calorie restriction and exercise. They vowed to continue the advertising campaign. … Underlying the debate is growing concern nationally about increasing obesity among children. Researchers have split over the role of dairy products in the trend; some studies have found that children who drink too much milk are prone to becoming overweight, and others have found a weight-loss benefit from drinking milk."

Democratic Governors Meet In Washington. The AP (12/7, Tanner) reports, "With election victories behind them, Democratic governors gathered Wednesday to celebrate their first majority in 12 years, talk political strategy and share notes on the issues driving voters back at home. Governor after governor at their winter meeting turned to the backbone of modern Democratic politics -- education, health care and jobs, with many also promising a concerted effort to tackle energy policy." Democrats "emerged from Election Day with a 28-22 majority, reversing the current GOP majority and taking six seats from GOP control. Republicans had held a majority since the 1994 elections."

DCCC Increasingly Confident About Texas Runoff. Roll Call (12/7, Drucker) reports, "Although they were initially hesitant to lend a hand, national Democrats have since gone all out to aid former Rep. Ciro Rodriguez (D) as he seeks to oust Rep. Henry Bonilla (R) in Texas' 23rd district runoff set for Tuesday. With the Republican National Committee and the National Republican Congressional Committee mostly absent from Bonilla's better-funded campaign, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee has plunked down nearly $300,000 since Nov. 7 in independent expenditure advertising, hoping that Rodriguez can add to the party's House-takeover total." The Democrats' "confidence is an outgrowth of the DCCC's heavy strategic involvement in the Rodriguez campaign, from the ground up, as well as the 23rd district's new boundaries that were drawn over the summer courtesy of a Supreme Court decision mandating that the seat be brought into compliance with the Voting Rights Act." But "the Bonilla campaign isn't worried. … Bonilla campaign spokesman Phil Ricks on Wednesday claimed a strong volunteer effort and touted the help the Congressman is receiving from the state GOP. Ricks sounded particularly pleased with a new television ad released this week that features retired FBI agent Al Ortiz accusing Rodriguez of sympathizing with "Islamic Radicals.""

Jefferson Hits Opponent On Social Issues. Roll Call (12/7, Whittington) reports, "The contest to decide who will represent hurricane-ravaged New Orleans and Louisiana's 2nd district will be decided Saturday, as the clock winds down on the increasingly bitter runoff fight between Rep. William Jefferson (D) and state Rep. Karen Carter (D)." Jefferson "is the subject of an ongoing federal bribery investigation, although no formal charges have been filed and the eight-term Congressman denies any wrongdoing." The congressman "has turned to social issues in an effort to paint Carter as out of touch with the values of the largely black electorate. … In one of his latest TV ads, Jefferson informs voters that Carter has voted in favor of same-sex marriage and late-term abortions and against making human cloning a crime."

Allen Considers Challenge To Collins In 2008. Roll Call (12/7, Duran) reports, "Rep. Tom Allen (D-Maine) said Wednesday that he is 'seriously considering' running for Senate in 2008, and political watchers in the Pine Tree State say he looks and acts like someone preparing for a Senate bid." Allen "raised more than $930,000 in the previous cycle but spent only about half of it dispensing with two challengers on his way to securing a sixth term with 61 percent of the vote." Allen "presumably would square off with the state's junior Senator, Susan Collins (R), who has said she intends to seek a third term."

Presidential Race Off To Record Start. Roll Call (12/7, Kane) reports, "Shattering the pace of any previous presidential campaign, a half-dozen White House candidates already have leapt out of the gates for 2008, either formally signaling their entry into what is shaping up to be a packed field or filing paperwork freeing them to begin fundraising. … With fundraising expectations higher than ever and the caucus and primary schedule so compacted in early 2008, the candidates, former candidates, and current and former campaign aides see nothing unusual about so many declarations for a general election that's still almost two years away." However, in the 2004 presidential race, "the first candidates to open campaign committees were former Vermont Gov. Howard Dean (D), who did so in May 2002, and" Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry (D), "who opened his fundraising operation just after Thanksgiving 2002. Neither man made their formal announcement until 2003. In the 2000 campaign, former Sen. Bill Bradley (D-N.J.) was the only candidate to open a campaign committee in 1998 -- on Dec. 4, 1998. The eventual winner, then-Texas Gov. George Bush (R), didn't open a campaign committee until March 8, 1999." Among those who have already formed an exploratory committee or a formal presidential committee: Arizona Sen. John McCain (R), Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback (R), ex-New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani (R), Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh (D) and Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack (D).

Rothenberg Says Great "Personal Story" Not Critical For Candidates. In a column titled, "Do '08 Presidential Contenders Need a Great Story?" Stuart Rothenberg writes in Roll Call (12/7), "Many presidential hopefuls have something in their life stories that can paint as a personal test or a hurdle that they overcome. The old 'born in a log cabin' chestnut is about as old as the country." However, "let's not go overboard about the value of a personal story. … A candidate's 'story' may get voters' attention, but a story is by its very nature backward-looking, while presidential contests are about the future. Ultimately, a candidate must offer more compelling reasons than a résumé to justify why he or she deserves to be nominated and elected." Rothenberg adds, "What matters most to voters in selecting a nominee for the White House? Lots of things, of course, but the most important question is whether, after months of campaigning, enough primary voters and caucus attendees in the early states think that a particular hopeful has passed the smell test. … Having an interesting story to tell is nice, but starting off with real advantages is a whole lot better."

Obama Says "You Don't Run For Vice President." On CNN's The Situation Room (12/6), Wolf Blitzer asked Sen. Barack Obama, "Do you want to be president or you want to be vice president?" Obama: "Well, you don't run for vice president." Blitzer: "So what does that mean? You want to be -- you want run for president?" Obama: "I answered the question, Wolf. I've got to go vote."

Meyerson Says GOP "Too Southern" To Win Anywhere Else. Harold Meyerson writes in the Washington Post (12/7, A31, 690K), "You've seen the numbers and understand that America is growing steadily less white. You try to push your party, the Grand Old Party, ahead of this curve by taking a tolerant stance on immigration and making common cause with some black churches. Then you go and blow it all in a desperate attempt to turn out your base by demonizing immigrants and running racist ads against Harold Ford. On Election Day, black support for Democrats remains high; Hispanic support for Democrats surges. So what do you do next? What else? Elect Trent Lott your deputy leader in the Senate. Sure locks in the support of any stray voters who went for Strom in '48." Meyerson adds, "In case you haven't noticed, a fundamental axiom of modern American politics has been altered in recent weeks. For four decades, it's been the Democrats who've had a Southern problem. Couldn't get any votes for their presidential candidates there; couldn't elect any senators, then any House members, then any dogcatchers. They still can't, but the Southern problem, it turns out, is really the Republicans'. They've become too Southern -- too suffused with the knee-jerk militaristic, anti-scientific, dogmatically religious, and culturally, sexually and racially phobic attitudes of Dixie -- to win friends and influence elections outside the South."

Egos Could Test Relations Of Ascending New York Democrats. The New York Times (12/7, Healy, 1.16M) leads with the "big" egos of New York politicians, like Sens. Clinton and Schumer, Gov.-elect Eliot Spitzer, Andrew Cuomo and Rep. Charles Rangel, whose respective "ascensions" to higher ranks will likely "test" their relationships. The Times discusses Spitzer's visit with the delegation that was marked by joking and "back-slapping." The article also discusses the state of relations between Clinton, Schumer and Spitzer.

Mary Cheney's Pregnancy Sparks Gay Marriage Debate. CNN's The Situation Room (12/6, Blitzer) reported, "The Vice President's office confirms his openly gay daughter, Mary Cheney, is pregnant. Dick Cheney and his wife, Lynne, are said to be looking forward to the birth with 'eager anticipation.' That's a direct quote. Mary Cheney is 37 years old, and has been with her partner, Heather Poe, for 15 years. The Vice President's spokeswoman would not discuss the circumstances of Mary Cheney's pregnancy." Later in the program, CNN (Snow) reported, "That arrival is already sparking widespread interest especially among gay rights advocates. … Will the Vice President's new grandchild soften conservatives' staunch opposition to gay marriage? At least one conservative says it won't make a difference." Robert Knight of the Culture and Media Institute: "Mary Cheney and her personal life shouldn't be the driving force behind public policy." Still later, Blitzer added that "Concerned Women for America put out a statement calling Mary Cheney, and I'm quoting now, 'The face of the tragic and burgeoning trend of women who don't want a father in the picture.'"

ABC World News (12/6, story 9, 0:35, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The pregnancy is causing some awkwardness for the White House. President Bush has opposed gay marriage and gay adoption. The Vice President's Office said he and Mrs. Cheney are eagerly awaiting the birth of their new grandchild."

The New York Times (12/7, Rutenberg, 1.16M) reports, "The announcement of the pregnancy…and Ms. Cheney's future status as a same-sex parent, prompted new debate over the administration's opposition to gay marriage. Family Pride, a gay rights group, noted that Ms. Cheney's home state, Virginia, does not recognize same-sex civil unions or marriages." In 2004, "Ms. Cheney worked on the Bush-Cheney re-election campaign, which won in part because of the so-called values voters who were drawn to the polls by ballot measures seeking to ban same-sex marriage."

The Washington Post's "Reliable Source" column (12/7, C2, Argetsinger, Roberts), which broke the story yesterday, says this morning "the circumstances of the pregnancy are super-secret." The Post adds, "What happens if they split up? Unless state law changes, Cheney could prevent Poe from any visitation or custody; conversely, Poe could walk away without providing child support. Can Poe sign school report cards? Depends on the school. Technically, only Cheney would be authorized to fill out all those school forms."

Conservative Jews To Allow Gay Rabbis, Same-Sex Unions. The New York Times (12/7, Goodstein, 1.16M) reports, "The highest legal body in Conservative Judaism, the centrist movement in worldwide Jewry, voted yesterday to allow the ordination of gay rabbis and the celebration of same-sex commitment ceremonies. The decision, which followed years of debate, was denounced by traditionalists in the movement as an indication that Conservative Judaism had abandoned its commitment to adhere to Jewish law, but celebrated by others as a long-awaited move toward full equality for gay people." But "in a reflection of the divisions in the movement, the 25 rabbis on the law committee passed three conflicting legal opinions -- one in favor of gay rabbis and unions, and two against. In doing so, the committee left it up to individual synagogues to decide whether to accept or reject gay rabbis and commitment ceremonies, saying that either course is justified according to Jewish law." The Washington Post (12/7, A17, Cooperman, 690K) also reports the story.

industrial north side of Miami or, more often these days, from the comfort of his home office in the lush suburb of Pinecrest." The Times adds, "For 15 years, Mr. Aruca, founder of the first American company to run charter flights to Cuba, has doubled as on-air apologist for a man whom the vast majority of Cuban-Americans in Miami consider a despicable and murderous dictator."

Kondracke Sees Hope For Consensus On Some Health Care Issues. Morton Kondracke writes in Roll Call (12/7), "Partisan wrangling over health care could be as raucous in the new Congress as the sparring over Iraq, but in the longer run, there's reason to hope for consensus. The Bush administration and the new Democratic Congress almost certainly will be at odds over the Medicare prescription drug program, stem-cell research and funding for the State Children's Health Insurance Program." The Administration "will get nowhere -- once again -- if it proposes medical malpractice award ceilings to a Congress in which the trial lawyer lobby has gained influence. And Democrats detest health savings accounts, the GOP device to make individuals responsible for controlling health care costs." But "it's possible -- not likely, but possible -- that an agreement could be reached to expand children's health coverage." It is "also possible that Congress could help accelerate impressive Bush administration initiatives on 'value-driven' health care -- based on computerizing all medical records and providing accurate data on treatment outcomes -- and 'pay-for-performance' medicine." Kondracke adds, "A recent Gallup Poll showed that 71 percent of Americans think that US health care either has 'major problems' or is in 'a state of crisis.' And 69 percent think it's up to the federal government to fix it. That's a mandate."

Assistant Secretary Of State Says US Provided Pyongyang With Aid Details. The AP (12/7, Gedda) reports in recent discussions with North Korean officials Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill "offered specific details on the kind of economic and energy assistance Pyongyang would receive in exchange for dismantling its nuclear weapons facilities," a State Department official said Wednesday. Hill said last week the next round of six party talks "could be held in mid-December but the department official who spoke Wednesday, while not ruling out that time frame, raised the possibility of an early January meeting."

Meanwhile, AFP (12/7) reports former Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi is "weighing a third visit to North Korea to persuade the communist regime to give up its nuclear ambitions," according to reports from Japan's NHK broadcaster. Koizumi was quoted as saying, "I want to realize the denuclearization of the Korean Peninsula, which is an absolute must, although I don't interfere with Prime Minister (Shinzo) Abe's policy management."

India Nuclear Bill Stalls In House. The AP (12/7, Klug) reports legislation to allow US shipment of civilian nuclear fuel to India has "bogged down as lawmakers try to reconcile differences in the waning days of the congressional session." Ohio Rep. John Boehner "stalled a preliminary settlement on the text after an agreement was reached Wednesday morning," according to congressional aides. The aides said Boehner "appeared to be interested in attaching unrelated legislation, though they did not know what that might be." However, the majority leader's office "denied that he was holding up the bill and said talks were under way." Negotiations were expected to resume Thursday.

UN Seeks $450 Million In Aid For Palestinians. The AP (12/7, Nessman) reports UN aid groups are asking for "a record $450 million to staunch a deepening Palestinian humanitarian crisis, saying Wednesday that international sanctions and Israeli limits on Gaza exports have devastated the Palestinian economy." Despite "that gloomy assessment," a top minister in the Palestinian government offered "a rare upbeat economic picture, saying increased aid from Arab countries had allowed the government to stay afloat. But independent economists and analysts said the government was still deep in crisis." The UN is expected to officially launch its appeal Thursday, but The AP obtained an advance copy of the report.

Israel Says Abducted Soldiers Were Injured. The New York Times (12/7, Kraft, 1.16M) reports that two Israeli Army reservists whose capture "set off Israel's war with Hezbollah last summer" were "seriously wounded in the attack," an Israeli military report that emerged on Wednesday was quoted as saying. The information about the two reservists, "along with recent comments by Prime Minister Ehud Olmert that he wanted proof that the two soldiers were alive before making any decision on an exchange," has "raised speculation here that the two could be dead," the Times notes.

New Israeli Official Outlines Iran Agenda Ahead Of US Visit. The New York Times (12/7, Myre, 1.16M) reports Israel's new minister for strategic affairs, Avigdor Lieberman, is charged with the country's strategy on Iran. Lieberman, who is making his first visit to the US Thursday, will meet with American officials, including Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. In an interview on the eve of his trip, he said, "Our first task is to convince Western countries to adopt a tough approach to the Iranian problem," which he called "the biggest threat facing the Jewish people since the Second World War." However, he added, "We must also be prepared to deal alone with this problem." To date, Israel's policy is "to remain relatively low-key and to work with the United States and Europe in search of a way to halt or contain Iran's nuclear program," but Lieberman had made it "clear he has no faith in the diplomatic efforts."

Carter Aide Resigns Over Book Dispute. The New York Times (12/7, A35, Goodman, Bosman, 1.16M) reports that an adviser to former President Jimmy Carter and onetime executive director of the Carter Center has "publicly parted ways with his former boss, citing concerns with the accuracy and integrity of Mr. Carter's latest book, 'Palestine: Peace Not Apartheid.'" In a two-page letter explaining his action, Kenneth W. Stein called the book "replete with factual errors, copied materials not cited, superficialities, glaring omissions and simply invented segments." The Times says Stein's criticism is "the latest in a growing chorus of academics who have taken issue with the book, including Alan M. Dershowitz, professor of law at Harvard, who called the book 'ahistorical,' and David Makovsky, director of the Project on the Middle East Process at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy."

In an article about Stein's resignation, the Washington Post (12/7, A4, Deyoung, 690K) notes that the book as "quickly became a bestseller," and during an appearance Sunday on NBC's "Meet the Press," Carter said, "If it provokes debate and assessment and disputes and arguments and maybe some action in the Middle East to get the peace process, which is now completely absent or dormant, rejuvenated, and brings peace ultimately to Israel, that's what I want."

Paulson Seeks To Temper Expectations Ahead Of China Visit. The Wall Street Journal (12/7, A6, Solomon, 2.04M) reports that as Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson prepares to lead a delegation to China, he is "seeking to temper the expectations of lawmakers and business interests eager for action by Beijing." Paulson is "cautioning that he won't have any big announcement after the high-level visit next week," instead saying he views the meeting with Chinese leaders as the beginning of a "long term" discussion, and that "simply sitting down to discuss economic issues with top Chinese officials should be seen as progress." However, the Journal says Paulson is "likely to come under increasing pressure from members of Congress and US manufacturers, who want less talk and more action."

Focus Of Poison Probe Turns To Former Spy As Death Officially Ruled As Murder. The CBS Evening News (12/6, story 12, 0:20, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "The case of the former Russian spy who died of radiation poisoning last month is now officially a murder investigation in London. British police are now in Moscow to interview another ex-spy, Andrei Lugovoy, who met with Alexander Litvinenko in London the day he got sick. Lugovoy himself is in the hospital now being treated for radiation poisoning."

The Los Angeles Times (12/7, Holley, Murphy, 850K) reports that British and Russian investigators questioned one of the people Litvinenko met with on the day he was believed to have been poisoned, Russian businessman Dmitry Kovtun, at a Moscow hospital Wednesday, where he was apparently undergoing checks for radiation." However, questioning of Lugovoy was "put off at least to Thursday." Meanwhile, the British Foreign Office announced Wednesday that "small traces of radiation have been found at the British embassy in Moscow." Lugovoy visited the embassy "early in the investigation," which prompted the examination.

The AP (12/7, Lawless) reports Russia's ITAR-Tass news agency quoted a lawyer for Lugovoy as saying the meeting with Scotland Yard detectives would take place "Thursday or Friday." In a separate report, the AP (12/7, Ingram) says a British official told the newswire Wednesday that "Lugovoy is one of many people investigators are looking to question" and is not considered "a suspect at this point."

The Financial Times (12/7, Buckley) notes that the "upgrading of the inquiry came as British detectives in Moscow began interviewing contacts of Litvinenko" and claims that "Russian secret services had been ordered to kill him by the Kremlin," charges it dismisses as "nonsense." However, the Times says the "tangled case is threatening to create a significant rift in Russia's relations with the UK and other western partners." The New York Times (12/7, A3, Myers, Cowell, 1.16M) and the Washington Post (12/7, A18, Jordan, Finn, 690K) also report on the developments in the investigation.

Former Russian PM Says "Hidden Adversaries" Behind Poisoning. Meanwhile, former prime minister of the Russian Federation, Yegor Gaidar, details in the Financial Times (12/6) the events of his own suspected radiation poisoning late last month. Gaidar says that when he "started thinking about who could have orchestrated" his poisoning, he initially "rejected the idea of complicity of the Russian leadership almost immediately." However, "after the death of Alexander Litvinenko on November 23 in London," Gaidar says "another violent death of a famous Russian on the following day is the last thing that the Russian authorities would want." Therefore, he concludes that "most likely that means that some obvious or hidden adversaries of the Russian authorities stand behind the scenes of this event, those who are interested in further radical deterioration of relations between Russia and the west."

UN Approves Peacekeepers For Somalia. The New York Times (12/7, A7, 1.16M) reports briefly that UNSC Wednesday unanimously passed a resolution backing the formation of a peacekeeping force to "monitor the Somali government's struggle with Islamist foes, partly lifting an arms embargo and calling for peace talks." Ambassador Bolton remarked, "It may not be a complete solution to the problem, and that's one reason why we've encouraged the mediation of various parties and to have all the Somalia factions talk with one another."

The Washington Post (12/7, A24, Lynch, 690K) notes that the resolution was passed "after the United States accommodated a European request to exclude participation by Somalia's neighbors, Ethiopia, Kenya and Djibouti, in the new force." The Los Angeles Times (12/7, Farley, 850K) also reports on the move.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Senators Rap FBI Over Domestic Spying (NSDY/AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

Long Island Newsday, December 7, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Senators frustrated by scant details on the Bush administration's domestic eavesdropping program on Wednesday rapped FBI Director Robert Mueller for refusing to show how it has curbed terrorist activity in the United States.

Mueller said he was unable to talk about the warrantless spying program because it is classified.

"What assurances can you provide that the program is worthwhile?" asked Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa. "Have arrests been made? Have terror cells been broken?"

The FBI has briefed congressional intelligence committees on the controversial program, but Mueller said he did not have permission to share that information with other lawmakers -- including the judiciary panels that oversee the bureau.

"I am prepared to brief whichever committee, to the extent that I am allowed to," he said.

In his opening remarks, Mueller ticked off a list of FBI cases targeting terror suspects since the 2001 attacks. They included the so-called "Lackawanna Six" who allegedly attended al-Qaida training camps; an Ohio truck driver who plotted to attack the Brooklyn Bridge; and four men charged with planning to hit synagogues and U.S. and Israeli facilities in the Los Angeles area.

But Mueller did not say if any of the cases resulted from the secret spying program, which was revealed last year. His answer annoyed senators, who said their constitutionally protected oversight was being hampered by the administration's stonewalling.

"When done poorly or without proper safeguards and oversight, data banks do not make us safer, they just further erode Americans' privacy and civil liberties," said Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., the panel's incoming chairman. He said the administration "has gone to unprecedented lengths to hide its own activities from the public, while at the same time collecting and compiling unprecedented amounts of information about every citizen."

Later, Mueller also said the FBI could better fight terrorists if authorities had stronger subpoena power to determine if threats are valid, and if search and surveillance tools granted by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act court could be expanded.

His appearance marked a long-delayed hearing for senators eager to hear about the FBI's progress on terror investigations, including a 5-year probe into the deadly anthrax attacks. Mueller declined comment on specifics of the case. He was also scolded by Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., for ranking violent crime prevention as less of a priority than public corruption and organized crime cases.

"Gangs are killing more people in this country than organized crime ever did," Feinstein said. "And that's just a fact."

Responding, Mueller said that if the FBI didn't go after crooked public officials and organized crime cases, "it will not be investigated." He called public corruption cases the FBI's "top criminal investigative priority," noting that more than 1,000 government employees have been convicted over the last two years with the FBI's help.

Mueller's Reticence Angers Senate Panel (WT)

By Jerry Seper, THE WASHINGTON TIMES

The Washington Times, December 7, 2006

FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III was subjected to bipartisan criticism yesterday by a Senate committee after refusing to discuss the Bush administration's domestic terrorist-surveillance program because it is "classified."

Mr. Mueller declined to give Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican, assurances the program was worthwhile or to say whether it had resulted in any arrests or dismantled terrorist cells.

But the director stepped further into the breach when he told Mr. Specter the FBI had given a "full briefing"on the program to the Senate Intelligence Committee behind closed doors.

"Well, we're very interested in that, Director Mueller, but not as interested as a full briefing to this committee," said Mr. Specter, adding that "this committee has oversight jurisdiction over the FBI. We're going to pursue that, Director Mueller. That is not what I view as a satisfactory response by the administration."

The committee's ranking Democrat, Sen. Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, who will take over as chairman next month, accused the Bush administration of going to "unprecedented lengths to hide its own activities from the public, while at the same time collecting and compiling unprecedented amounts of information about every citizen."

Mr. Leahy said data banks, when compiled poorly or without proper safeguards and oversight, "do not make us safer, they just further erode Americans' privacy and civil liberties."

His questions gave insight into the issues he will pursue as chairman.

"The recent revelation that the Bush administration, since 9/11, has been compiling secret dossiers on millions of unwitting, law-abiding Americans who travel across our borders, highlights the importance of diligent congressional oversight," Mr. Leahy said.

The Justice Department has called the domestic terrorist-surveillance program "essential" in its war on terrorism, adding that it "ensures we have in place an early-warning system to detect and prevent a terrorist attack."

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales said it focused only on communications with al Qaeda and had been "very effective" in protecting the United States against terrorist attacks.

Democrats and Republicans in the House and Senate have questioned Mr. Bush's constitutional authority to conduct wiretapping, saying among other things the program improperly bypassed the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act court established by Congress to approve secret surveillance or searches of those suspected of terrorism.

During the hearing, Mr. Mueller, who took over the FBI a week before the September 11 attacks, suggested that members of Congress look at "all aspects of the program and understand the context in which technology has developed exponentially."

"Congress needs to grapple with the issues of this expanding technology and give us the tools we need to expeditiously do that which you said at the outset, which is to wiretap putative terrorists' conversations so we have the information we need to do our jobs."

Democrats Set To Press Bush On Privacy And Terrorism (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau

The New York Times, December 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 6 — Leading Senate Democrats put the Bush administration on notice Wednesday that they intended to press for a fuller accounting on a wide range of counterterrorism programs, including wiretapping, data-mining operations and the interrogation and treatment of detainees.

Democrats have appeared divided at times over how aggressively to challenge the administration on its terrorism policies, in part because of concerns that they risked playing into Republican accusations that they were soft on terrorism.

But Senator Patrick J. Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, who will take over next month as chairman of the Judiciary Committee, made clear at a committee hearing Wednesday that he wanted to investigate actively the effectiveness and legality of many programs.

“The administration’s gone to unprecedented lengths to hide its own activities from the public while at the same time collecting an unprecedented amount of data on private citizens,” Mr. Leahy told Robert S. Mueller III, the director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

As the sole witness at the hearing, Mr. Mueller bore the brunt of the Democrats’ criticism. But their sharp questions often went well beyond the F.B.I.’s purview, delving into areas like the National Security Agency’s eavesdropping program, the Central Intelligence Agency’s interrogations of Qaeda suspects and the Department of Homeland Security’s use of profiling scores to assess the risks posed by travelers.

DOJ_NMG_0103226

As a first step toward what Mr. Leahy described as an effort to roll back the administration's curtailment of rights, he and Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania, proposed legislation that would seek to restore the rights of all terrorism suspects to challenge their detentions in court.

The military detention legislation that President Bush signed into law in October stripped the federal courts of jurisdiction to hear petitions from noncitizens for rights of habeas corpus.

Brian Roehrkasse, a spokesman for the Justice Department, said that while the administration would review the Leahy-Specter proposal, the process approved by Congress allows enemy combatants to challenge their detention and "goes well beyond what is required for lawful prisoners of war under both international and domestic law."

Several Republican senators on the Judiciary Committee, including Mr. Specter and Charles E. Grassley of Iowa, told Mr. Mueller that they shared the concerns about some terrorism operations, particularly the F.B.I.'s struggle to remake its computer system.

An audit of the computer overhaul released this week by the Justice Department inspector general found that the project risked falling $57 million short this year. Mr. Mueller disputed that, saying that the program was on schedule and within budget.

In addition, several senators criticized the pace of the F.B.I. investigation into the anthrax attacks of October 2001, which are unsolved, and the bureau's unwillingness to brief members of Congress fully about where the investigation stands.

Amid the sharp criticism, one notable dissent came from Senator Jeff Sessions, Republican of Alabama, who thanked Mr. Mueller for his hard work and suggested that Democrats and civil rights advocates were too quick to criticize the administration over policies that might affect privacy rights.

Opponents of the administration's policies, Mr. Sessions said, will "criticize you for not maintaining information and not sharing it with the person at the airport so they can identify somebody who might be a terrorist if they happen to get by the system, and then they'll complain that you're maintaining information that somehow might oppress somebody's rights."

Mr. Sessions added, "If you don't maintain those records and somebody slips by and kills a lot of Americans, you'll be hauled in here to be criticized for it, there's no doubt about that."

Mr. Leahy said he was troubled by recent reports about the Department of Homeland Security's use of a scoring system to rate the risk that people coming across American borders might be terrorists or criminals. He said the program and broader government data-mining efforts could make it more difficult for innocent Americans to travel or to get a job — without giving them a chance to know why they were labeled a risk.

"It's worrisome," Mr. Leahy said, "because if it's done poorly or without proper safeguards and oversight, databanks don't make us safer. They just further erode Americans' privacy."

FBI Is Probing Leak Of Curt Weldon Investigation, Mueller Says (AP)

By Robert Schmidt

Ap, December 7, 2006

FBI chief Robert Mueller told the Senate Judiciary Committee today that the agency is pursuing ``a series" of leak probes of its agents, including one involved in the Weldon matter. The Pennsylvania Republican, who lost his seat on Nov. 7, was involved in a tight race when the news of the investigation broke.

``I was exceptionally disappointed, and that is being charitable in terms of my response," Mueller said about the leak. ``It is unfair in advance of an election, but, as importantly to us, it adversely affected the investigation."

The FBI probe of alleged influence peddling was first reported Oct. 13 by McClatchy Newspapers, which cited an anonymous law enforcement agent. Three days later, agents raided the home of Weldon's daughter and five other targets.

Senator Arlen Specter, a Pennsylvania Republican and chairman of the judiciary committee, questioned Mueller about the Weldon leak during a hearing in Washington, calling it ``highly prejudicial."

Weldon, who called the investigation politically motivated, was defeated by Democrat Joseph Sestak.

Political Influence

The FBI is probing whether Weldon used his political influence to steer business to help his daughter Karen win consulting deals, a person familiar with the matter has said.

Mueller said that at least one of the bureau's leak probes is being handled as a criminal investigation. He told the senators that he believes investigators are having ``some success" in discovering who the leakers are but declined to give any details.

Republican and Democratic Senators sharply questioned Mueller on such issues as the rising violent crime rate, the Bush administration program that wiretaps suspected terrorists without a court order and potential budget problems with a new paperless case file system.

Senator Patrick Leahy, the Vermont Democrat who will take over as committee chairman next year, promised to press the FBI on privacy issues related to personal information the government collects to protect against terrorist attacks.

``There is a growing concern in this country that our government knows too much about us," Leahy said.

Leahy told Mueller that ``oversight of the FBI and the SEARCH

News | News Photos | Images | Web" /> Department of Justice will be one of my highest priorities next year."

Mueller disputed Leahy's claim that the bureau's new computerized case management system, called Sentinel, was underfunded by $56.7 million. A Justice Department inspector general report earlier this week identified the funding problem and expressed concern that the FBI would take money away from its law enforcement mission to fill the gap.

``There are no cost overruns and there are no budget shortfalls," Mueller said, adding that the $425 million projected price tag for the program hasn't changed.

FBI Seeks Extra Funding To Avoid Delays On Tech Upgrade (GOVEXEC)

By Daniel Pulliam

Government Executive, December 7, 2006

The FBI's $425 million effort to upgrade its case management system is at risk of delays if Congress does not provide additional funds in the next stopgap spending measure, the bureau's chief told lawmakers Wednesday.

Testifying before the Senate Judiciary Committee, FBI Director Robert Mueller said the bureau needs $157 million to begin the second phase of building the system, known as Sentinel, in February as planned.

President Bush included $100 million for the project in his fiscal 2007 budget request. According to Mueller, the Office of Management and Budget has helped the FBI find the additional $57 million, using funds left over from the first phase of the effort and unspent balances in other accounts.

The House version of the fiscal 2007 Science, State, Justice, Commerce and related agencies spending bill, which includes FBI funding, meets the administration's $100 million request. But the Senate version provides an appropriation of only $40 million. The bill has yet to be completed.

The Senate did not grant the full request because the FBI failed to fully respond to a March 24, 2006, letter from the Judiciary Committee relating to the bureau's modernization efforts. Language in the report accompanying the appropriations bill stated that the funding levels would be reconsidered if FBI officials answer the committee's outstanding questions.

The current continuing resolution to keep money flowing to agencies in the absence of final fiscal 2007 appropriations is set to expire Dec. 8. Agency officials have asked that when lawmakers extend it, they provide $80 million for Sentinel.

Spending levels in continuing resolutions usually are set at the lower of the Senate or House-passed or fiscal 2006-enacted levels. But the FBI requested an exception to that rule, according to a bureau spokeswoman.

Sentinel, a six-year effort to replace the failed Virtual Case File project, is intended to upgrade the FBI's old-fashioned paper-based system for managing investigations and information. Lockheed Martin Corp. won a $57 million task order in March to work on the first stage of the program, with options to earn $248 million for three additional phases.

"We would be prevented legally from going into the contract [for the second phase] if we don't have the $157 million," Mueller said. "It would help if Congress included the $100 million in the continuing resolution."

Mueller said Sentinel has not had cost overruns or budget shortfalls and the total estimate for the project has not changed. He said the FBI has learned from the mistakes made with the failed Virtual Case File project, Sentinel's predecessor.

A Justice Department inspector general report released Monday found that the FBI is exercising more control over the development of Sentinel, but maintained that the funding and cost estimates remained uncertain.

"I believe everybody believes that this project is a good one. We do need the money to go forward," Mueller said.

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., said it is highly likely that the $100 million figure would have been the final amount in a conference report. Lawmakers' failure to finish the appropriations bills, he said, "is a highly deplorable situation."

UK 'under Threat From Resurgent Al-Qaeda' (FT)

By Stephen Fidler

Financial Times, December 7, 2006

Britain's security services have concluded that al-Qaeda is rebuilding its headquarters' operation in Pakistan and that the UK is the western country mainly at risk from the development, according to UK government officials.

The conclusion, drawn from examinations of past plots and other evidence, runs counter to conventional wisdom that al-Qaeda has been in retreat as an operational force and has become essentially a "brand" that inspires radical Muslims to commit acts of terror.

The theme was addressed in public last month in a speech by Dame Eliza Manningham-Buller, director-general of the UK's domestic security service. She said the service knew of some 30 plots and had identified 1,600 people actively engaged in plotting, or facilitating, terrorist acts here and abroad.

"These plots often have links back to al-Qaeda in Pakistan and through those links al-Qaeda gives guidance and training to its largely British foot soldiers here on an extensive and growing scale," she said.

UK government officials, speak-ing on condition they not be named, say they have evidence that some groups receive direction from Pakistan, in particular from the lawless tribal areas near the Afghan borders.

"It's an emerging pattern. Training is taking place in Pakistan and contacts are continuing after the training," one official said. According to another: "We are seeing an increase slowly in the level of sophistication of al-Qaeda directed or inspired attacks."

Among a significant number of examples, officials say Dhiren Barot, a British convert from Hinduism convicted last month for plotting to blow up the New York Stock Exchange and other US targets, was di-rected by al-Qaeda. Mohammad Sidique Khan and Shehzad Tanweer, two of the four July 7 suicide bombers, are thought now to have visited terrorist training camps in Pakistan, the officials say.

The link to Pakistan gives the UK a special vulnerability to al-Qaeda. UK residents make 400,000 visits a year to Pakistan, among whom a small number of aspirant terrorists would be hard to find. A disproportionate number of suspects under surveillance are of Pakistani origin, officials say.

The US still remains al-Qaeda's number one target, they say. But the UK, the closest ally of the US and where polls estimate there are at least 100,000 supporters of terror attacks, is an easier mark. "We are talking about risk: risk is made up of a combination of threat and vulnerability," an official says. " If the threat is big, but you are not vulnerable, there is a low risk. But if the threat is high and vulnerability is high, then you are in trouble."

According to specialists, al-Qaeda's comeback has been made possible by developments in Pakistan. Shaun Gregory, head of Bradford University's peace studies de-partment, says Pakistan's military has been scaling back its activities in the tribal areas of north and south Waziristan since mid-2005. "The deals that have been done with tribal militants in that region mean that the heat is off al-Qaeda," he says.

Two other developments are troubling, he says. The west's presence in and around Pakistan and the strength of US influence with the government of President Pervez Musharraf is radicalising some Pakistanis and driving some into the arms of al- Qaeda. And there appears to be a closing of links between Kashmiri terrorist groups and al-Qaeda and the Taliban.

Not all evidence points to a coherent regrouping of al-Qaeda. Nawaf Obaid, a Saudi security specialist and government adviser, says al-Qaeda fighters arrested on their return to Saudi Arabia from Pakistan and Afghanistan appeared disorganised. "They had no attack plan and no clear command structure," he says.

Jonathan Stevenson, however, professor of strategic studies at the US Naval War College, says the UK's close alignment with US foreign policy may have made the UK more of a target. But the radicalisation of UK Muslims means that from the US perspective "Britain is regarded as among the most problematic of countries, probably the most problematic".

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

AG, Salazar To Tour Supermax (RMN)

By Sara Burnett, Rocky Mountain News

Rocky Mountain News, December 7, 2006

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales plans to tour Supermax prison with Sen. Ken Salazar in February, Salazar's spokesman said today.

Salazar said he hopes the Feb. 21 tour will bring much-needed attention to the nation's highest-security federal prison, which has seen a decrease in staff and increased concerns about security since it opened in Florence in 1994.

The prison is home to inmates such as 9/11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui, 1993 World Trade Center bomber Ramzi Yousef and Oklahoma City bombing conspirator Terry Nichols.

In September, a Justice Department inspector general's report criticized the prison for not properly screening terrorists' mail and other communications. A federal indictment also revealed that a drug kingpin had used coded messages to conduct business in Los Angeles from inside Supermax.

Last month, a federal arbitrator agreed with prison guards that staff cuts had made the facility more dangerous, and local police and fire officials said they had no way to communicate with prison staff in case of an attack, escape or other emergency.

Gonzales told the Rocky Mountain News during an interview last month that he believes the prison is safe, and that all mail and phone calls are now being monitored. He also said 18 additional staff would be added, bringing the total to 208. That's still short of the 240 employees Supermax had when it opened.

Salazar, Gonzales To Tour Supermax In February (AP)

AP, December 7, 2006

DENVER - Sen. Ken Salazar and U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales are scheduled to tour the Supermax prison in Florence together in February following reports of security concerns.

Salazar, D-Colo., said the two would visit the maximum-security prison Feb. 21.

Salazar and Sen. Wayne Allard, R-Colo., both have visited Florence on their own to hear community and staff concerns.

This year an arbitrator found staffing levels had made the facility more dangerous, with some shifts going unfilled. In September, a Justice Department report criticized the prison for not properly screening mail and other communications.

Gonzales had committed to a tour when he met with Salazar last month, when he restated the Bureau of Prison's commitment to add 18 staff members to the prison by the end of the year.

Supermax houses inmates considered to be among the nation's most dangerous, including Unabomber Ted Kaczynski and al-Qaida conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui.

U.S.-bound Cargo To Be Tested For Radiation (USAT)

By Mimi Hall, Usa Today

USA Today, December 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — Cargo containers bound for the USA from four overseas ports will be checked for radiation before they're loaded on ships under a new government program aimed at preventing terrorists from smuggling a nuclear weapon into the country.

The Homeland Security and Energy departments will announce today that containers at ports in Korea, Oman, Honduras and the United Kingdom will be scanned beginning early next year in the first phase of a program that could expand to ports worldwide.

"There is ample history of people using container traffic for smuggling a whole range of things," Homeland Security Deputy Secretary Michael Jackson said.

Some containers being shipped from Hong Kong's port have been run through radiation detectors since 2004 as part of a test program by shippers and port officials to see whether cargo containers could be effectively scanned without creating bottlenecks and slowing the pace of shipments.

The new program, which will cost $60 million in fiscal 2007, is a first for the government.

In Korea, one of the world's largest ports, some of the cargo containers will be run through detectors. In the other smaller ports, officials expect most or all will be.

Either way, the program should deter anyone aiming to sneak weapons onto a cargo ship, Jackson said.

Officers who work for the port governments will run the containers through the radiation and X-ray machines. If an alarm sounds, Jackson said, the container will not be loaded onto a ship until a U.S. Customs official signs off.

He said most shippers and foreign governments support the program. "Nobody wants the global supply chain to ground to a halt over a terrorist event," he said.

Homeland security consultant Randall Larsen is skeptical of the program. "It would do nothing to make us more secure against an attack on an American city with a nuclear weapon," he said.

If terrorists were able to secure a nuclear weapon, they would never load it into a cargo container and send it across the ocean, he said. "You would never take your hands off it. You'd charter an airplane or (your own) ship" to bring it in.

9/11 Cleanup To Resume, E.P.A. Says (NYT)

By Anthony Depalma

The New York Times, December 7, 2006

More than five years after contaminated dust from the World Trade Center seeped into apartments and offices throughout Lower Manhattan, the federal Environmental Protection Agency announced plans yesterday to start a final indoor cleanup program next month, despite widespread criticism that the program is seriously flawed.

Agency officials said residents and owners of commercial buildings below Canal Street would have 60 days to sign up for the voluntary program, which will test for asbestos, lead, vitreous fibers and harmful soot that may have come from the collapse of the trade center.

If any one of the contaminants is found, the space will be professionally cleaned at no cost to the resident or owner.

The new program is almost identical to one that was rejected in November 2005 as inadequate by the agency's advisory panel of experts as well as by community groups, labor unions and the city's Congressional delegation. The City Council passed a resolution condemning that program, calling it "technically and scientifically flawed."

Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, who in 2004 forced the environmental agency to test indoor spaces for contamination, called the program announced yesterday "totally inadequate."

In a statement, she said she would use her chairmanship of the Senate Subcommittee on Superfund and Environmental Health in the new Congress to press for a more comprehensive testing and cleaning program.

In early 2005, the agency considered creating a far broader program that would have used statistically based mapping to learn the extent of the contamination, following it outside Manhattan if needed. Under that program, if any dust could be conclusively linked to the trade center collapse, entire buildings, not individual apartments or offices, were to be vacuumed and wiped down to prevent recontamination from spaces that had not been cleaned.

The agency abandoned that program late last year when it could not devise a reliable way to identify trade center dust. It substituted a pared down program that would only test individual apartments in Lower Manhattan and clean only those where contamination was found. However, when community residents objected to the program as insufficient, the agency agreed to continue looking for a method of identifying dust from the twin towers.

Yesterday, Alan J. Steinberg, regional administrator for the agency, said that effort had taken most of the last year but had failed to come up with a viable method.

Last year's program has been modified to include commercial spaces and to allow previously cleaned apartments to be retested, but it still excludes Brooklyn and is restricted to Lower Manhattan below Canal Street.

Catherine McVay Hughes, a downtown resident who was community liaison on the agency's advisory panel, said she was disturbed that the agency had not notified residents of this latest version before announcing it. She said it was still so limited that it was unlikely to accomplish Mr. Steinberg's goal of providing "peace of mind to people who live and work in Lower Manhattan."

"Because the plan continues to be inadequate, I can't imagine that there will be much of a response," she said.

Paul J. Lioy, an environmental scientist at Rutgers who was also a member of the advisory panel, said the program, though flawed, could do some good.

"At least something is finally being done," he said. "If there is residual dust, we'll be able to find it."

It is not clear how many apartments and commercial spaces can be cleaned under the new program. Mr. Steinberg said only $7 million was left from a Federal Emergency Management Agency grant to pay for the new cleanup. A previous effort in 2002 and 2003 that cleaned or tested 4,200 of more than 23,000 apartments in Lower Manhattan cost $30 million.

Mr. Steinberg said testing for the four contaminants would cost about $3 a square foot, or $3,000 for an average apartment, while cleaning that same space will add an additional $1 per square foot.

But officials said they expected the testing to show that most apartments do not need to be cleaned.

"The danger really is low," said George M. Gray, assistant administrator for the agency's Office of Research and Development. "The vast majority of occupied residential and commercial spaces have been repeatedly cleaned since 2001."

Dr. Gray said the normal process of household cleaning — dusting and vacuuming and the like — has probably eliminated most of the dust that infiltrated indoor spaces.

Environmental advocates disagreed. "That's not an environmental cleanup," said Suzanne Mattei, director of the Sierra Club's New York office. "Most experts say that if a carpet really is contaminated with asbestos, you probably need to get it out of the house altogether."

The 60-day sign-up period for the voluntary cleanup program will begin in January, and testing is expected to start in the spring. More information is available online at epa.gov/wtc/testandclean.

Cherry-Picking Campaign Promises (NYT)

The New York Times, December 7, 2006

Weeks before they take majority control of the Capitol, the Democrats are reported to be wriggling out of one of their most important campaign vows: to repair Congressional oversight of the nation's intelligence agencies. Congress was found to be nothing less than "dysfunctional" on this duty by the Sept. 11 commission, which wisely recommended a full-scale revamping of the committee structure.

This necessarily means a wrenching change in the budget powers over intelligence exercised by the bulls of the defense appropriations process — a monopoly that reduces the intelligence committees to secondary lap dogs. When the Republican-controlled Congress showed no appetite for a turf fight, Democrats eagerly made a campaign vow to promptly enact all of the panel's recommendations.

Now that they can taste power again, however, the victors seem to be having second thoughts. Instead of attempting wholesale committee reform in the first weeks of Congress, Democratic leaders may punt the idea toward oblivion in some sort of a study panel, according to The Washington Post. Nothing could be more disappointing to voters.

The Sept. 11 commission report was not sacred writ. And Democrats still vow to enact major commission recommendations to bolster port security and screen airport cargo. But the lawmakers cannot ignore the fact that they were found to be an organic part of the problem. Surely, the leaders of the new Congress know they will be risking the nation's security, far more than their credibility, if they retreat from the vow to do a stronger job of oversight.

Nagin: Feds Have Abandoned New Orleans Recovery (USAT)

By Peter Eisler And Brad Heath

USA Today, December 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0103232

New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin accused the federal government Wednesday of abandoning its legal obligation to help his city recover from the devastation of Hurricane Katrina.

In an interview with USA TODAY's editorial board, Nagin insisted that even the city's most flood-prone areas should be rebuilt — albeit "smarter and safer." He said that can't happen unless promised federal aid begins to flow.

"I'm planning and building for a city that's as large, if not larger, than pre-Katrina levels," he said. "There is (federal) money out in cyberspace, there is money in the mail … but very little of that money has made it to our local governments and our citizens."

Under federal law, he added, the government is obliged to help restore vital infrastructure devastated by the storm, which struck the Gulf Coast on Aug. 29, 2005. Nagin said the federal government has approved more than $900 million to rebuild New Orleans' infrastructure, but local officials have not been able to access most of it.

"We're here to say to the federal government: 'Honor the law,' " said Nagin, in Washington to see lawmakers and federal officials.

James Stark, the head of the Federal Emergency Management Agency's recovery office in Louisiana, said most of the federal money already has been turned over to Louisiana. But he said FEMA has been working to speed up the funding process. "Given the breadth of this disaster I think it's understandable that some of this has moved slower than we'd all hoped," he said.

Andy Kopplin, executive director of the Louisiana Recovery Authority, said FEMA was at first slow to approve infrastructure projects and has consistently underestimated the cost. Nevertheless, he said, $640 million worth of permanent infrastructure money has been approved for New Orleans projects. "Payments will be made as the projects are constructed," Kopplin said.

Nagin said local officials are caught in a bureaucratic Catch-22: They can't get the money until projects are underway, but they're unable to issue contracts until they have money in hand to pay for them. So the city hasn't been able to begin critical repairs to roads, public buildings, power systems or other damaged infrastructure.

'We're Going To Do It' (USAT)

USA Today, December 7, 2006

'We're going to do it'

The New Orleans mayor and city leaders talk about the progress, setbacks and frustrations of rebuilding an American city. On one point, they are unanimous: The Big Easy will rise again.

More than 15 months after Hurricane Katrina swamped New Orleans and surrounding areas of the Gulf Coast, tangible signs of recovery are evident. Even so, frustrations have been mounting as thousands of residents have yet to return, red tape has slowed rebuilding and many neighborhoods are virtually untouched. New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin, along with City Council members Oliver Thomas Jr., Cynthia Hedge-Morrell and Arnie Fielkow, discussed the city's rebuilding efforts and other issues with USA TODAY's editorial board. Their comments were edited for length and clarity.

Question: For all of the achievements in New Orleans, many problems remain. This enormously complicated task is made more difficult by dealing with city, state and federal bureaucracies. What's the most important thing that needs to be done to make everything else work?

Nagin: The main thing we need right now is the $900 million that is pending through the Federal Emergency Management Agency for infrastructure repairs. The second thing is the dollars our citizens need to rebuild their homes and their lives. The Road Home program (which uses grants to cover home repairs not covered by insurance or FEMA grants) was designed to award grants of $150,000. But only 44 citizens statewide have received a check. Our citizens are getting very frustrated.

Q: The main federal responsibility would seem to be making the levees safe, which would encourage people to return. Where does this stand?

Nagin: In my dealings with the Army Corps of Engineers, the areas they've fixed seem to be some of the best levee systems we've had in our history. That's the good news. The not-so-good news is that the entire system has not been upgraded to that standard. By the time we get to the next hurricane season, we should have our other really vulnerable areas upgraded. Longer term, the Corps still has not armored the levee stations, it still has not built the gates we need. We still have not adequately started addressing our coastal restoration issues. So it is going to take us probably until 2010 before the city is totally protected.

Q: Can a citizen confidently make a decision about where he or she should rebuild or live?

Nagin: Our citizens have enough information to understand their risk. I don't think we can eliminate all of the risk because we're a city that's a bowl. When we look at a map of the building permits we've issued, most citizens seem to be shying away from areas most susceptible to flooding if another Katrina happens.

Q: You've said that every citizen should be allowed to return and rebuild. Now Ed Blakely, your new manager for rebuilding, said that doesn't necessarily mean everyone should be allowed to rebuild in exactly the same place. Do you agree or do you still feel the city's footprint cannot shrink?

Nagin: What Blakely was trying to clarify is that we want to make sure that everyone who rebuilds does so safely. For example, everyone seems to be infatuated with the Lower 9th Ward, which is where Councilman Thomas grew up. We have not said that people can't go back and build in the Lower 9th. What we are saying is that they need to build smarter and safer. So if you're going to build in an area that is susceptible to severe flooding, a multistoried living facility — in which the first floor is parking and storage — is probably the smarter way to build.

Q: So are you saying you won't allow rebuilding in certain places?

Nagin: Why are you guys so obsessed with this footprint issue? I'm planning on building a city that's as large, if not larger, than pre-Katrina levels. My immediate objective is to try to get the population back to 75% pre-Katrina levels as quickly as possible, and then we will be attracting non-New Orleanians to a booming economy and grow to a much larger level.

Q: Your "Bring New Orleans Back Commission" said the city should abandon some low-lying areas and a moratorium should be placed on building in the most vulnerable areas? Do you disagree with that recommendation?

Hedge-Morrell: When the commission came back with that announcement, it was just unthinkable. One of the areas they targeted was my district, an area on the rebound. People are rebuilding. We have businesses coming back. So it is misleading and almost an insult to this city's citizens that everyone gets hung up on this footprint issue. I don't hear of any other city that experiences a forest fire or earthquake being told that they can't rebuild.

Thomas: But we can't be irresponsible. We are not going to allow people to bring their families in areas where we can't support them. In New Orleans, you have some families — two, three and four families — that are living together. They don't want to take a chance on not having a school or not having police protection. But the less resources we get, the less infrastructure we'll have to support the quality of life.

Nagin: One thing that is happening is that there is no clarity about buyout dollars for homeowners to move to a better place. How does someone rebuild his life? How does he move away from the home that's been in his family for 100 years with a buyout offer on the table of $10,000 (with the rest of the Road Home money going to the mortgage company)? And anytime we bring up the issue of footprint, our citizens say, well how do I get to a better place? How do I rebuild my life?

Q: And what's the answer?

Nagin: The answer is the Road Home program needs to be rethought. It's not meeting the needs of our citizens. It needs to move more quickly with more dollars. We have to get to a point where I can say to a citizen, you can't live here or you shouldn't live here because of the risk, but here's how we move you to a better place to rebuild your life. But that clarity is not out there.

Fielkow: It is very frustrating. But one of the greatest stories that exists in this country, maybe the world, is what has transpired with average folks for the last year, every night of the week, every weekend of the year, meeting first in small neighborhood groups and then branching out into larger groups and talking about their future, where they're going to rebuild, are their neighbors coming back? What infrastructure needs to come into play? So when we talk about rebuilding, it is not being done in a vacuum, it is being done with the input of every citizen. People are really planning their own future right now.

Q: How does the situation in New Orleans differ from that in California, when houses are devoured in fires, or in Kansas, when homes are flattened by tornadoes?

Hedge-Morrell: It differs because Katrina didn't do it. The fault lies with a poorly constructed federal levee system. Nobody talks about the fact that over the last 20 years, money was appropriated to fortify the system, but it was never completed. Everybody talks about Katrina, Katrina, Katrina.

Thomas: We survived Katrina. We didn't survive the levees breaking.

Hedge-Morrell: We did not survive poorly constructed levees.

Q: How far does the federal responsibility over the levee failure reach? Because of the levee failure, is there a federal obligation to make everyone whole, regardless of insurance?

Nagin: I think the biggest difference we as New Orleanians are feeling is if there's a wildfire out in California, there's really no question about whether we should rebuild those areas. If there's an earthquake, a snowstorm, nobody questions that. And that's what we are struggling with as a community and it's creating a lot of anger. It really is. Now they're wondering, why is this taking so long, why aren't these resources available and why isn't America basically saying collectively that this city deserves to be rebuilt? If we have to do it by ourselves, we're going to do it. It's just going to happen. I know this city and we're not going to allow anybody to tell us that we can't be back in our city. All we want is fairness, and we hope we can get a little bit of that going forward.

Q: But because there is federal money involved, and people elsewhere in the country are providing that money, who should bear the risk for rebuilding in flood-prone areas of New Orleans?

Nagin: It depends upon how much the area is contributing. I mean, if we are contributing, let's say $2 billion into the flood insurance policies every year, then to me, that's worth the risk. If we are contributing oil and gas to this country at an unprecedented level and the city is a primary producer, if we're delivering most of the seafood to the nation and I could go on and on, then to me it is worth the investment.

Q: Do you believe any of the aid money has been lost through corruption or incompetence?

Nagin: I don't know if there is any corruption going on. I think when you spend a significant amount of money, you're probably going to have some fraud or waste. What I can tell you is that the Stafford Act (which allows the president to declare an emergency and provide federal relief) isn't modern enough to deal with disasters of this nature. The fact that you have to wait for two bureaucracies — the federal and state bureaucracy — while they're both going back and forth to clarify it all, is not an efficient process.

Q: Where are the bottlenecks in getting the money where it needs to go?

Nagin: We've done about everything asked of us. We've gone through probably the most comprehensive planning process of any city in Louisiana that was impacted. Local elected leaders should be involved in designing how to expedite these processes. There are too many instances where the federal government and the state government are going on doing things and not involving us in a meaningful way.

Q: What do you want America to know?

Nagin: As Oliver said earlier, it's not the Katrina event that is really hurting us. It's the recovery, the aftermath of Katrina, all of what we're going through. Our citizens are under tremendous stress, the pain of what's going on in our community, particularly with our seniors, is unbearable almost. People are suffering, and somehow we've got to get away from this debate about whether we should or should not help people or move to improve their lives.

FEMA Wasting Millions In Katrina Aid, Audit Finds (AP)

By Hope Yen

AP, December 6, 2006

The government is squandering tens of millions of dollars in Hurricane Katrina disaster help, in some cases doling out housing payments to people living rent-free, investigators said yesterday.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency has recouped less than 1 percent of the $1 billion that investigators contend it wasted on fraudulent assistance, according to the Government Accountability Office. The report illustrates the disaster relief agency's struggles, more than one year after the deadly storm, to rush aid to those in need while also preventing abuse.

Last week, a federal judge in Washington ordered the Bush administration to resume housing payments for thousands of people displaced by Katrina. The ruling, which FEMA is appealing, cited a convoluted process for applying for help.

"Our work shows for individual assistance payments, at least tens of thousands of individuals took the opportunity to commit fraud," said Gregory Kutz, who works for Congress's investigative arm. He said that his previous $1 billion estimate of wasted aid was now "likely understated."

"I hope FEMA has learned the costly lesson and will make reforms for future disasters," Kutz said at a Senate hearing.

DOJ_NMG_0103235

In its latest report, the GAO found that numerous applicants received duplicate rental aid. In one case, FEMA provided free apartments to 10 people in Plano, Tex., while sending them $46,000 for out-of-pocket housing expenses.

FEMA arranged for a free trailer to a family in Lacombe, La., in January, yet continued to provide monthly rental payments in late January, February and April totaling $5,500 -- a mistake resulting from poor communication within the agency, according to the report.

In addition, $20 million was wasted on thousands of people who claimed the same property damage from two hurricanes, Katrina and Rita. FEMA paid at least $3 million to more than 500 ineligible foreign students in the stricken Gulf Coast region, the report said.

FEMA spokesman Pat Philbin did not challenge the findings. He did say the agency has sought to upgrade the registration process and strengthen its procedures for verifying names and addresses.

"FEMA continues to focus our rebuilding efforts to greatly improve our reliability, accuracy and response in providing aid to disaster victims," Philbin said. "The agency will consider and evaluate any new findings."

Katrina Aid Is Still Being Abused, U.S. Investigators Say (USAT)

By Mimi Hall

USA Today, December 7, 2006

The government continues to waste tens of millions of dollars in its Hurricane Katrina relief efforts, including giving rent checks to evacuees already living in free housing and student aid to ineligible foreigners, U.S. investigators said Wednesday.

The Government Accountability Office (GAO) also found that the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) has been able to recoup only $7 million of the more than $1 billion in improper payments identified by investigators months ago.

"The taxpayers are the new victims here," the GAO's Greg Kutz told the Senate's Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee during the fourth and final hearing into government waste, fraud and abuse related to Katrina.

Among the latest examples of waste were duplicate payments to people claiming the same damage to their homes from two hurricanes.

Chairwoman Susan Collins, R-Maine, called the new revelations about FEMA "truly alarming."

The GAO reported that FEMA spent:

•Nearly $17 million in improper or fraudulent rental payments to evacuees already living for free in trailers provided by the agency.

•Nearly $20 million in double payments to people who claimed damage to the same property from Hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

•$3 million to more than 500 foreign students who are ineligible for aid.

•$156,000 to 25 foreign workers in the USA on temporary work visas.

Katrina & Recovery Much Katrina Aid Wasted, GAO Report Says (NPR)

By Carol Anne Clark Kelly

NPR, December 6, 2006

More than a year after Hurricane Katrina devastated New Orleans and portions of the Gulf Coast, the government is still wasting millions of dollars in disaster aid, according to a report released Wednesday by the Government Accountability Office.

The GAO report finds evidence of double payments, aid given to foreign exchange students and a major failure to recover money paid out for illegitimate claims.

FEMA spokesman Pat Philbin said the agency has tried over the past year to eliminate waste by improving its registration process and upgrading its ability to check names and addresses.

"The agency will consider and evaluate any new findings that can assist in improving our processes and procedures," Philbin said.

At the same time that public interest groups are in court this week, trying to restart FEMA payments to thousands of Katrina evacuees, congressional investigators detailed instances of fraudulent payments to some Gulf Coast residents.

The GAO report says nearly $20 million was paid out to some 7,000 people who claimed their property was damaged by first Hurricane Katrina and then again by Hurricane Rita, which followed on the heels of the more powerful storm.

Some may in fact have been damaged by both storms, but the GAO says FEMA didn't have proper checks in place to flag duplicate claims.

FEMA also paid out nearly $3 million to more than 500 foreign exchange students. In several cases, the students actually informed FEMA of their international student status, and still received payments.

The GAO says rental aid was given to more than 8,000 storm victims who were already living rent-free in FEMA-provided trailers. In another case, FEMA provided free apartments to 10 individuals in Plano, Texas, while still sending them $46,000 to cover their own housing expenses.

At a Senate hearing to discuss the report's findings, Sen. Susan Collins (R-ME), chairwoman of the Homeland Security Committee, said a weaker-than-expected 2006 hurricane season has given the government the "luxury of time" to get disaster aid right.

"FEMA has yet to strike a proper balance between expedited assistance and good stewardship of taxpayers' funds. Current practices invite and enable fraud, harming the very people the program is designed to help," Collins said.

The ranking Democrat on the committee, Sen. Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut, said in some cases, people didn't intend to defraud the government.

"Some ineligible people who had no intent of gaming the government, but thought they might be eligible for assistance were granted payments, even though FEMA should have known they were not eligible and should have explained to them they were not eligible," Lieberman said.

Last week, a federal judge ordered FEMA to resume making housing assistance payments to thousands of Katrina evacuees after determining the government had botched the way it notified victims they weren't eligible to receive long-term housing aid. On Tuesday, the government appealed that ruling.

"Apparently FEMA doled out millions of dollars to people who did not deserve it and then denied assistance to many people with potentially legitimate needs without properly documenting why, making it difficult for applicants to appeal FEMA's decisions," Lieberman said.

GAO investigator Gregory Kutz told senators at the hearing that FEMA has recovered less than 1 percent of at least $1 billion wasted on fraudulent or unjustified claims. He described FEMA's approach as "shooting money out the door" and then trying to recoup it later and said only pennies on the dollars are typically recovered that way.

"I hope FEMA has learned the costly lesson," Kutz said.

Louisiana Disputes A Bill From FEMA For Hurricane Aid (NYT)

By Leslie Eaton

The New York Times, December 7, 2006

Who should pay for the federal government's mistakes in handing out disaster aid to the wrong people? Not Louisiana, say state officials, who have gone to court to try to prevent the Federal Emergency Management Agency from collecting about $60 million from the state.

The federal government has asked a judge to dismiss the lawsuit, contending that Louisiana cannot refuse to pay charges it disagrees with — even when the charges are the result of fraudulent claims — and that the state has no right to audit FEMA's spending. A hearing on the lawsuit is scheduled for Monday in Federal District Court in Baton Rouge.

Not long after Hurricanes Katrina and Rita hit last year, government and private watchdogs complained about the slowness of FEMA's response and the agency's poor control over its spending. On Wednesday, the federal Government Accountability Office reported that FEMA had made about $1 billion in improper or fraudulent payments but had recouped a tiny fraction of the money.

While the federal government covers the costs of some disaster-relief programs, like housing assistance, it requires states to contribute to others, including the one at the center of Louisiana's dispute. That program, called "other needs assistance," pays for a variety of victims' expenses, like transportation, dental bills and funeral costs.

States that ask the federal agency to administer the program, as Louisiana did, are required to reimburse the federal government for 25 percent of the other needs payments, which in the year after Hurricanes Katrina and Rita topped $1.5 billion, according to court filings. FEMA says it credits states for any improper payments that it recovers.

Louisiana was billed about $384 million and has paid about $320 million. It has deposited the disputed $60 million into a court account.

The disputed figure includes $45 million withheld because the state estimates that about 12 percent of FEMA's other needs spending went to people who were probably not eligible for it. The estimate is based on a sample of payments examined by the office of Steve J. Theriot, Louisiana's legislative auditor. The auditor's office found problem payments among 425 cases it reviewed, according to its Oct. 17 report to the Legislature.

Nine payments went to people who claimed to live in houses that, neighbors or owners said, were unoccupied at the time of the storms, the report said. One payment was sent to someone who did not apply for it and had previously been a victim of identity theft; another was made to someone who claimed to live in a subdivision that had not been built. In many cases, the auditors could not verify that people lived at the addresses they claimed.

Mr. Theriot said some of his counterparts in other states were watching the Louisiana case closely because of their own concerns about FEMA payments.

In January, William O. Monroe, Florida's auditor general, issued a report noting that the federal agency had paid too much to people who said their cars were destroyed by hurricanes in 2004. Mr. Monroe recommended that Florida take stronger steps to ensure that its reimbursements to FEMA were for valid obligations.

Aaron T. Walker, a FEMA spokesman, said in an e-mail message that the agency does not comment on litigation. In the past, Louisiana has paid its share of the other needs assistance, Mr. Walker added.

In court papers, lawyers for the federal government said that requiring the agency to use "labor intensive, detective-style techniques such as interviewing the neighbors and landlords of applicants" would cripple the aid program.

The rest of the contested money, about $15 million, is the state's share of money that FEMA paid to reimburse people who bought generators. The federal agency says the state approved such payments; the state says it did not.

Louisiana had a budget surplus of more than $800 million in its last fiscal year, and is running an even larger surplus this year.

But to state officials, "this is about transparency, accountability and, I guess, in a sense, reciprocity," Mr. Theriot said, explaining that when the federal government gives grants to the state, federal auditors can examine the state's spending and, if they find a problem, demand the money back.

Louisiana wants the same rights when FEMA is spending the state's money, Mr. Theriot said.

"Why should we pay 25 cents on the dollar," he asked, "for errors from making payments to noneligible recipients?"

WAR NEWS:

Panel: Bush's Iraq Policies Have Failed (AP)

By Anne Plummer Flaherty, David Espo

AP, December 6, 2006

President Bush's war policies have failed in almost every regard, the bipartisan Iraq Study Group concluded Wednesday, and it warned of dwindling chances to change course before crisis turns to chaos with dire implications for terrorism, war in the Middle East and higher oil prices around the world.

Nearly four years, $400 billion and more than 2,900 U.S. deaths into a deeply unpopular war, violence is bad and getting worse, there is no guarantee of success and the consequences of failure are great, the high-level panel of five Republicans and five Democrats said in a bleak accounting of U.S. and Iraqi shortcomings.

It said the United States should find ways to pull back most of its combat forces by early 2008 and focus U.S. troops on training and supporting Iraqi units. The U.S. should also begin a "diplomatic offensive" by the end of the month and engage adversaries Iran and Syria in an effort to quell sectarian violence and shore up the fragile Iraqi government, the report said.

It followed by a day the sobering appraisal of Robert Gates, who was confirmed Wednesday as Bush's new Pentagon chief, that the United States is not winning in Iraq.

"Despite a massive effort, stability in Iraq remains elusive and the situation is deteriorating," the independent report said. "The ability of the United States to shape outcomes is diminishing. Time is running out."

The group's recommendations do not endorse either the current White House strategy of staying put in Iraq or calls from Bush's political opponents for a quick pullout or a firm timetable for withdrawal.

"The report is an acknowledgment that there will be no military solution in Iraq. It will require a political solution arrived at through sustained Iraqi and region-wide diplomacy and engagement," said Sen. Chuck Hagel, R-Neb.

Incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., and other Democrats said the ball is in Bush's court.

"If the president is serious about the need for change in Iraq, he will find Democrats ready to work with him in a bipartisan fashion to find a way to end the war as quickly as possible," Pelosi said.

The Iraq panel's leaders said they tried to avoid politically charged language such as "victory," on the one hand or "civil war" on the other, but the words they chose were still powerful. The report says the current strategy is not working and lays out example after example where it has come up short.

As if to underscore that the conflict is hurtling out of control, the military reported that 10 American troops were killed Wednesday, adding to the toll of U.S. forces who have died since the invasion that toppled Saddam Hussein in early 2003. The United States has about 140,000 troops in the country.

"We do not recommend a stay-the-course solution," said James A. Baker III, the former secretary of state and Bush family adviser who co-chaired the commission. "In our opinion, that approach is no longer viable."

Former Rep. Lee Hamilton, D-Ind., the other co-chairman, said the commission agreed with Bush's goal of an Iraq able to govern, protect and sustain itself but that the administration needed new approaches.

"No course of action in Iraq is guaranteed to stop a slide toward chaos," Hamilton said. "Yet, in our view, not all options have been exhausted."

The report has been widely seen as an opportunity for Bush to pivot from policies blamed in large part for Republican losses in midterm elections last month. Bush praised the group's work, but gave no hint of his next move. He said he would give the findings a hard look and urged Congress to do the same.

"This report gives a very tough assessment of the situation in Iraq," Bush said after an early morning briefing from the group of five Republican and five Democratic former government officials and advisers. "It is a report that brings some really very interesting proposals, and we will take every proposal seriously and we will act in a timely fashion."

Bush met later with members of Congress from both political parties and said he wanted to cooperate to "send a message to the American people that the struggle for freedom, the struggle for our security is not the purview of one party over the other."

The commission also briefed members of the Iraqi government by teleconference, and one official there agreed that Iraqis must take responsibility for their own security. "Absolute dependence on foreign troops is not possible," said Deputy Prime Minister Barham Saleh.

Among its 79 recommendations, the group said the United States should reduce political, military or economic support for Iraq if the government in Baghdad cannot make substantial progress. The report said Iraqi leaders have failed to deliver better security or political compromises that would reduce violence, and it implied that a four-month joint U.S.-Iraqi military campaign to reduce violence in Baghdad is hopeless.

"Because none of the operations conducted by U.S. and Iraqi military forces are fundamentally changing the conditions encouraging the sectarian violence, U.S. forces seem to be caught in a mission that has no foreseeable end," the report said.

That was a withering evaluation of a central tenet of the Bush military strategy in Iraq. In Baghdad and elsewhere, U.S. forces are supposed to help Iraqi units "clear, hold and build," shorthand for routing insurgents or other fighters from problem areas, securing those areas from further violence and setting a positive future course.

On the highly emotional issue of troop withdrawals, the commission warned against either a precipitous pullback or an open-ended commitment to a large deployment.

"Military priorities must change," the report said, toward a goal of training, equipping and advising Iraqi forces.

DOJ_NMG_0103239

The report said Bush should put aside misgivings and engage Syria, Iran and the leaders of insurgent forces in negotiations on Iraq's future, to begin by year's end. It urged him to revive efforts at a broader Middle East peace.

The report laid out consequences from bad to worse, including the threat of wider war in the Middle East and reduced oil production that would hurt the global economy.

In a slap at the Pentagon, the commission said there is significant underreporting of the actual level of violence in Iraq. It also faulted the U.S. intelligence effort, saying the government "still does not understand very well either the insurgency in Iraq or the role of the militias."

The commission recommended the number of U.S. troops embedded to train Iraqis should increase dramatically, from 3,000 to 4,000 currently to 10,000 to 20,000. Commission member William Perry, defense secretary in the Clinton administration, said those could be drawn from combat brigades already in Iraq.

The report noted that Iraq costs run about $8 billion a month and that the bills will keep coming. "Caring for veterans and replacing lost equipment will run into the hundreds of billions of dollars," the commission said. "Estimates run as high as $2 trillion for the final cost of the U.S. involvement in Iraq."

Iraq Panel Proposes Major Strategy Shift (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz, Robin Wright

The Washington Post, December 7, 2006

A panel of prominent elder leaders yesterday offered a stinging assessment of virtually every aspect of the U.S. venture in Iraq and called for a reshaping of the American military presence and a new Middle East diplomatic initiative to prevent the country from sliding into anarchy.

The long-awaited report from the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, co-chaired by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former Indiana congressman Lee H. Hamilton, said that the focus of U.S. troops in Iraq should shift from combat to training Iraqi soldiers and police, and that all combat brigades not necessary for force protection could be withdrawn by early 2008.

At the same time, the panel said, the United States should launch a new round of Middle East diplomacy, including a revived effort to solve the Israeli-Palestinian dispute, aimed at building an international consensus for stabilizing Iraq. As part of this initiative, the group urged the Bush administration to break with its policy of not having high-level dialogues with Iran and Syria, though members of the commission held out little hope that the two countries, longtime rivals of the United States, would be interested in joining the effort.

As they presented their findings, members of the commission made clear their belief that the Bush administration's Iraq policy is failing. They said they hope that the report would prove to be a catalyst of a new bipartisanship on Iraq after years of acrimony in U.S. politics, and that it would help bring consensus to the American people.

Whether both can be achieved is uncertain. Democrats on Capitol Hill welcomed the report but said that the onus is on President Bush to implement the recommendations. For his part, Bush thanked the Iraq Study Group and described its report as "an opportunity to find common ground." But he offered no immediate endorsement or rejection of any of its recommendations.

As Baker and Hamilton unveiled the report at a Capitol Hill news conference with the other eight panel members, the co-chairmen warned that success in Iraq would not be guaranteed even if all their 79 recommendations were adopted by Congress and the administration.

"There is no magic formula that will solve the problems of Iraq," said Baker, a Republican. "But to give the Iraqi government a chance to succeed, United States policy must be focused more broadly than on military strategy alone or on Iraq alone. It must seek the active and constructive engagement of all governments that have an interest in avoiding chaos in Iraq."

Hamilton, a Democrat, said the situation in Iraq is very grave. "We do not know if it can be turned around, but we think we have an obligation to try; and if the recommendations that we have made are effectively implemented, there is at least a chance that you can see established a stable government in Iraq," he said. "The task ahead of us is daunting . . . but it is not, by any means, lost."

Except for the recommendations on Iran and Syria, the panel appeared to steer away from language that might inflame the Bush administration, which has said that it will consider the Iraq Study Group report as part of its own review of strategy and tactics in Iraq. The panel did not, for instance, set a formal timetable for troop withdrawal, instead setting 2008 as a goal for the withdrawal of U.S. combat brigades based on an estimate by U.S. commanders for when Iraqi forces will be ready to take charge of the country's security needs.

But in language and tone, the 96-page report offered an assessment of the U.S. mission in Iraq that was strikingly different from what has been heard until recently from the White House. There was no mention of the goal of establishing democracy, and no discussion of "victory" or the centrality of Iraq in "the war on terror" -- staples of Bush rhetoric.

Although the group stressed that it did not look backward at the mistakes in Iraq -- "how the house got on fire," in the words of panel member Vernon E. Jordan Jr., a Democratic power broker -- it offered scathing assessments of the competence of the Iraqi government, the accuracy of U.S. intelligence on the insurgency, the lack of coordination of economic assistance and many other issues. The panel took a veiled shot at outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, saying that Robert M. Gates, the incoming Pentagon chief, who was confirmed by the Senate yesterday, should create "an environment in which the senior military feel free to offer independent advice" to the president and other civilian leaders.

Coming from a group made up in part by five stalwarts of the Republican establishment -- including former attorney general Edwin Meese III, retired Supreme Court justice Sandra Day O'Connor and Baker himself, a longtime associate of former president George H.W. Bush -- the sober report seemed likely to accelerate the reevaluation of Iraq policy now being reviewed by Congress and the administration, according to lawmakers and others involved in policymaking. But experts inside and outside the government voiced some skepticism that the recommendations themselves amounted to a coherent strategy that could accomplish the goal of stabilizing Iraq and reducing the U.S. military presence there.

Congressional Democrats embraced the report's call for a change in tactics in Iraq, and Republicans -- with at least one notable exception in presidential hopeful Sen. John McCain (Ariz.) -- generally praised the report, as well. But in a sign of the potential roadblocks ahead, Democratic aides said privately that Democrats want to make it clear that Bush still "owns" the Iraq war, and that if the panel's recommendations fail, they want the blame to fall on Bush, not on them.

"The president has the ball in his court now," said incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.). McCain offered a toughly worded statement, questioning the usefulness of reaching out to Syria and Iran, and saying that the link between an Arab-Israeli peace initiative and violence in Iraq "seems tenuous at best."

The most dramatic departure from U.S. policy -- and almost certainly the most controversial part of the report for the Bush administration -- is the panel's call for a "diplomatic offensive" with a region-wide approach to stabilizing Iraq.

The report concluded that the major Middle East flashpoints -- Iraq, the Arab-Israeli conflict, Iran, Lebanon, the need for political reform, Islamic extremism and terrorism -- are all "intricately linked." It recommended actions on problems that have been intractable for more than six decades.

Recommendation 16, for example, called for Israel to return the Golan Heights to Syria, with U.S. security guarantees. In exchange, Syria should agree to peace with Israel, end meddling in Lebanon and Iraq, end aid for Hezbollah, help persuade Hamas to recognize Israel's right to exist and intervene to win the release of captured Israeli soldiers.

The report called for the new strategy to be launched by the end of December. The first step is to immediately organize an International Support Group bringing together all of Iraq's neighbors, most notably Iran and Syria, as well as all the Persian Gulf states, Egypt, the five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council and the European Union.

"In diplomacy, a nation can and should engage its adversaries and enemies to try to resolve conflicts and differences consistent with its own interests," the report said. At the news conference, Baker acknowledged that the limited contacts with Iran already indicate that Tehran is not "chomping at the bit" to hold talks on Iraq.

A senior Iranian official, who was not authorized to comment publicly, said he was disappointed with the report. "The only carrot they offer is no regime change," he said. "That's a helluva way to ask for help. That's not a carrot to offer Iran."

Another major point of the panel's report is the need to set more specific goals for the Iraqi government on national reconciliation, security and governance. The members said the United States should make clear that continued economic, military and political support will be conditioned on Iraq's performance in relation to the milestones.

The panel also recommended shifting the focus of the 140,000 U.S. troops in Iraq from combat to training -- a process the administration says has already begun. The Iraqi army should take more responsibility for security, but while the process is underway, the United States should embed substantially more U.S. military personnel in Iraqi units for advice and staff assistance, the panel said.

Such a mission could involve 10,000 to 20,000 U.S. troops, compared with the 3,000 to 4,000 now involved in training and advisory roles. The panel said that, for a variety of reasons, the United States should not make an "open-ended" commitment to keep large numbers of U.S. troops in Iraq, including the need to give Iraqis an incentive to make the political changes necessary to quell sectarian violence.

Rejecting the idea of sustained increases in troop levels, the panel said U.S. forces are stretched so thin in the world that it doubted the troops would be available -- while also questioning the very premise. "While it is clear the presence of U.S. troops in Iraq is moderating the violence," the panel members said, "there is little evidence that the long-term deployment of U.S. troops by itself has led or will lead to fundamental improvements in the security situation."

Panel Finds Bush Policies Are Not Working In Iraq (LAT)

By Paul Richter

The Los Angeles Times, December 7, 2006

Washington — Bush administration policies have set off a "slide toward chaos" in Iraq, a bipartisan national commission declared Wednesday in a major reappraisal that challenges President Bush's view of the war and builds new pressure for disengagement.

In uncompromising and dismal terms, the panel said the continuing deterioration in Iraq could inflame the entire region in a deadly war that would further curtail U.S. influence throughout the world. It issued 79 recommendations that counter many hardened administration stances, such as holding talks with Syria and Iran and reassigning U.S. forces as advisers -- a proposal that could enable the withdrawal of combat troops by early 2008.

"The current approach is not working, and the ability of the United States to influence events is diminishing," said former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton, D-Ind., who co-chairs the 10-member Iraq Study Group along with former Secretary of State James A. Baker III. "Many Americans are understandably dissatisfied. Our ship of state has hit rough waters. It must now chart a new way forward."

The report of the Iraq Study Group, coming after midterm elections widely seen as a repudiation of Bush's war policy, is certain to further transform the growing national debate on the war, with Democrats and many Republicans agreeing Wednesday that its conclusions pointed to the urgent need for new policies.

But even as pressure grows on the White House to change course, Bush stopped short of any immediate endorsement of the recommendations. The president has signaled that he is considering strategy proposals from a number of sources, but told members of the study group in a morning meeting that he viewed their report as "unique" because of the panel's bipartisan composition.

The commission's findings were issued on a day when the military reported 10 U.S. soldiers were killed, the highest daily toll in weeks and a reminder of the results of a war policy now widely seen as failing.

The report also came a day after Robert M. Gates, Bush's nominee to head the Pentagon, told Congress that America was not winning the war, and just days after disclosure of a memo by outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld in which he said that U.S. strategy required a "major adjustment."

In its 96-page report, the panel urged the Bush administration to initiate a "diplomatic offensive" to stabilize Iraq, and include talks with Syria and Iran. They recommended that U.S. forces step up their shift from combat to an advisory role, thus allowing the Pentagon to withdraw nearly all of its 15 combat brigades by early 2008.

And they urged the administration to actively prod leaders of Iraq's government toward political progress, withholding military, economic and diplomatic help if necessary. The report said the administration should set benchmarks for progress by Iraqis, and should make clear that the mission is "not open-ended."

The five Republicans and five Democrats urged the recommendations be instituted as a set. "Our three most important recommendations are equally important and reinforce one another," Hamilton said.

For Bush to accept the recommendations, he would have to change course on a number of key issues. He has largely ruled out talks with Syria and Iran, and resisted proposals for setting timetables for Iraqi government progress.

And he has shown no interest in pressing for an Israeli-Palestinian settlement, as the report urged, until the Palestinians establish a government that wins American approval and take other steps.

The report, approved by such conservatives as former Reagan administration Attorney General Edwin Meese III and former Sen. Alan K. Simpson, R-Wyo., was striking in its harsh critique of conditions in Iraq nearly four years after the U.S. invasion.

While the White House continues to point to signs of progress, the report emphasized the "great suffering" of ordinary Iraqis, persistent disorder, government inefficiency and corruption, economic setbacks, and the weaknesses of the Iraqi military and police. The report criticized the U.S. reconstruction effort -- saying that among U.S. government agencies, "there are no clear lines establishing who is in charge" -- and faulted Iraq's neighbors and international donor countries for doing little to help it.

It noted that the war has result in nearly 2,900 American deaths, 21,000 wounded, and costs projected to rise to $2 trillion.

"The United States is spending $2 billion a week," commission members wrote. "Our ability to respond to other international crises is constrained. A majority of the American people are soured on this war. This level of expense is not sustainable over an extended period, especially when progress is not being made."

The report also found that the U.S. military was much worse for the experience, countering years of more favorable assessments by Defense officials.

"U.S. military forces, especially our ground forces, have been stretched nearly to the breaking point by the repeated deployments in Iraq, with attendant casualties. . . greater difficulty in recruiting and accelerated wear on equipment," the report said.

The report found that the traditional partnership between uniformed services and civilian leaders "has frayed, and civil-military relations need to be repaired."

The report faulted U.S. practices for "under-reporting" violence in Iraq, saying American officials leave out many deaths that may be the result of war or insurgent action.

"The standard for recording attacks acts as a filter to keep events out of reports and databases," the report said. "A murder of an Iraqi is not necessarily counted as an attack."

The effect is such that on one day in July, U.S. officials recorded 93 attacks or significant acts of violence. But the commission members said a review of reports uncovered 1,100 acts of violence.

For all that, the future could be far worse, the report said.

"We do not recommend a 'stay the course' solution," Baker said at a morning press conference. "In our opinion, that approach is no longer viable."

Asked if the group accepted Bush's earlier goal of making Iraq a model for democracy in the Middle East, panel members said they preferred to focus on the more recently stated goals: making the country stable, self governing, and secure.

The report rejected the idea of an immediate troop withdrawal, saying that would likely intensify violence and create a dangerous power vacuum. It said that a large increase in U.S. troops would not solve the essential problem: the need for a political deal between Iraqi factions.

The panel ruled out proposals calling for sharply decentralizing the country into three sections, arguing that the mix of ethnic and religious populations would make separating them difficult and dangerous.

At the heart of the Iraq Study Group's proposal is its recommendation for a "new diplomatic offensive" that it said U.S. officials should launch by the end of the year. Panel members recommended formation of a standing group of countries and organizations -- much as world powers formed a "contact group" to deal with Afghanistan after U.S. troops toppled the Taliban in 2002.

The new group would consist of Iraq's neighbors, key regional allies such as Egypt, the Persian Gulf states, the five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council, and the European Union.

The panel argued that a regional solution was needed because all of the Mideast's problem are so closely linked.

As an example, it said that resistance to the U.S. presence as well as support for militant Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr both had "spiked" in the aftermath of the Israeli bombing campaign in Lebanon during the summer.

DOJ_NMG_0103243

The group said that the diplomatic offensive should include, as soon as possible, unconditional meetings between Israel, Lebanon and Syria on one hand, and between Israel and Palestinians on the other -- provided the Palestinians represented acknowledged Israel's right to exist.

Baker staunchly defended the need for U.S. officials to deal with Syria and Iran, even though administration officials believe that would be rewarding bad behavior by ignoring Iran's ambitions to develop a nuclear program.

"For 40 years we talked to the Soviet Union during a time when they were committed to wiping us off the face of the Earth," Baker said. "We're talking not about talking to be talking; we're talking about tough diplomacy."

The group also urged that the United States, in the interests of reducing Iraqi opposition, declare publicly that it has no interest in permanent military bases or designs on Iraqi oil. However, the group said that the U.S. government should consider requests from the Iraqis to maintain temporary bases.

The idea of withdrawing all combat brigades by 2008 was not among the 79 recommendations. But the report's narrative said that, "subject to unexpected developments," almost all combat units could be pulled out by then.

The report said that an open ended commitment provided no incentive for the Iraqi government to move toward reconciliation.

"While it is clear that the presence of U.S. troops in Iraq is moderating the violence, there is little evidence that the long term deployment of U.S. troops by itself has or will lead to fundamental improvements in the security situation," it said.

In Baghdad, Iraqis watching news reports on Arabic language television greeted the findings with a mix of skepticism and guarded hope.

"This study came late," said university professor Ammar Salman, 51. "We have lost three years because of the conflicts inside the Bush administration."

Times staff writers Solomon Moore in Baghdad, Kim Murphy in London and Greg Miller in Washington contributed to this report.

President Promises "Timely" Response (USAT)

By Bill Nichols, Barbara Slavin

USA Today, December 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — A much-awaited report on Iraq called for U.S. troop withdrawals by 2008 to prevent its slide toward "chaos," bringing a pledge by President Bush to weigh its findings and prompting calls from Congress for a swift change of course.

Conditions in Iraq are "grave and deteriorating," according to the report from the congressionally mandated, bipartisan Iraq Study Group. It said Bush's policy in Iraq "is not working."

One panel member, former Supreme Court justice Sandra Day O'Connor, told USA TODAY, "You can see for yourself the situation is bad on the ground."

"There's some very good ideas in there," Bush said after meeting with members of Congress on Wednesday. "Not all of us around the table agree with every idea, but we do agree that it shows that bipartisan consensus on important issues is possible."

Leading Democrats said the report underscores the need for fundamental change. House Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., said the commission "has concluded the president's Iraq policy has failed and must be changed. As the November elections clearly demonstrated, that is an assessment shared by the American people."

The 10-member group, co-chaired by former secretary of State James Baker and former representative Lee Hamilton, D-Ind., recommended:

•Pulling U.S. troops back from combat roles by early 2008.

•Reducing support for the Iraqi government if it fails to meet benchmarks.

•A new Middle East peace initiative and talks with Iran and Syria.

The report also accused the Pentagon of underreporting the level of violence in Iraq and faulted U.S. intelligence for its lack of understanding of Iraq.

The study's release came on the same day that 10 U.S. soldiers were killed in Iraq, according to the U.S. military.

Iraq Report Adds Pressure On Bush To Plan Pullback (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen, Neil King

The Wall Street Journal, December 7, 2006

The bipartisan Iraq Study Group's searing critique of Bush administration policy is already reshaping the debate over the war -- with its prescription for withdrawing most U.S. troops by a specific date and dismissal of calls to partition Iraq or send additional American forces there.

The report, issued yesterday by a panel headed by former Secretary of State James Baker III and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton, fleshes out some of the broad suggestions that had been widely advertised before its public release. These include a refusal to embrace an immediate troop withdrawal and a recommendation to convene an international conference to enlist nations such as Iran and Syria to help quell the violence in Iraq.

But the report also offers several surprises. Its portrait of the situation in Iraq is far gloomier than many had expected. And while it doesn't lay out a detailed timetable for a full withdrawal, its call to have most combat troops out by March 2008 is more explicit than had been anticipated.

Policy makers and the public are likely to view events in Iraq through the lens of the report -- already widely available in paperback form -- well into the coming year. A circuit of congressional hearings, talk shows and lectures featuring the panel members ensures their advice will remain in headlines for the foreseeable future.

Those favoring withdrawal almost certainly will coalesce around the March 2008 target, and the report's dire description of the situation in Iraq is likely to be seized upon by Democrats and other war critics as evidence that the administration must make broader changes to its strategy.

The report offers a deeply pessimistic assessment of events in Iraq and catalogues a long list of American failures there. It concludes that current U.S. policy is failing despite the nearly 3,000 American military personnel who have been killed and estimates that the financial cost could ultimately exceed $2 trillion.

"The situation in Iraq is very, very serious," Mr. Hamilton told reporters. "We do not know if it can be turned around."

The panel offers 79 specific recommendations for far-reaching changes in U.S. policy across the Middle East as part of a last-ditch effort to stabilize Iraq. It suggests leaving behind troops after March 2008 who would focus almost exclusively on training Iraqi forces, who the panel describes at present as ineffectual and largely driven by sectarian motivations rather than loyalty to the central government.

Neither the chief panelists nor their report are going to fade away soon -- meaning the spotlight will remain on the Bush administration's Iraq policy. Messrs. Baker and Hamilton are already booked to testify before at least a dozen congressional panels over the next month. They, along with a number of others from the study group, are expected to be all over the television talk shows at least through the weekend.

The paperback of the government-funded report, "The Iraq Study Group: The Way Forward -- A New Approach," is published by Bertelsmann AG Vintage Books and is selling briskly in many parts of the country. It jumped to No. 22 on the Amazon.com sales-ranking list yesterday. The publisher said sales are so strong that it expected to go back to the press for the third time by the end of business yesterday.

Washington bureau chief Jerry Seib14 comments on the report, saying it creates an opening for the White House to adjust its Iraq policy without acknowledging the policy was flawed.

President Bush praised the report for offering "interesting proposals" and said his administration will "take every proposal seriously." One study-group panelist, former Defense Secretary William Perry, said he went into a morning meeting with Mr. Bush convinced that the president "was building up antibodies toward the whole report" but came away "pleasantly surprised." Mr. Bush, he said, seemed "clearly interested in making even more of a course correction in the weeks and months ahead."

Still, a senior administration official said the White House doesn't feel bound by the report and is unlikely to implement many of its recommendations, especially regarding calls for diplomatic outreach to U.S. foes Syria and Iran. Mr. Bush, speaking to reporters at the White House, said "we probably won't agree with every proposal." 15

In its report, the commission calls for a new diplomatic offensive to enlist Iran and Syria in the effort to stabilize Iraq, with which both share a border. It says Washington could offer them entry into the World Trade Organization, and help in pressing the Israelis to return the disputed Golan Heights to Syria as part of a new round of land-for-peace negotiations between Israel and its Arab neighbors.

At the same time, the panel acknowledges that conditions in Iraq have deteriorated so significantly that even if its recommendations were fully implemented, it might be too late to prevent sectarian warfare from igniting a regional conflagration that engulfs neighboring states.

"Despite a massive effort, stability in Iraq remains elusive and the situation is deteriorating," the report said. "The ability of the United States to shape outcomes is diminishing. Time is running out."

Launched by Congress nine months ago to provide a fresh take in light of growing dismay with U.S. strategy in Iraq, the 10-member panel took on inordinate significance in recent weeks amid soaring alarm at Iraq's growing chaos. Panelists had indicated privately in recent days that they were concerned by growing public expectations that they would offer a magic cure for Iraq's problems. Indeed, the report is as notable for its rejection of some of the most prominent proposals on Iraq as for its own recommendations.

In the aftermath of midterm elections in which voter anger about the war helped Democrats retake the House and Senate, lawmakers from both parties have scrambled to unveil new ideas for how to salvage the Iraq situation. Republican Sen. John McCain of Arizona has called for sending tens of thousands of additional U.S. forces, while Sen. Joseph Biden, a Delaware Democrat, has proposed dividing Iraq into three regions along ethnic and religious lines. The White House has rejected mounting calls for a course correction in Iraq, insisting it would maintain the current numbers of U.S. military personnel in Iraq indefinitely.

The report effectively rejects both the administration's strategy and several leading congressional proposals. It says the current U.S. approach isn't working and that "making no changes in policy would simply delay the day of reckoning at a high cost."

"We do not recommend a stay-the-course solution," Mr. Baker told reporters yesterday. "In our opinion, that approach is no longer viable."

At the same time, the panel rejects sending in more troops. It says the U.S. military has been stretched thin by repeated deployments to Iraq, and the violence there requires a political, not military, solution. It warns that partitioning the country would risk triggering ethnic cleansing and military intervention by neighboring states. And it cautions that a premature U.S. withdrawal could spark even greater sectarian warfare and destabilize the country so completely that "the long-range consequences could eventually require the United States to return."

The panel doesn't address a proposal by Democratic Rep. John Murtha of Pennsylvania to drastically cut the number of U.S. military personnel in Iraq by shifting them to bases in neighboring countries such as Kuwait.

The 142-page report outlines three central recommendations: drastically shrinking the size and mission of American military forces in Iraq; reaching out to Iran and Syria; and linking future American aid to signs that the Iraqi government is making "substantial progress toward the achievement of milestones on national reconciliation, security, and governance."

The commission recommends a major shift in the U.S. military's role, turning what has essentially been a sideshow -- training the Iraqi Army -- into the main event. It proposes multiplying the size of the advisory team to between 15,000 and 20,000 troops, from about 4,000 currently. The report suggests only the "most highly qualified U.S. officials and military personnel should be assigned to the imbedded teams," which live with Iraqi units and give them constant training and mentoring.

Senior military officials have said for several weeks that the U.S. military is weighing ways to increase the size and scope of the advisory effort, which commanders see as a necessary precondition for any future withdrawal.

The panel's diplomatic recommendations are proving more controversial. The Bush administration reacted coolly to a proposal that it reach out to Iran, especially to the panel's assertion that Tehran's Shiite Muslim regime might be coaxed into cooperation with offers of entry into the WTO or U.S. promises to push harder on the Israeli-Arab peace process.

Iran has been emboldened by U.S. failures in Iraq and the ascendancy of Shiite influence across the Middle East. Tehran has shown little willingness to engage in talks with the U.S. on Iraq unless the Bush administration backs off attempts to curb the Iranian nuclear program.

U.S. officials say Sunni Muslim Arab rulers in Saudi Arabia and other American allies in the region have expressed deep concern about the prospect of greater U.S. engagement with Iran. Arab leaders have warned that such talks would embolden Iran and fuel secessionist feelings among their own restive Shiite populations.

Messrs. Baker and Hamilton met with various Iranian and Syrian officials in recent weeks, and the panel's report acknowledges that the prospects of engaging Tehran aren't promising. Iran's leaders "are likely to say they will not participate in diplomatic efforts" on Iraq, it says, but adds that Syrian officials are far more interested in engagement.

The panel's call for Washington to push Israel to quickly seal peace deals with both the Palestinians and the Syrians struck many critics as overly optimistic. The report envisions a sweeping arrangement in which Israel would return the Golan Heights to Syria, give back the Shebaa Farms parcel to Lebanon and craft a comprehensive settlement with the Palestinians in the occupied West Bank and Gaza Strip.

Resolving the Israeli-Arab dispute has proven elusive for at least five U.S. administrations dating back to the 1970s, and there are few signs today that Israeli or Arab rulers are ready to make the compromises necessary to broker the agreements. The politically weakened Bush administration has spent the past six years avoiding such deep involvement in the Mideast peace process.

Iraq Study Group Report Warns Of Deteriorating Situation (MCT)

By Ron Hutcheson

McClatchy, December 7, 2006

WASHINGTON- Warning that "the situation in Iraq is grave and deteriorating," a blue-ribbon bipartisan commission said Wednesday that the United States should start withdrawing combat troops next year and force Iraqis to take more responsibility for their own fate.

The eagerly anticipated report by the Iraq Study Group called for a get-tough approach that would set clear milestones for the Iraqis in conjunction with a gradual withdrawal of U.S. troops. The report, delivered to President Bush this morning, did not offer a firm timetable for withdrawal, but suggested that most U.S. troops should leave over the coming year.

"The most important questions about Iraq's future are now the responsibility of Iraqis…The United States must not make an open-ended commitment to keep large numbers of American troops deployed in Iraq," the report's executive summary says.

The report suggests that nearly all U.S. combat troops should be out of Iraq by early 2008, "subject to unexpected developments in the security situation." The commission also said that troop levels should "significantly increase" in the short term to help Iraqis take over.

The recommendation would reverse Bush's longstanding commitment to stay in Iraq as long as it takes to transform the former dictatorship into a viable democracy. After meeting with the 10-member group this morning, Bush said he welcomed the commission's advice, but signaled that neither he nor members of Congress would be bound by it.

"While they won't agree with every proposal - and we probably won't agree with every proposal - it, nevertheless, is an opportunity to come together and to work together on this important issue."

The bipartisan panel, headed by former Secretary of State James Baker and former Rep. Lee Hamilton, D-Ind., was appointed by Congress to assess the situation in Iraq and recommend policy changes. In a letter accompanying the report, Baker and Hamilton acknowledged that their suggestions may make little difference.

"There is no magic bullet to solve the problems of Iraq," they wrote. "No one can guarantee that any course of action in Iraq at this point will stop sectarian warfare, growing violence, or a slide toward chaos. If current trends continue, the potential consequences are severe."

The commission also called for a new regional diplomatic initiative, including talks with Iran and Syria; a renewed effort to solve the Israeli-Palestinian conflict; and an accelerated program to train Iraqi security forces.

Iraq Panel Calls For Radical Change Of Course (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo, Caroline Daniel, Edward Luce

Financial Times, December 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0103247

The Iraq Study Group called for a radical change of course in US policy on Wednesday, saying conditions in Iraq were "grave and deteriorating".

Its report set out how the US was spending $2bn a week on an unpopular conflict in which nearly 100 Americans were dying monthly. The ISG said that, more than three years after the US-led invasion, its forces were stretched "nearly to the breaking point". On Wednesday alone, 10 US soldiers were killed in Iraq.

Challenging many of the tenets of George W. Bush's foreign policy, the bipartisan 10-member commission that prepared the report said a dramatic change of course was needed to avoid "severe consequences".

The ISG warned: "A slide toward chaos could trigger the collapse of Iraq's government and a humanitarian crisis."

The report is particularly damaging to Tony Blair, who travelled to Washington on Wednesday night to meet Mr Bush, both because it highlights the limits of British influence on US policymaking and because the UK premier is inextricably linked with the Bush administration's battle plan.

The report urged Mr Bush to boost efforts to train Iraqi forces, which it said could let most US troops leave by 2008. The report urged the White House to increase pressure on the Iraqi government and launch a Middle East initiative, including direct talks with Syria and Iran.

Mr Bush welcomed what he called a "very tough assessment" and vowed to take its conclusions "seriously". He said the report would provide "common ground" for Democrats and Republicans to work together. But the report was attacked by analysts on right and left. One said it put forward a "tired and discredited consensus". Others said the report was an anticlimax. "An elephant gives birth to a mouse," was the headline of an article by Tony Cordesman, an analyst at the Centre for International Strategic Studies.

The commission led by James Baker, former secretary of state, and Lee Hamilton, a former Democratic congressman, said there was "no magic formula". It said: "no one can guarantee that any course of action in Iraq...will stop sectarian warfare".

The ISG chided Iraq's government for "not adequately advancing national reconciliation" or providing basic security or services. It said the US "must not make an open-ended commitment to keep large numbers of American troops in Iraq".

The group added: "If the Iraqi government does not make substantial progress toward the achievement of milestones on national reconciliation, security, and governance, the US should reduce its political, military or economic support."

The commission recommended that the US move soldiers from combat missions to training Iraqi forces, saying the change could be accomplished without raising the number of American troops.

The report urged the US to hold talks with Iran and Syria – something Mr Bush has adamantly refused to do. Carl Levin, incoming Democrat chairman of the Senate armed services committee, called the report a "major blow" to the administration's "stay the course" policy.

Panel Urges Basic Shift In U.S. Policy In Iraq (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, December 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 6 — A bipartisan commission warned Wednesday that "the situation in Iraq is grave and deteriorating," and it handed President Bush both a rebuke for his current strategy and a detailed blueprint for a fundamentally different approach, including the pullback of all American combat brigades over the next 15 months.

In unusually sweeping and blunt language, the panel of five Republicans and five Democrats issued 79 specific recommendations.

These included a call for direct engagement with Syria and Iran as part of a "new diplomatic offensive," jump-starting the Israeli-Palestinian peace effort, and a clear declaration that the United States would reduce its support to Iraq unless Baghdad made "substantial progress" on reconciliation and security.

Mr. Bush has refused to deal with Syria and Iran, and as recently as last week, he assured Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki that the American commitment to Iraq would be undiminished until victory was achieved.

But the commission, led by James A. Baker III and Lee H. Hamilton, argued that while Americans might be in Iraq for years, the Iraqis must understand that the American military commitment was not "open ended." It is time, the panel said, for the United States to "begin to move its combat forces out of Iraq responsibly."

The detailed prescription called for much more aggressive diplomatic efforts in the Middle East than the Bush administration has been willing to embrace. Its calls for reconciliation and reform in Iraq and an overhaul of the American military role would also mark major departures in the American strategy.

Members of the commission said they believed that their recommendations would improve prospects for success in Iraq, but they said there was no guarantee against failure.

"The current approach is not working, and the ability of the United States to influence events is diminishing," Mr. Hamilton said at a news conference on Capitol Hill. "Our ship of state has hit rough waters. It must now chart a new way forward."

Administration officials said they expected President Bush to announce his own "way forward" this month. They were careful not to take issue with the report's findings in public, and said Mr. Bush had yet to make firm decisions. But some suggested that the diplomatic strategy in the report better fit the Middle East of 15 years ago, when Mr. Baker served as secretary of state.

What played out on Wednesday morning, from the White House to Capitol Hill, was a remarkable condemnation of American policy drift in the biggest and most divisive military conflict to involve American forces since Vietnam. It was all the more unusual because Mr. Baker was secretary of state to Mr. Bush's father, and because the bipartisan group managed to come up with unanimous recommendations.

The report was delivered in an atmosphere of mounting anxiety about the war, a month after midterm elections that brought the Democrats to power in Congress and prompted Mr. Bush to oust Donald H. Rumsfeld as defense secretary.

On Wednesday the Senate voted overwhelmingly to confirm Robert M. Gates as the next defense secretary, after hearings in which he acknowledged that the United States was not winning the war and that the region could be on the brink of much broader conflict.

Mr. Baker, Mr. Hamilton and their eight colleagues presented their recommendations to Mr. Bush and to leaders of Congress beginning early on Wednesday, and then spoke to Mr. Maliki via conference call. Mr. Bush called the assessment "tough" and said each recommendation would be taken "seriously."

Mr. Bush, one commission member said, "was very gracious and did not push back."

Commission members said they believed that their report, which was downloaded more than 400,000 times from the computer servers of the United States Institute of Peace in the first five hours after its release, had fundamentally changed the debate. Now, said one member, the former Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, "it really is out of our hands."

Leon E. Panetta, a commission member who served as chief of staff to President Clinton, said, "The country cannot be at war and as divided as we are today."

The panel was careful to avoid phrases and rigid timelines that might alienate the White House. But the group also clearly tried to box the president in, presenting its recommendations as a comprehensive strategy that would work only if implemented in full.

That appeared to be a warning to Mr. Bush, who in recent days has said he would consider the independent panel's findings alongside studies by the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the National Security Council, and has suggested that he would pick the best elements of each.

The commission did not embrace the goal of "victory in Iraq," which President Bush laid out as his own strategy a year ago, nor did its report echo the White House's early aspiration that Iraq might be transformed into a democracy in the near future. "We want to stay current," Mr. Hamilton said briskly.

As the stated goal in Iraq, the panel chose instead the formulation that Mr. Bush has adopted most recently: to establish a country that can sustain itself, govern itself and defend itself. "That was the latest elaboration of the goal," Mr. Baker said, "and that's the one we're working with."

The findings left Washington awash in speculation over whether Mr. Bush would embark on a huge policy reversal. To do so would mark an admission that three and a half years of strategy had failed, and that his repeated assurances that "absolutely, we're winning" were based more on optimism than realism.

The committee rejected a stricter timeline for withdrawal advocated by one member, William J. Perry, a defense secretary under President Clinton, though Mr. Perry persuaded the commission to set clear goals for the withdrawal of troops.

Jack D. Crouch II, the president's deputy national security adviser, was said by administration officials to be putting together options for Mr. Bush, and they said the president was determined to come up with an approach that, one senior aide said, "borrowed from the panel's findings, but is distinctly his own."

Democrats largely embraced the findings. Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader, said the group had done "a tremendous and historic service" by declaring "there must be a change in Iraq, and there is no time to lose."

But other Democrats were clearly disappointed that the commission did not embrace calls for a rapid withdrawal, as Representative John P. Murtha recommended a year ago, or a partition of the country, as Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., the Delaware Democrat soon to lead the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, has said is necessary.

Mr. Bush can easily accept some of the findings, including a call for a fivefold increase in American trainers working alongside Iraqi forces.

The commission's report included blistering critiques of current policy. It said, for example, that intelligence agencies had far too few people with an understanding of the roots of the insurgency in Iraq.

"We were told there are fewer than 10 analysts on the job at the Defense Intelligence Agency who have more than two years' experience in analyzing the insurgency," the report said.

The speed and phasing of the military pullback was the most contentious issue with the commission, and the result is unlikely to satisfy critics on either side. The panel, for example, adopted the core of a proposal made by Mr. Perry to vastly increase training of Iraqi forces while simultaneously pulling back combat brigades, a "train and retreat" scenario that some in the military say is already under way.

Another Democratic member, former Senator Charles S. Robb of Virginia, argued for a surge of additional troops to stabilize Baghdad, an idea the commission was not willing to embrace fully. Instead, it left open the possibility of supporting a "short-term redeployment or surge of American combat forces to stabilize Baghdad, or to speed up the training and equipping mission, if the U.S. commander in Iraq determines that such steps would be effective."

But the key proposal, No. 21, is that the United States should tell the Iraqis that failure to meet their own milestones will only accelerate American withdrawal, or result in a reduction of American support.

"If the Iraqi government does not make substantial progress toward the achievement of milestones on national reconciliation, security and governance, the United States should reduce its political, military or economic support for the Iraqi government," the report says.

Advocates of that approach said it was a long-overdue effort to shift responsibility onto the Iraqis. "If Iraq continues to fail, or failed worse, it means you have put the lion's share of the blame on the Iraqis," said Richard N. Haass, president of the Council on Foreign Relations, a critic of the decision to invade Iraq when he served in the State Department.

Critics of the panel's conclusion called the approach naïve. "The study group is threatening to weaken a weak government," said Anthony H. Cordesman of the Center for Strategic and International Studies, one of the groups that helped sponsor the study group, which was established by Congress. And, he added: "There is no 'Plan B.' The report does not address what happens if events spiral out of control."

The most controversial element of the diplomatic strategy is the panel's case for engaging Iran, though Mr. Baker and Mr. Hamilton, the chairmen, acknowledged in an interview that they thought it unlikely the Iranians would cooperate. Mr. Baker insisted that even if that effort failed, "the world would see their rejectionist attitude."

Time Running Out In Iraq, Panel Says (BSUN)

By Julie Hirschfeld Davis

The Baltimore Sun, December 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0103250

WASHINGTON -- President Bush's Iraq policy "is not working" and he is running out of time to salvage it, a bipartisan panel said Wednesday, in a grim and strongly worded report that called for major reversals of his most firmly held stances but rejected a quick troop withdrawal.

The Iraq Study Group called for a major diplomatic push -- including one-on-one talks with Iran and Syria, which the president has rejected -- to help stabilize Iraq. It also advocated a change in the mission of U.S. forces that could allow some combat troops to pull out by early 2008 and for Bush to pressure the Iraqi government to quickly secure its own country or risk losing U.S. support.

Overall, the report -- delivered to Bush at an early-morning White House meeting and unveiled later in a Capitol Hill news conference -- was a strong rebuke to the president's approach in Iraq, presented as a kind of last-ditch effort to avoid an unfolding catastrophe that has become the driving reality of his presidency.

"The ability of the United States to shape outcomes is diminishing," the group wrote. "Time is running out."

"We do not recommend a stay-the-course solution. In our view, that approach is no longer viable," said James A. Baker III, the Republican former secretary of state and a close Bush family friend who co-chaired the panel. "As a matter of humanitarian concern, as a matter of national interest and as a matter of practical necessity, it is time to find a new way forward, a new approach."

The 10-member panel, co-chaired by former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton, a Democrat, offered a bleak assessment of the situation in Iraq, in stark contrast to Bush's own declarations about the war. The situation, they wrote, is "grave and deteriorating," and there is no "magic formula" nor "guarantee of success" in Iraq.

Calling conditions there "very, very serious," Hamilton said, "We do not know if it can be turned around. But we think we have an obligation to try."

The president neither endorsed nor rejected the report's recommendations, and his aides said it would take time -- perhaps several weeks -- to digest and respond to its conclusions.

"This report gives a very tough assessment of the situation in Iraq," Bush said, grasping a copy as he concluded a meeting with the group in the White House Cabinet Room. "We will take every proposal seriously."

Bush praised the bipartisan nature of the panel, established by Congress last year, saying that Americans are "tired of pure political bickering that happens in Washington, and they understand that on this important issue of war and peace, it is best for our country to work together."

Later, after a meeting with congressional Republicans and Democrats, Bush said there were "some very good ideas" in the report. "Not all of us around the table agree with every idea, but we do agree that it shows that bipartisan consensus on important issues is possible," he said.

Democrats swiftly announced they would hold an "aggressive" series of oversight hearings when they assume control of Congress next month, looking at military strategy and force readiness, the options that remain for stabilizing Iraq, and how the war is affecting national security.

Some Democrats complained that the report's proposals for extricating U.S. troops were neither quick nor specific enough. But in an early hint that bipartisanship on Iraq will be virtually impossible, most Democrats sounded pleased with the panel's harsh assessment of Bush's approach.

"I salute the Iraq Study Group for agreeing that the present Bush policy in Iraq has been a failure," said Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi of California.

Pennsylvania Rep. John P. Murtha, a leading Democratic voice for a swift troop withdrawal, dismissed the report as "no different than the current policy."

The White House scrambled to put its own spin on the document, elements of which had leaked out in news reports before the official release. Many of the recommendations were things the president supports or has already called for, his aides said, and they strongly rejected the notion that it was in any way a rebuke of Bush's policies.

"It's an acknowledgement of reality," Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, said of the report. Its call for a "new way forward," Snow said, is "what the president's been talking about."

Commission members said their goal wasn't to criticize Bush, Snow said. During the Cabinet Room session, Alan K. Simpson, a former Republican senator from Wyoming, said, "We're not here to vex and embarrass the administration," said Bush's spokesman, who sat in on the closed-door meeting. But on Capitol Hill, Simpson said that Americans view both Congress and the administration as "dysfunctional" and that the group had tried to keep partisanship out of its work.

The much-anticipated document puts Bush in a tricky position as he looks for options for fixing the situation in Iraq and prepares to review forthcoming proposals from his national security and military advisers about how to proceed there.

If he were to accept the recommendations, the president would essentially be acknowledging that his strategy has been a failure and agreeing to several steps he has previously ruled out. If Bush did not embrace the proposals, he would be rejecting the counsel of a widely respected group of elder statesmen whose frank language and unanimous recommendations -- 79 in all -- reflected the combined wisdom of dozens of officials and analysts who have studied and strategized on Iraq.

The report came amid harsh reminders of the violence raging in Iraq, on a day when the military announced the deaths of 10 U.S. forces in four attacks. It painted an unvarnished picture, referring to violence that is "increasing in scope, complexity and lethality" and saying that in some parts of Iraq, "sectarian cleansing is taking place." Its release came as Robert M. Gates, a former panel member, was confirmed to replace Donald H. Rumsfeld as secretary of defense, one day after acknowledging that the United States is not winning the war.

Bush already has roundly rejected one step the group recommended -- that U.S. officials begin talks with Iran and Syria as part of a broader diplomatic effort to stabilize Iraq and the region. The report called for the high-level diplomatic push -- to be led by the president or the secretary of state -- to begin before the end of this month.

Bush must also recommit to resolving the Arab-Israeli conflict, the report said, pursuing a two- state solution for Israel and the Palestinians and a Syrian peace agreement. In exchange, the panel proposed that Israel return the Golan Heights to Syria.

The group's leaders acknowledged that direct engagement with Iran, which has defied international demands that it cease nuclear activities, and Syria, considered a state sponsor of terrorism, would be controversial. Yet they said it was essential.

"You cannot look at this area of the world and pick and choose among the countries that you're going to deal with," Baker said. "You talk to your enemies, not just your friends."

The panel came closer to siding with Bush on the issue of troop withdrawals, which the president has said he would consider only once the mission is complete and his military commanders counsel it. The group rejected the idea of an immediate withdrawal "because we believe so much is at stake," the report said.

U.S. troops should shift from a combat role to more of a support- and-training and counterterrorism one, the panel said, with the goal of pulling out some combat brigades in 2008. But even that timetable was murky; such a withdrawal would apply only to certain combat units and be subject to events on the ground.

"I wish the report went further by making this a hard deadline for redeploying our combat troops," said Democratic Sen. John F. Kerry of Massachusetts.

The group also pointed up a central dilemma facing Bush in Iraq: his reliance on what appears to be a dysfunctional Iraqi government for any resolution to the current crisis. Bush should essentially threaten Iraqi leaders with dire consequences -- the reduction of help from the United States -- to force them to do better, the report said.

The study group also had harsh criticism for Bush's management of the war. Some estimates put the war's ultimate price tag as high as $2 trillion, it noted, and criticized Bush for "circumvention of the budget process" that obscured the true costs. They also faulted the administration for "significant underreporting of the violence in Iraq," suggesting that U.S. measures were expressly designed to play down the number of attacks.

The report was also remarkable for what it omitted. It said virtually nothing about establishing Iraq as a beacon of democracy in the Middle East, an idea that Bush has described as his broader rationale for the war and the theme of his second inaugural address.

Instead, the report suggests that Bush's so-called democracy agenda could compound the difficulty of getting cooperation from Iraq's neighbors.

"Most of the region's countries are wary of U.S. efforts to promote democracy in Iraq and the Middle East," it said.

Asked why the panel did not address Bush's democracy goals, Baker said flatly, "We want to stay current."

DOJ_NMG_0103252

Bush's more recent assertions that he wants a more basic result -- an Iraq that can sustain, govern and defend itself -- "was the latest elaboration of the goal," Baker said. "And that's the one we're working with."

Report: Iraq Policy Not Working (CHIT)

By Mark Silva

Chicago Tribune, December 7, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush was presented Wednesday with both a pointed critique of his handling of the war and a road map for changing course in Iraq that would require the president to transform the military mission and recalibrate in fundamental ways his approach to Middle East diplomacy.

The Iraq Study Group, composed of a high-powered, bipartisan collection of establishment Washington figures, outlined a plan for drawing down U.S. forces by early 2008 and for directly engaging two regional adversaries, Iran and Syria. The report has added weight, and thus potentially puts added pressure on the president, because its lead architect was former Secretary of State James Baker, a long-time Bush family ally.

The report, published in book form, contains 79 distinct recommendations for what it called a "dire ... grave and deteriorating" situation in Iraq, where the conflict has now gone on as long as U.S. involvement in World War II.

"We do not recommend a `stay the course' solution," said Baker. "In our opinion, that approach is no longer viable."

At the same time, the report did not call for any rapid reduction in troops, warning that the U.S. and powerful nations in the region have an interest in averting a "slide toward chaos" that "could trigger the collapse of Iraq's government and a humanitarian catastrophe."

Acknowledging that a new approach is needed, the White House reserved the right to accept or reject any of this group's advice while its own internal military and diplomatic reviews continue. Yet, as Democrats--many of whom embraced the reports' recommendations--prepare to take control of Congress in January, the president is offering to seek a bipartisan "way forward" in Iraq.

"Not all of us around the table agree with every idea, but we do agree that it shows that bipartisan consensus on important issues is possible," Bush said after a meeting with key House and Senate leaders. "It's important to me that we continue to hear from the Congress as we fashion a way--a new way forward in Iraq, a new look, to achieve our objective of a country which can sustain itself, govern itself, defend itself."

While not endorsing any recommendations, the White House did accept the group's grim assessment of the situation in Iraq.

"In recent months it has been deteriorating, and that's a grave concern," spokesman Tony Snow acknowledged. "You better believe it's a real concern, and it needs to be addressed."

By the first quarter of 2008, the Iraq Study Group suggests, all U.S. combat brigades "not necessary for force protection" could be out of Iraq--with the remaining U.S. troops focused on training of Iraqi forces and embedded in Iraqi military units, or deployed in rapid-reaction and special-forces teams.

"The United States must not make an open-ended commitment to keep large numbers of American troops deployed in Iraq," the group recommends.

The president, however, has resisted any timetables. Beyond that, the report strongly urged the administration to change its approach to the Middle East in ways that would require a near about-face.

Asserting that no American military action "by itself can bring about success in Iraq," the report insists that a new military strategy must be coupled with a broader U.S. diplomatic effort to include direct talks with Iran and Syria, nations that have been accused of fomenting violence within both Iraq and Lebanon.

"You talk to your enemies, not just your friends," Baker said.

The U.S. must also impress upon the Iraqi government a need to reconcile warring sectarian factions that hold Iraq in the "grip of a deadly cycle," the group says, recommending timetables for the Iraqis to reconcile factions and a withdrawal of U.S. economic and other support if the government fails to meet those timeframes.

DOJ_NMG_0103253

With Bush voicing a willingness to reassess a war strategy in Iraq that he concedes is not working "well enough, fast enough," and congressional leaders calling for a change of course, the report will serve as a focal point for a growing debate over the war.

"Stay-the-course is not the policy," Snow said. "Stay-the-course is not an option."

Yet some say the study group's advice falls short of what's needed in Iraq.

"We must have more troops over there," Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) said after meeting with the president. "Maybe 20,000 more Marines, and 80,000 Army. ... We have to have a big enough surge that we can get Baghdad under control."

With the imprimatur of seasoned Washington hands, and the ribbon of a bipartisan consensus, the study group's report could offer Bush an opportunity to recast his war strategy.

"If they want to deal with the real situation on the ground, both with what's happened with our military ... and with our reputation ... it's a real opportunity," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), who will be a new member of the Democratic House leadership in January. "If they want to stand and call this another piece [of advice], it becomes an opportunity lost."

The report also delivered an urgent plea to reunite Americans polarized by the war.

"This war has badly divided this country," said Leon Panetta, a group member who was President Clinton's chief of staff.

"It's divided Republicans from Democrats, and to some extent the president from the people," Panetta said. "This country cannot be at war and be as divided as we are today.... I suggested to the president that what we did in this group can perhaps serve as an example to try to pull together the leadership of the Congress and try to focus on the recommendations that we've made."

The book-length tome titled "The Iraq Study Group Report"--which indeed will be published as a book by Random House and promoted by a public-relations agency as the group's chairs press for public debate of their recommendations--paints a grim picture of Iraq.

The situation in Baghdad and several provinces already is "dire," it concludes, with "the level of violence ... high and growing." Al Qaeda is deemed responsible for only "a small portion of the violence in Iraq."

The greater threat to security comes from sectarian violence holding the nation in "the grip of a deadly cycle," the commission reports. And the perception of unchecked violence has "emboldened" militias and undermined the government.

While the administration has attempted to portray most of Iraq as "relatively peaceful," the report notes that 40 percent of the population lives in the four--out of 18 provinces--that are "highly insecure": Baghdad, Anbar, Diyala and Salah ad Din.

With 141,000 U.S. troops deployed in Iraq, "many military units are under significant strain," the group found. Nearly every Army and Marine combat unit has served in Iraq at least once, with many on their second or even third rotations.

The Iraqi army, with about 140,000 troops in 10 divisions, lacks leadership, equipment, personnel and support, the commission found. And "the state of the Iraqi police is substantially worse than that of the Iraqi army," the report notes, pointing to unchecked criminality as one of Iraq's problems.

"The current approach is not working, and the ability of the United States to influence events is diminishing," said Democrat Lee Hamilton, group co-chairman and a former congressman from Indiana. "Many Americans are understandably dissatisfied. Our ship of state has hit rough waters. It must now chart a new way forward."

Iraq Panel Paints Dire Portrait Of Situation (HC)

By Michael Hedges, Bennett Roth

Houston Chronicle, December 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Iraq Study Group report released today painted a dire portrait of the situation in Iraq while calling for all American combat brigades to be withdrawn by the first quarter of 2008, barring unexpected developments.

The report by the 10-person commission, co-chaired by James A. Baker III and Lee H. Hamilton, began with a sober line: "The situation in Iraq is grave and deteriorating. There is no path that can guarantee success, but the prospects can be improved."

DOJ_NMG_0103254

The study, the product of numerous meetings and study sessions since March of this year, noted that "if the situation continues to deteriorate, the consequences could be severe. A slide toward chaos could trigger the collapse of Iraq's government in a humanitarian catastrophe."

The Baker-Hamilton group issued a series of ideas, most of which already have emerged in public debate, aimed at preventing that outcome. The report calls for the launch of an immediate diplomatic offensive to build "an international consensus for stability in Iraq and the region."

The report also calls for the United States to attempt to directly engage Iran and Syria in diplomatic talks.

The Bush administration has resisted talks with Iran until that country agrees to suspend its nuclear programs. But the Iraqi study group says the issue of Iranian nuclear proliferation should be handled separately by the United Nations Security Council and Germany.

The report also calls for the United States to deal directly with the Arab-Israeli conflict and to insist on direct talks between Israel and other countries in the region, including Syria.

As for the near-term U.S. military commitment in Iraq, the report says "the United States should significantly increase the number of U.S. military personnel, including combat troops embedded in and supporting Iraqi army units."

That idea is among the options already being embraced by the Pentagon. The Iraq Study Group goes further to say that as that happens, "U.S combat forces should begin to move out of Iraq."

As for a timetable, the study says that "by the first quarter of 2008, subject to unexpected developments in the security situation on the ground, all combat brigades not necessary for force protection should be out of Iraq."

The report acknowledges the United States will need to assist Iraq's government "for some time to come." But it said the "United States must not make an open ended commitment to keep large numbers of American troops deployed in Iraq."

The report calls for the Iraqi government to establish "milestones on national reconciliation." It noted "miracles cannot be expected, but the people of Iraq have the right to expect action and progress."

Those milestones should be aimed at convincing the Iraqi people that the government of Iraq will meet standards of economic progress, security and justice.

The report warns the Iraq government that if it does not make substantial progress toward a series of milestones, the United States should reduce its political, military and economic support for the Iraqi government.

The report concluded by saying that all of its recommendations need to be carried out in a "comprehensive and coordinated fashion." While noting there are no guarantees of success in Iraq, it said that by following the report's guidelines, "Iraq, the region, and the United States of America can emerge stronger."

The report rejects the idea floated by some lawmakers to partition Iraq into three regions based on ethnic or sectarian identities, arguing that too many region have mixed populations. Instead, it said the United States should urge the Iraqis to concentrate authority with the central government in Baghdad.

The report listed 79 recommendations, a number of which focus on a reinvigorated diplomatic effort to assist Iraq, including the creation of the Iraq International Support Group, which would include Iraq's neighbors, the five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council, and members of the European Union.

To train Iraqis, the report recommends embedding as many as 20,000 U.S. military personnel in the Iraqi Army – in battalions, brigades and even companies. Currently there are from 3,000 to 4,000 U.S. personnel involved in training roles.

The report rejected the idea of substantially increasing the U.S. presence in Iraq, arguing that additional troops are not available and increasing the number of Americans would heighten tensions with Iraqis. However, the report said a temporary surge or redeployment of troops around Baghdad could be helpful.

The report addresses the issues of Iraq's substantial oil reserves, saying the president should restate that the United States does not seek to control the country's oil supply.

It also states that oil revenues should distributed by central government to the various part of the country and not controlled by regional interests. It states that the United States should press Iraq to reduce subsidies to the energy sector, arguing that the marketplace should set oil prices.

Iraq Study Group: Shift Mission, Go Regional (CSM)

By Howard Lafranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, December 7, 2006

Amid signs of deepening difficulty and waning American influence in Iraq, the congressionally mandated Iraq Study Group unveiled a set of recommendations Wednesday ranging from a broader regional diplomatic effort to more emphasis on training Iraqi security forces.

The report - available online and as a 160-page book in bookstores - avoids some controversial proposals. This reflects the panel's bipartisan makeup as well as a desire not to be dismissed by the White House out of hand. But it does call for increased pressure on the Iraqi government to make progress in key areas of reconciliation and governability - and to withdraw US support if progress is not made.

Saying "there is no magic formula that will solve the problems of Iraq," group co-chair James Baker III said the group believes its recommendations offer the best hope for "success" in terms of stabilizing Iraq and avoiding regional conflict. He cited 79 recommendations as included in the report. Mr. Baker, a seasoned foreign-policy realist, said the group avoided speaking of "victory" in Iraq.

The group also recommends creation of an "international Iraq support group" to help stabilize the country, specifically including Iran and Syria - two countries the White House has resisted including in its Iraq effort.

"Our most important recommendations call for new and enhanced diplomatic and political efforts in Iraq and the region, and a change in the primary mission of US forces in Iraq that will enable the United States to begin to move its combat forces out of Iraq responsibly," the report says.

One downbeat note greeting the report is that, no matter how good some of its recommendations may be, it may simply have been overtaken by the deterioration of conditions on the ground in Iraq. The 10-member commission has been at work for nine months, dating back to just after a pivotal attack on a Shiite shrine in Samarra in February - as sectarian violence intensified and doubts about the abilities of the government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki deepened.

"There may be some fine ideas [in the report], but my concern is that events on the ground have overtaken the ability of the actors [whom] those ideas address to influence things," says Chris Toensing, executive director of the Middle East Research and Information Project in Washington.

Most troubling, Mr. Toensing says, is a "disconnect" between the "very blunt and bleak tone" of the report's opening appraisal, and recommendations that assume a situation much more amenable to correction.

For example, he singles out one recommendation in the key area of national reconciliation, calling for reorganization of the tainted national police under the Defense Ministry. It raises the question of why the very powerful factions currently in control of the police would agree to such a measure - and who has the power to make them acquiesce?, says Toensing.

The reality is that "the US doesn't rule Iraq any more," he says, "and the Iraqi government doesn't have that kind of say outside the Green Zone."

The report does call specifically for the US to "try to engage constructively" Iran and Syria in diplomatic efforts to stabilize Iraq, given their influence in the country. The White House has previously poured cold water on that proposal, saying those two countries should first demonstrate their goodwill toward helping and not further destabilizing Iraq.

The report also calls for the US to recommit itself to resolution of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict as a key element in any successful redirection of US-Iraq policy.

Co-chaired by Baker and former Democratic congressman Lee Hamilton, the Iraq Study Group is one of several studies of options for Iraq that President Bush will be consulting, including one from the Pentagon and a White House in-house analysis from the National Security Council. Bush aides have said the president will decide on any redirection of the Iraq effort over the coming weeks.

While Bush has publicly ruled out any changes that smack of a "graceful exit" from Iraq, some analysts and experts who worked with group during its nine-month investigation say that is essentially what the report boils down to.

Of the two co-chairs, Mr. Hamilton was the more categoric at a news conference Wednesday morning in saying the current approach is not working. "The ability of the US to influence events is diminishing," Hamilton said, adding that the American people cannot be expected to accept the same course for a conflict that has cost the lives of nearly 3,000 US soldiers and cost US taxpayers $400 billion. He warned that the total price tag could rise to more than $1 trillion.

While the report does not set a concrete timetable for a US withdrawal from Iraq, it does say that US combat forces "could be out of Iraq" by the first quarter of 2008 - if steps are taken soon to allow Iraqi forces to assume combat functions in the war.

But some analysts say even that finding may rest on the assumption of a functioning Iraqi government that may not exist. "Behind all of these reasonable expectations we are wrestling with is the possibility that Iraq may not be a real nation-state anymore," says Andrew Bacevich, a retired Army colonel now teaching international relations at Boston University. "We may be asking the government to do this or that, when the real decisionmakers and power brokers now are more the factions, sectarian groups, tribes, and clans."

Some experts lauded the report for nevertheless setting down as a necessary step a reduced American military presence. "It is new in saying you can't solve this militarily, and that you have to begin cutting down the American footprint," says Lawrence Korb, a national security analyst at the Center for American Progress in Washington.

Taking note of the report's emphasis on a reassignment of US forces from patrol to training of Iraqi security forces, Mr. Korb adds, "The problem with the Iraqis is not training, it is really motivation." He notes that only one Iraqi Army division is multiethnic in a land of mounting sectarian strife, and he says this points up how crucial will be political decisions about intercommunity equity that the US simply can't force the Iraqi government to make.

White House officials had cautioned against looking for any "magic bullet" in the much-anticipated report, and indeed the group itself said there isn't one. "There is no path that can guarantee success," the report concludes.

"What the report [reflects] is that there are a lot of options out there for a new Iraq policy, but none of them are very good," says one of a number of national-security specialists that the 10-member panel consulted to draw up its recommendations. "This [is] tacit recognition that what was allowed to go quite bad will not be fixed quickly or easily," says the expert, who asked not to be named because of involvement with the panel.

The report was released a day after Defense Secretary-designate Robert Gates answered a flat "no" to a question at his Senate confirmation hearing about whether the US is winning in Iraq.

But the report also seeks to lay out a "new way forward" for US involvement in Iraq at a time of decreasing US influence there. This week, Mr. Maliki announced a plan to hold a regional conference on stabilizing his country, even as the US continues to debate the usefulness of such an initiative.

Mr. Bacevich of Boston University says the commission's emphasis on regional diplomacy "has the potential to be its most helpful recommendation." But he adds that it also may be "the proposal that President Bush is the least likely to accept."

Some analysts have railed against the idea of enlisting Iran's help in Iraq, claiming that Tehran is part of the problem and is angling for a US withdrawal from the region in order to enhance its own power. Baker, a believer in the rule of national interests, responds that Iran was helpful to the US in Afghanistan and could be helpful in Iraq if it understood its interests could be served.

But Toensing of the Middle East Project says the Iran issue is another example of events "overtaking" otherwise sound proposals. "This is another case of a generally sound idea outpaced by events," he says. "Tehran's calculus was such that it was helpful [on Afghanistan], but the strategic interests are so different now," he says, not to mention the further radicalization of the Tehran regime.

The report was unveiled in a Senate chamber with all 10 study group members present, including former Defense Secretary William Perry, former Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, and former Secretary of State Lawrence Eagleburger.

Such is the emotion unleashed by the topic of Iraq that the report was being attacked even before its release as "stay the course lite" by some and as "Vietnam redux" by others. Conservative security analysts critical of any foreseeable drawdown of US troops and of the idea of a regional dialogue that would include Iran and Syria have taken to calling the Baker-Hamilton commission the "Iraq Surrender Group."

The group does not recommend any increase in US troops, currently numbering 140,000 in Iraq, of anything "over 100,000 more troops," Baker said. That recommendation appears to leave the door open to one Pentagon proposal that US troops be increased by perhaps 40,000 - principally in Baghdad to secure the capital.

Gen. Anthony Zinni, a former Bush Middle East envoy who opposed waging war on Iraq, now holds the view that a US departure would create a dangerous vacuum that would probably be filled by Iran. So not only should the US not pull out of a war that was a mistake in the first place, General Zinni says, but it will have to increase troops to accomplish anything resembling stability.

For all their emphasis on the dire straits the US is encountering in Iraq, the study group members emphasized as a group the need to do something different from the policy the US is following today. Said commission member Alan Simpson, a former Republican senator from Wyoming: "Maybe [our work] is corny, maybe it won't work. But it sure ... [is] better than sitting there where we are right now." Excerpts from the report of the Iraq Study Group

On diplomacy vis-à-vis Iraq

"The United States should immediately launch a new diplomatic offensive to build an international consensus for stability in Iraq and the region. This ... effort should include every country that has an interest in avoiding a chaotic Iraq, including all of Iraq's neighbors. Iraq's neighbors and key states in and outside the region should form a support group to reinforce security and national reconciliation within Iraq...."

On US troop levels

"The primary mission of US forces in Iraq should evolve to one of supporting the Iraqi army, which would take over primary responsibility for combat operations. By the first quarter of 2008, subject to unexpected [security] developments ..., all combat brigades not necessary for force protection could be out of Iraq. At that time, US combat forces in Iraq could be deployed only in units embedded with Iraqi forces, in rapid-reaction and special operations teams [to focus on strikes against Al Qaeda in Iraq], and in training, equipping, advising, force protection, and search and rescue."

"The United States must not make an open-ended commitment to keep large numbers of American troops deployed in Iraq."

On the US role in the Middle East

"There must be a renewed and sustained commitment ... to a comprehensive Arab-Israeli peace on all fronts: Lebanon, Syria, and President Bush's June 2002 commitment to a two-state solution for Israel and Palestine. This commitment must include direct talks with, by, and between Israel, Lebanon, Palestinians - those who accept Israel's right to exist - and Syria."

On Iraq's responsibilities

"If the Iraq government demonstrates political will and makes substantial progress toward the achievement of milestones on national reconciliation, security, and governance, the United States should make clear its willingness to continue training, assistance, and support for Iraq's security forces and to continue political, military, and economic support. If the Iraqi government does not make substantial progress toward the achievement of [those] milestones ..., the United States should reduce its ... support for the Iraqi government."

On the panel's intent

"Success [in Iraq] depends on the unity of the American people in a time of political polarization. Americans can and must enjoy the right of robust debate within a democracy. Yet US foreign policy is doomed to failure - as is any course of action in Iraq - if it is not supported by a broad, sustained consensus. The aim of our report is to move our country toward such a consensus."

A Blueprint For Iraq: Will It Work In The White House? (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, December 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 6 — In 142 stark pages, the Iraq Study Group report makes an impassioned plea for bipartisan consensus on the most divisive foreign policy issue of this generation. Without President Bush, that cannot happen.

The commissioners gave a nod to Mr. Bush, adopting his language in accepting the goal of an Iraq that can “govern itself, sustain itself and defend itself.” But the administration’s talk of Iraq as a beacon of democracy in the Middle East is absent, as is any talk of victory.

Instead, the report confronts the president with a powerful argument that his policy in Iraq is not working and that he must move toward disengagement. For Mr. Bush to embrace the study group's blueprint would mean accepting its implicit criticism of his democracy agenda, reversing course in Iraq and throughout the Middle East and meeting Democrats more than halfway.

Assuming he is not ready to go that far, despite some recent signals of flexibility, he faces the more general question of whether he is ready to embrace the spirit of the report — not to mention the drubbing his party took in the midterm elections a month ago — and produce a new approach of his own that amounts to more than a repackaging of his current worldview.

"In a sense," said Dennis Ross, who worked for both President Clinton and the first President Bush as a Middle East envoy, "what you have here offers the Democrats a ready handle to show, 'We're prepared to be bipartisan on the issue of Iraq, because we'll embrace the bipartisan Iraq Study Group — are you prepared to be bipartisan as well?' "

The study group, for instance, calls for direct engagement with Iran and Syria; so far, Mr. Bush has refused. While Mr. Bush has steadfastly resisted a timetable for withdrawal, the report says all combat brigades "not necessary for force protection could be out of Iraq" — note the careful use of the conditional — by the first quarter of 2008.

The report in effect calls on Democrats, at least those who have been pushing for a rapid withdrawal of troops, to show patience, warning that a fast pullout would lead to "a significant power vacuum, greater human suffering, regional destabilization and a threat to the global economy" — in effect, pushing Iraq into total anarchy.

But the real target of the Iraq Study Group was Mr. Bush. The president has already sought to play down the role the report would have in shaping his thinking. The administration has several reviews of its own under way, and Tony Snow, the White House press secretary, began saying as early as October that the White House was "not going to outsource the business of handling the war in Iraq."

So while Mr. Bush called the report "an opportunity to come together and work together" after receiving it Wednesday, it was no surprise on Capitol Hill that many Democrats were quicker to embrace it than Republicans were. Members of the president's party seemed to be adopting a kind of wait-and-see posture, praising the report for its seriousness and depth as they searched for clues about what Mr. Bush would do.

"I was impressed by the seriousness with which this group reached its conclusions and its plea that the level of partisanship we've seen in Iraq be toned down," said Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, who will soon be the Republican leader. But Mr. McConnell cut short any conversation of what Mr. Bush should do. "I'm not going to give the president advice," he said.

The president spent weeks trying to shape the political climate in which he would receive the report. He ordered up a Pentagon study and commissioned his own White House review. Last week, he went to Amman, Jordan, to meet with the prime minister of Iraq, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki; on Monday, he received a powerful Iraqi Shiite leader, Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, at the White House.

Those moves have been aimed at giving Mr. Bush the flexibility he needs to do pretty much whatever he wants. But, meeting with him in the Oval Office on Wednesday morning, the commissioners made a pointed appeal for him to give their study greater weight than his own, if only because it has the backing of both parties.

"This is the only bipartisan advice you're going to get," the Democratic co-chairman of the panel, Lee H. Hamilton, told Mr. Bush, according to an account by Mr. Snow. Commissioners said afterward that the president seemed to absorb that plea.

"I don't want to put too much in his mouth now," said Lawrence S. Eagleburger, who was secretary of state under Mr. Bush's father, "but there was not one bit of argument. He didn't come back at us on anything."

Mr. Bush has already been adjusting policy in modest ways — carrying out, for example, some of the recommendations made to him in late October by his national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, engaging other Iraqi leaders, like Mr. Hakim , and sending Vice President Dick Cheney for talks with the leaders of Saudi Arabia.

That is not the only sign the president will give serious consideration to the report. Mr. Bush's new choice for defense secretary, Robert M. Gates, caught Washington by surprise on Tuesday when he testified in his confirmation hearings that the United States was not winning in Iraq. It may be no coincidence that Mr. Gates is a former member of the Iraq Study Group.

The report offered a little something for everyone, and took away a little something from everyone as well. The reaction was harshest at the ends of the political spectrum.

DOJ_NMG_0103259

William Kristol, a neoconservative thinker and the editor of The Weekly Standard who pushed for the invasion, lambasted the recommendations as “a disguised surrender.” Representative John P. Murtha, the Pennsylvania Democrat whose call for withdrawal touched off a firestorm last year, complained that the panel offered a prescription “no different from the current policy.”

The real question now is whether the report can generate what the panel’s Republican co-chairman, James A. Baker III, called the “tremendous amount of political will” necessary to prod Democrats and Republicans into genuine cooperation — and Mr. Bush into embracing policy prescriptions he thus far has shunned.

As he stood before the press corps Wednesday to unveil the long-awaited report, Mr. Baker, a longtime confidante of the Bush family, was asked if Mr. Bush had the capacity to “pull a 180,” as the report would seem to require. He ducked the question then, but later answered it in an interview with Brian Williams of NBC News.

“I don’t know what the president will do,” Mr. Baker said. “But I do know this. I know the president is conflicted by the situation there. I know the president would like to approach this in a bipartisan way and in a manner that would have the support of the American people. Here’s a vehicle to do that.”

The Realists' Repudiation Of Policies For A War, Region (WP)

By Glenn Kessler, Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, December 7, 2006

The Iraq Study Group report released yesterday might well be titled "The Realist Manifesto."

From the very first page, in which co-chairmen James A. Baker III and Lee H. Hamilton scold that "our leaders must be candid and forthright with the American people," the bipartisan report is nothing less than a repudiation of the Bush administration's diplomatic and military approach to Iraq and to the whole region.

Throughout its pages, the report reflects the foreign policy establishment's disdain for the "neoconservative" policies long espoused by President Bush and his aides. But while many of its recommendations stem from the "realist" school of foreign policy, it is unclear at this point whether a radically different approach would make much difference nearly four years after the invasion of Iraq.

The administration's effort to spread democracy to Arab lands is not mentioned in the report, except to note briefly that most countries in the region are wary of it. The report urges direct talks with Iran and Syria, both of which the administration has largely shunned. It also calls for placing new emphasis on resolving the Israel-Arab conflict, including pressing Israel to reach a peace deal with Syria, on the grounds that the issue shapes regional attitudes about U.S. involvement in Iraq. Overall, it strongly suggests that Bush, Vice President Cheney and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice have bungled diplomacy in the region with unrealistic objectives and narrow strategies.

"We took a very pragmatic approach because all of these people up here are pragmatic public officials," Hamilton told reporters, referring to the five Democrats and five Republicans who unanimously endorsed the report's conclusions and recommendations. The bipartisan nature of the report -- and the fact that Baker was secretary of state for Bush's father -- will make it difficult for the White House to ignore. By endorsing the critics' view of the war, the report will also help incoming Democratic congressional leaders frame the debate over Iraq as a disaster largely of the administration's making.

In a lengthy preamble to the recommendations titled "Assessment," the report gives a dispassionate account of the "grave and deteriorating" situation in Iraq, echoing books and news reports that the administration had previously criticized as one-sided or overly negative. The report's description of the violence in Iraq, which amounts to an attack on the administration's understanding of the facts on the ground, will likely set the new baseline for how the Iraq conflict is portrayed.

"The ability of the United States to influence events within Iraq is diminishing," the report warns.

The report is replete with damning details about the administration's inept handling of Iraq. It notes, for instance, that only six people in the 1,000-person embassy in Baghdad can speak Arabic fluently. It recounts how the military counted 93 acts of violence in one day in July, when the group's own reexamination of the data found 1,100 acts of violence. "Good policy is difficult to make when information is systematically collected in a way that minimizes discrepancy with policy goals," the report says.

The report calls for seeing Iraq differently, for scaling back the administration's goals and for ending the president's open-ended commitments to the war-torn country. It also argues that the administration should support a "far-reaching" amnesty of insurgent fighters, pointedly warning that neither the executive nor legislative branches should try to undermine an amnesty program.

Administration officials yesterday gamely insisted that the report is not a criticism of the administration's approach. White House spokesman Tony Snow said many issues raised in the report are being discussed and addressed by the administration. "You're asking if that is a repudiation of policy," he told reporters. "No, it's an acknowledgment of reality."

On both the diplomatic and military fronts, the report differs sharply from the administration's current approach. Perhaps befitting a panel with two former secretaries of state -- Lawrence S. Eagleburger is also a member -- a large section of the report outlines what it labels "the New Diplomatic Offensive."

The section appears to be an implicit rebuke of the policies pursued by Rice, arguing that her current efforts to build a regional "compact for Iraq" are too narrow, that her efforts to engage moderate Arab states lack ambition, and that her pursuit of Israeli-Palestinian peace needs to be reinvigorated. Bush has shunned a hands-on role in the issue, but the report says that "the United States does its ally Israel no favors in avoiding direct involvement to solve the Arab-Israel conflict."

"Everybody said that if you're going to settle Iraq, it is important that you do what you can to settle Israel-Palestine," Eagleburger said, asserting a linkage that until now the administration had rejected. The report makes no mention of the moribund U.S.-backed peace plan known as the road map.

The report also urges high-level talks with Iran and Syria without preconditions, although it sets goals for those talks that struck some analysts as unrealistic. Iran and Syria might have been more amenable to serious negotiations several years ago -- the panel noted, for instance, that Iran was helpful in Afghanistan after the fall of the Taliban -- but that moment has probably passed, now that Iran and Syria believe the United States is on the ropes. Baker, who said "you talk to your enemies, not just your friends," suggested that one goal of such talks would be to demonstrate to others in the region that Iran and Syria want Iraq to fail.

Outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld also comes in for some pointed commentary, with the group's 46th recommendation being that his successor repair relations with the top military brass.

The report's core military recommendation -- that almost all U.S. combat troops be withdrawn by the beginning of 2008, but that a large force be left to train and advise Iraqi forces -- struck some military experts as appropriate, but others called it overly ambitious.

Anthony H. Cordesman, a defense expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, criticized the recommendation to quadruple the current number of U.S. advisers and trainers to about 20,000 soldiers, saying: "The U.S. is to rush in more qualified trainer and embeds that it doesn't have and assign more existing combat forces unqualified for the mission." Indeed, among the lessons brought home by U.S. trainers over the past three years are that many were unprepared for the task and that the mission is extremely difficult. It requires knowledge not only of U.S. combat operations but also of foreign weaponry and, most of all, of Iraqi culture.

Quang X. Pham, author of a memoir about his service in the U.S. Marine Corps and his father's time as a pilot for the South Vietnamese military, said he considers the troop plan a thinly disguised form of quitting. "In one year, during the 2008 election year, the United States will abandon and betray Iraq as it did South Vietnam," predicted Pham, who was a pilot during the Persian Gulf War.

Meanwhile, Rep. Maxine Waters (D-Calif.), head of the "Out of Iraq" congressional caucus, said it appears to her that the group is calling only for improvements to the Bush administration's plan to stand down U.S. forces as Iraqi forces stand up.

In Theater Of War, It's Iraq Study Group's Turn To Take The Stage (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, December 7, 2006

Minutes after the Iraq Study Group placed an improvised explosive device beneath the Bush administration's Iraq policy yesterday, panel member Lawrence Eagleburger was asked how President Bush reacted to the recommendations.

"His reaction was, 'Where's my drink?' " the former secretary of state cracked after the commission's White House visit and Capitol Hill news conference. Reaching for his own cola, Eagleburger continued: "He was a little loaded. It was early in the morning, too, you know."

DOJ_NMG_0103261

The retired diplomat certainly did not mean that the president had fallen off the wagon. But if any event would call for a stiff one, this was it: A bipartisan group of elder statesmen -- some of them friends of Bush's father, no less -- had just concluded that the Iraq war, the centerpiece of Bush's presidency, was a disaster with no easy way out.

The words tossed out at the news conference were bleak. "Grave and deteriorating," co-chairman Lee Hamilton told the cameras. Reciting a list of woes -- more than 2,900 Americans dead, $400 billion gone and "great hardship" for Iraqis -- the former congressman became dramatic: "Our ship of state has hit rough waters."

The other co-chairman, James Baker, got Bush through the Florida recount of 2000 but was of no help yesterday. "Struggling in a world of fear, the Iraqis themselves dare not dream," George H.W. Bush's secretary of state said, using the words "no longer viable" to describe the current Iraq policy and "brutal violence" to describe Iraq.

Thanks to prolific leaking, there were few surprises in the report. But the panelists had some surprisingly harsh assessments of the president. When Doyle McManus of the Los Angeles Times asked the commissioners what they would do to get Bush to embrace their recommendations, Republican former senator Alan Simpson condemned the "100-percenters in America" who refuse to compromise. "A 100-percenter is a person you don't want to be around. They have gas, ulcers, heartburn and B.O."

Bush reacted with the dyspepsia of a man who was just told to drop his objections to withdrawing combat troops, to talking with Iran and Syria, and to forcing an Israeli-Palestinian peace deal. "This report gives a very tough assessment of the situation in Iraq," he acknowledged from the Cabinet Room.

The unpalatable menu of options for Bush went a long way toward redeeming a Baker-Hamilton commission that had flirted with frivolity. In September, the group called a news conference to announce that it had nothing to announce. Then Hamilton and Baker agreed to pose for Men's Vogue (commissioner Sandra Day O'Connor judiciously killed a plan to involve all 10 panelists in the shoot).

There were moments yesterday when the study group again struggled for gravitas. No sooner had the commissioners taken the stage in the Hart Office Building than Simpson passed around his copy of the report for his colleagues to autograph, "just like a high school annual," as he put it. Though the relevance to the Iraq crisis was not clear, Simpson told the 250 reporters and camera crews about O'Connor's distaste for split infinitives.

All the panelists took a turn at the microphone except for Vernon Jordan, who sat with his hands folded on the table, and Eagleburger, who doodled: first something resembling a sailboat, then a grocery cart, then finally a tyrannosaurus on wheels. The elder statesmen also risked the elderly statesmen label when The Washington Post's Robin Wright asked a question from the second row without a microphone. A chorus of "Can't hear you!" rained from the dais.

But thanks to the work of the Edelman PR firm, the panelists managed an impressive rollout. They arrived at the Capitol in a motorcade of armed Suburbans and black sedans, then were whisked through their itinerary by handlers telling them, "We're falling behind schedule." When Jordan heard the call of nature, he got a two-man escort to the restroom.

Hamilton clearly enjoyed the hero's welcome. Taking a cellphone call in the Capitol basement, he let slip to Fox News's Molly Hooper that it was former president Bill Clinton on the line. At the news conference, he boasted that "I think we have 15 or 20 invitations to testify."

Baker bristled when reporters questioned the study group's credibility. When ABC News's Jonathan Karl, pointing out that only one of the 10 panelists ever left the Green Zone in Iraq, asked why their views should carry weight, Baker looked down the row of commissioners with a smile and a wink. He took out some lip balm and applied it, then smiled some more. "This report by this bunch of has-beens up here is the only bipartisan report that's out there," he finally shot back.

Whatever else the "has-beens" accomplished, they made sure that any credibility questions will be directed not at them but at Bush. Hamilton lectured: "You cannot look at this area of the world and pick and choose among the countries that you're going to deal with." Leon Panetta counseled Bush to "look at the realities of what's taking place." Eagleburger said after the event that when the group met with Bush, "I don't recall, seriously, that he asked any questions." Even the loyal Baker had to advise his friend's son that "it is time to find a new way forward."

At least he didn't say Bush has B.O.

Analysis: Iraq Report Ups Ante For Bush (AP)

By Tom Raum

AP, December 6, 2006

President Bush now has the outlines of a bipartisan exit strategy for Iraq and a new secretary of defense to help carry it out. And while he's under no obligation to heed the Iraq Study Group's recommendations, the pressure on him to change course is now politically enormous.

Whether he'll go along, when, and to what extent, will shape the nation's political landscape in the months to come.

The group led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee Hamilton recommended on Wednesday that U.S. forces largely withdraw from combat over the next year and focus on training Iraqis.

It also called for stepped-up diplomatic efforts — including talks with Iran and Syria — to stabilize Iraq and revive the Israeli-Palestinian peace process. Bush has spurned Iraq talks with Iran and Syria.

The commission's document offers a bipartisan blueprint for Bush — if he goes along with the recommendations — to begin extricating himself from the unpopular war. It stops short of proposing a specific troop-withdrawal timetable that Bush could not be expected to embrace.

His remarks on Wednesday were conciliatory but general. In the past, Bush has sometimes sounded ready to embrace changes only to go back to the kind of stubborn line he used as recently as last week in Jordan — that U.S. troops won't leave until the mission is complete.

"This report changes the paradigm. Its most important impact is political. And the impact is going to be felt more strongly in Washington than in Baghdad," said Jon B. Alterman, a former State Department official who specialized in the Middle East.

"Bush is looking for his legacy, but his party is looking toward the 2008 elections — and a lot of them are terrified. This could really provoke an earthquake and leave the president completely isolated unless he changes course," said Alterman, now director of Mideast programs at the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

Stephen Cimbala, a Penn State political scientist who studies war's effects on domestic politics, said pulling most U.S. combat troops out of Iraq by early 2008 has clear ramifications for the upcoming presidential election.

"I don't think anybody wants to run, especially on the Republican ticket, if Iraq in 2008 looks like it does today," Cimbala said.

Since Democrats seized control of Congress in the Nov. 7 midterms, more and more Republicans have broken ranks with Bush on Iraq. The Baker-Hamilton report offers political cover for such defections.

Even within his administration, contrary voices are being heard. National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley recently questioned whether Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki was up to the job.

Robert Gates, a former study group member who was confirmed by the Senate 95-2 on Wednesday to take over as defense secretary, told senators the U.S. isn't winning the war and "all options are on the table."

The man he'll replace, Donald H. Rumsfeld, called for a "major adjustment" in U.S. tactics just before resigning under pressure. Rumsfeld was the architect of the war.

Wednesday's was the first in a series of major reports on war options heading for the White House, including ones by the Pentagon and the National Security Council.

Bush could cherry pick, selecting the most palatable recommendations from among the 79 in the Baker-Hamilton pages, and taking others from other reports.

But the Iraq Study Group's report came with a warning label. It said the recommendations amount to "a new way forward. They are comprehensive and need to be implemented in a coordinated fashion. They should not be separated or carried out in isolation."

The president called the report "a very tough assessment of the situation in Iraq" and said he would take the recommendations very seriously and act "in a timely fashion." He also said, pointedly, that Congress wouldn't agree with every proposal, and neither would he.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said Bush continues to insist that Iran verifiably suspend uranium enrichment before U.S. engages in direct talks. But he left the door open for discussions through an outside group.

DOJ_NMG_0103263

Snow called the report positive, even though it describes the current situation as "grave and deteriorating" and getting worse under current policies.

Many of its key recommendations, including a need to work more aggressively to hand over responsibilities to the Iraqis, are already "precisely what's going on," Snow said.

In fact, Bush's trip to Jordan last week to press al-Maliki directly seemed written to the study group's script. "There is no substitute for sustained dialogue at the highest levels of government," the report said, noting Bush's mission.

Al-Maliki asserts that his government will be able to control security by next June. And while military analysts openly question this, Bush could use the statement as a justification for starting to withdraw combat troops.

The report calls for withdrawing the bulk of the 140,000 U.S. combat troops now in Iraq while embedding some American forces within Iraqi units.

Lawrence J. Korb, assistant defense secretary under President Reagan and now a senior fellow at the liberal Center for American Progress, said the report was right to recommend increasing pressure on the Iraqi government to take over military operations.

"Until the Iraqi leadership makes these painful political compromises, nothing is really going to change," said Korb, who favors a faster withdrawal of troops.

The big open question remains: Is Bush ready to accept the bulk of the panel's recommendations, even though in some areas they constitute close to a 180-degree turn in policy?

Baker, who has been particularly close to the Bush family, wouldn't touch that question.

"You know, I've worked for four presidents," he said. "And I never put presidents I worked for on the couch."

White House Doing Its Own Study (USAT)

USA Today, December 7, 2006

The Iraq Study Group report isn't the only review of U.S. policy in Iraq: The Bush administration has launched its own appraisal. Last month, President Bush asked the National Security Council to coordinate studies that in some cases had been underway for months.

Stephen Hadley, the national security adviser, hasn't set a deadline for a final report but says it will be completed in "weeks, not months."

Among those involved:

•Pentagon. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, is drawing up military options that range from adding counterinsurgency troops to redeploying or reducing the U.S. presence in Iraq.

•State Department. David Satterfield, a top adviser on Iraq, and Philip Zelikow, the outgoing counselor for Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, are analyzing political, economic and diplomatic issues, including the potential impact of new policies in Iraq across the Middle East. One question: Should the United States talk directly with Iran and Syria?

•National Security Council. Hadley, deputy J.D. Crouch and Meghan O'Sullivan, the Iraq director on the NSC, are reviewing information from intelligence agencies and coordinating the departmental reviews. Hadley is providing regular updates to Bush.

Dems Seize On Iraq Report (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, December 7, 2006

The Iraq Study Group yesterday released its long-awaited counsel for major shifts in U.S. war strategy, gratifying Democrats who built electoral victories on a call for change in Iraq and leaving the new majority ready to put pressure on the president, rather than congressional Republicans.

The bipartisan study group, created by Congress last year, briefed leaders of both parties on its report before the public unveiling. Taking a stark view of the chaotic violence in Iraq, the study group advised a pullback of U.S. combat troops by early 2008 and a regional conference with Iraq's neighbors aimed at stabilizing that nation's elected government.

Incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) said afterward that he felt vindicated by the report and that it would lead to the beginning of military withdrawal.

DOJ_NMG_0103264

"The president has the ball in his court now," Reid said, announcing plans for a series of oversight hearings in the Foreign Relations, Armed Services and Intelligence committees beginning early next year.

Though President Bush and his advisers have subtly downplayed the impact of the report in recent days, party politics did not stop many lawmakers from urging that Bush seriously consider the group's findings.

"The decision has to be made by the president," said Senate Intelligence Committee Chairman Pat Roberts (R-Kan.), who hailed the consensus reached by the evenly split 10-member study group. "Democrats and Republicans actually got together. … It serves as a good example for Congress to go forward."

The study group, co-chaired by former Secretary of State and Bush family confidante James Baker III and former Rep. Lee Hamilton (D-Ind.) tempered its recommendations with a warning that their implementation would be difficult and would not guarantee success.

Sen. Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.), who will be minority leader next year, acknowledged the difficult road ahead for lawmakers who now must await the administration's response as well as the outcome of a separate internal Pentagon review of war policy.

"Those who hoped this report would provide a get-done-quick solution will be disappointed," McConnell said. "And though we won't reach agreement overnight, this is an opportunity for us to work in a bipartisan way with Democrats and the White House …"

Neither party shrank from partisan combat over the war during the Republican majority, leading to an acrimonious House debate in June and a surprise closed session of the Senate last November. But Senate Democrats, who will soon be taking over Congress with the slimmest of majorities, stressed the potential for consensus with GOP lawmakers. "You'll see a push from both sides to craft a meaningful strategy in Iraq," said Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) in an interview. "The question is whether the administration will be amenable."

The potential 2008 presidential contender described the study group's report as a welcome bridge between the Bush administration's view of the war, often resolutely optimistic, and the Democrats' perspective.

"It is a realistic portrayal of what's taking place," Obama said. "If we can agree on the facts, we can continue to move forward."

Several other Democrats who have begun vying for their party's presidential nomination placed similar weight on the White House's next move.

"The president is changing his secretary of defense, but this report now raises the most important question: is the president willing to change his mind?" Sen. Evan Bayh (D-Ind.) said in a statement.

"The president's reaction will send a loud and clear message on whether he's listening to the American people's call for a change in policy for Iraq," said Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack (D), one of the earliest official entrants in the 2008 contest and an early critic of the war.

Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.), who this week began a presidential campaign built on a traditional conservative platform, endorsed the study group's strong medicine for Iraq.

"If this is what it takes to pull us all together, they are things we really ought to look at and see if we can do," Brownback said.

Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.), another potential White House aspirant, found common ground with the study group in his own calls for a troop drawdown and a focus on diplomatic and political remedies to the crisis in Iraq. "This report is an acknowledgment that there will be no military solution in Iraq," he said.

Sen. Joseph Biden Jr. (D-Del.), who will take the Foreign Relations Committee gavel next year, praised the report overall but cast doubt on its reliance on a strong federal government for Iraq. Biden's plan for regional divisions and an oil revenue-sharing pact in Iraq is playing a central role in his own presidential bid.

One of the study group's ideas likely to arouse bipartisan angst is its call for a regional dialogue that includes Iran and Syria, nations deemed state sponsors of terrorism by the U.S.

Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.) said the notion of engaging Iran and Syria gave him pause, but Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) said he "subscribes to Baker's view that even if someone is your enemy, you should talk to them."

Sen. John Sununu (R-N.H.) noted that the study group prescribed multiple internal and external readjustments before troops could be workably moved out of combat in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0103265

"If we just look at some date that troops may or may not be withdrawn, we will overlook steps we have to take now that are crucial to the success of this effort," Sununu said.

As Democrats continued expressing hope that the study group's report would compel the White House to begin a landmark turnaround in iraq, Sen. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.) sounded a note of caution to all members.

"What we all need to do is take breaths, read the report carefully and not use parts of it to justify what we already believe," said Alexander, a close ally of McConnell's who narrowly lost a bid to become GOP whip next year.

Threats Wrapped In Misunderstandings (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, December 7, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 6 -- The Iraq Study Group's prescriptions hinge on a fragile Iraqi government's ability to achieve national reconciliation and security at a time when the country is fractured along sectarian lines, its security forces are ineffective and competing visions threaten to collapse the state, Iraqi politicians and analysts said Wednesday.

They said the report is a recipe, backed by threats and disincentives, that neither addresses nor understands the complex forces that fuel Iraq's woes. They described it as a strategy largely to help U.S. troops return home and resurrect America's frayed influence in the Middle East.

Iraqis also expressed fear that the report's recommendations, if implemented, could weaken an already besieged government in a country teetering on the edge of civil war.

"It is a report to solve American problems, and not to solve Iraq's problems," said Ayad al-Sammarai, an influential Sunni Muslim politician.

The report arrives at a time of turmoil within the Iraqi government. Senior politicians from Iraq's two major sects, Sunnis and Shiites, have been assassinated or kidnapped in recent weeks. Entire ministries are under the control of sect-based political parties with their own militias.

Three weeks ago, as many as 150 employees were abducted from the Higher Education Ministry, run by a Sunni, by men in police uniforms who said they were from the Interior Ministry, which is controlled by Shiites. And last week, powerful politicians loyal to radical Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr walked out of the government, and have yet to return.

U.S. diplomats have been urging Iraq's government to engage in a process of national reconciliation aimed at giving Sunnis a greater role, but the Shiite-led administration has been largely unwilling to do so. It is unclear whether increased pressure, as called for by the group led by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former representative Lee H. Hamilton, will result in Shiite leaders moving forward with a new power-sharing agreement.

The mistrust and divisions within the weak unity government are so deep that it is not certain whether the study group's recommendations -- such as using outside powers to exert diplomatic pressure and building a well-trained Iraqi army -- can be effective, or might instead deepen the political and sectarian rifts.

"The main obstacle and challenge is the current government," said Wamidh Nadhmi, a political analyst in Baghdad. "The Baker-Hamilton report is insisting on national reconciliation. This has not been done, only in government propaganda."

For months, the Bush administration has pressured the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to take steps toward bringing the warring groups together and tackle Iraq's violent militias and corruption. But the Iraq Study Group recommends withdrawing U.S. support if the Iraqis fail to show advances.

"If the Iraqi government does not make substantial progress toward the achievement of milestones on national reconciliation, security, and governance, the United States should reduce its political, military, or economic support for the Iraqi government," the report's executive summary says.

For some Iraqis, the statement suggested that the report's authors did not grasp, or refused to acknowledge, the diverse ambitions, rivalries and weaknesses that plague the government. The Kurds have dreams of creating an independent state. The Sunnis appear leaderless, yet seek a political voice. The Shiites are riven by feuds. There are disagreements over partitioning Iraq, over whether to restore members of Saddam Hussein's Baath Party to their old jobs, over whether amnesty should be given to opponents of the government and the U.S. occupation.

Maliki, who controls no militia of his own, also depends on Sadr for political support, making it politically suicidal for him to attempt to dismantle Sadr's Mahdi Army, the largest and most violent militia in Iraq.

"It comes far too close to having the U.S. threaten to take its ball and go home if the Iraqi children do not play the game our way," Anthony Cordesmann, a military analyst at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, said in an e-mailed analysis, referring to possible withdrawal of support.

Some Iraqis expressed astonishment at a recommendation in the report calling for Iraq's National Police and its police commandos, overseen by the Interior Ministry, to be shifted to the control of Defense Ministry, where the commandos would join the army. There is growing evidence that the majority-Shiite police are infiltrated by Shiite militias and death squads.

Iraqis said that although it might appear to make sense to place the commandos under the majority-Shiite army, which has largely escaped militia infiltration, the recommendation could bring unintended consequences. The Interior Ministry is Shiite-controlled, while the Defense Ministry is headed by a Sunni.

"This is an intervention in the Iraqi structure of the state," said Mahmoud Othman, a Kurdish legislator. "This will also be seen as a point for the Sunnis, at the expense of the Shias."

Joost Hiltermann, an Iraq analyst for the International Crisis Group, said such a shift could force the Defense Ministry into an internal policing role that it is not equipped to address. "The more they get dragged into internal policing, they may become sectarianized," Hiltermann said.

"This demand -- no one will execute it," said Hasan Suneid, a legislator and close aide to Maliki. "It's not realistic."

Other challenges face any attempt to implement the report's recommendations. Iraqis have little trust in the army, which is poorly equipped and trained, to provide security. U.S. troops agree with this assessment.

On Friday, a military transition team from the 1st Cavalry Division working with the Iraqi army's 9th Division oversaw a raid in the Fadhil district of central Baghdad. The U.S. military billed it as an Iraqi-led operation all the way. But U.S. soldiers interviewed Saturday said that was not the case.

"Truthfully, they still need training," said Maj. John Best, 34, of Tampa. "Everything that occurred out there had to be led by Americans. They don't have the level of training, the resources, the education, the motivation. They've been fighting so long, they've become complacent."

The U.S. military already has spent the past two years trying to accelerate the training of Iraqi security forces. A central challenge today, according to analysts, is not a lack of American trainers but the question of whether non-sectarian security forces are viable in Iraq: Will a critical mass of Iraqi soldiers remain loyal to the national government as opposed to their respective religious groups?

The issue of having U.S. advisers embedded with Iraqi units could also be difficult. "I wonder whether it will raise Iraqi sensitivities. They may see it as the Americans are ordering them, that they are still the bosses," said Othman. "This is a matter of national pride."

Sadr, who controls 30 seats in Iraq's 275-member parliament and four ministries, is also opposed to the idea. He has demanded a timetable for U.S. withdrawal.

"We don't want to bring any advisers," said Nasar al-Rubaie, the leader of Sadr's legislative bloc. "We are capable to arm our security and military forces. If the Americans withdraw today from Iraq, the next day there will be security in all of Iraq."

The report's recommendation for outside diplomatic pressure is also divisive. One of Maliki's chief rivals, Abdul Aziz al-Hakim of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, who has close ties to Iran, has rejected the proposal for Sunni Arab countries to become more involved in Iraq.

Kurdish leaders are also worried about interference from Turkey, which has vowed to invade Iraq's Kurdish regions if Kurds move toward independence or assert control over the oil field at Kirkuk.

Maliki supports having a regional conference, as long as it is held inside Iraq.

Maliki has rekindled ties with Iran and Syria, but there is still suspicion among Sunni parties, as well as some Shiite groups, of Iran's growing influence in Iraq. And it is unclear whether either Iran or Syria, which the Bush administration views as sponsors of terrorism, would enter into a dialogue with Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0103267

"If we can make them part of the solution rather than part of the problem, it will be good for Iraq," said Othman. "But it matters how much they gain from the United States."

Sammarai, the Sunni lawmaker, said the Bush administration has a responsibility to fulfill its pledge to bring democracy to Iraq, in which minorities will have a voice. "Because of their mistakes, it is so complicated now," Sammarai said. "Now, they say, 'We're going to leave the Iraqis to solve their problems.' "

Said Cordesmann: "The U.S. effectively sent a bull in to liberate a china shop, and the Study Group now called upon the U.S. to threaten to remove the bull if the shop doesn't fix the china."

Politicians In Iraq Debate Impact Report Might Have (USAT)

By César G. Soriano

USA Today, December 7, 2006

BAGHDAD — Iraqi politicians on Wednesday debated the significance and potential impact of a high-level U.S. commission's report that recommends diplomatic and military changes that could permit U.S. troops to withdraw from combat roles by early 2008.

Baghdad residents, meanwhile, worried that even if the recommendations are adopted, it might be too late to stop the country from sliding further into chaos.

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki held a video conference on the report with former U.S. secretary of State James Baker and former congressman Lee Hamilton, co-chairmen of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, al-Maliki's office said in a statement. The statement said al-Maliki reiterated his support for a unified national government, a regional diplomatic conference and shifting U.S. troops from a combat to a training role.

Deputy Prime Minister Barham Saleh, speaking on the pan-Arab satellite TV channel Al-Arabiya, said the government agreed with the broad recommendations of the panel, but he acknowledged that "there may be some details on which we differ." He did not elaborate.

Other Iraqi politicians welcomed the report but questioned whether President Bush would act on the recommendations. "There are good changes recommended," said Mahmoud Othman, a Kurdish coalition member of the parliament. "But I don't know how much will be accepted by the U.S. administration."

Adnan al-Dulaimi, a leader of the Iraqi Accord Front, the biggest Sunni bloc in the parliament, said he was optimistic the suggestions would help correct the situation, if adopted. "We hope the U.S. and Iraqi governments would implement these recommendations for the sake of Iraq's interest and for calming the security situation."

Abbas al-Bayati, a Shiite legislator with the United Iraqi Alliance, worried that a single report would not reverse the growing conflict among Iraqi groups. "The situation in Iraq will not be solved by one committee," he said, "but by the need to open more dialogue and accepting the opinions of Iraqis."

Al-Bayati also criticized the report's recommendation that the United States reduce "political, military or economic support" if the Iraqi government does not make significant changes to improve security. Iraq "should not be pressed into action by threats of stopping American support," he said.

Othman said the prospect of losing U.S. support could pressure the Iraqi government to work harder to end the violence. "This may be useful because at the moment there is no pressure on the Iraqi government to deliver, especially on the issue of militias," he said, referring to Shiite and Sunni fighters blamed for much of the recent unrest. But he added, "The Iraqi government may view this as an unfair threat to cut aid if they don't push hard."

Othman and al-Bayati predicted Bush will ignore the recommendation to open dialogue with Syria, Iran, religious clerics and militia leaders. "These people are important whether we like them or not," Othman said. "Reaching out to Syria and Iran could be helpful and could be positive."

"There is not much time left to correct things. It has become more complex," said Uday Azzam, 37, a Shiite pharmacist in Baghdad. "There are criminals in Iraq pushing their foreign agendas. … If Bush is serious about correcting his mistakes, he should start now."

In Iraq, Reaction To Report Runs From Relief To Anger (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0103268

By Edward Wong And Abdul Razzaq Al-Saiedi

The New York Times, December 7, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 6 — They gathered Wednesday evening inside an office in the fortified Green Zone, the Iraqi prime minister and a handful of senior officials, awaiting word of the report that could shape American policy toward their embattled country.

The video screen sprang to life. There was the silver-haired James A. Baker III, a former secretary of state and one of the report's main authors. He stared Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki in the eyes.

Mr. Baker wanted to lay out the basics of the report for Mr. Maliki before his news conference in Washington. So with his slight Texas drawl, Mr. Baker listed three conclusions that the Iraq Study Group had arrived at: the United States should continue to support the Iraqi government, the Iraqis should engage in high-level diplomacy with neighboring countries, and the 140,000 American troops here should switch from a combat mission to a support role while drawing down significantly.

A look of relief seemed to pass over Mr. Maliki's face, said Sami al-Askari, a conservative Shiite legislator who was in the room.

"If the report is written in that way, it's good," Mr. Maliki said a little later, according to Mr. Askari. "But let's wait to read all the details of the report."

The prime minister had been pleased, Mr. Askari said, because the report seemed to affirm an argument that Mr. Maliki and other Shiite leaders had been making to President Bush — give the Iraqi government more control over the security forces, and the war could be won. Mr. Maliki was also glad, Mr. Askari said, that Mr. Baker had insisted on a regional dialogue and not a full-blown international conference, which Mr. Maliki fears could lead to undue interference here by foreign powers.

"The report was positive," Mr. Askari said. "I think the Baker-Hamilton commission listened carefully and responded to what the Iraqi government wants."

Not all Iraqi politicians were as optimistic. Reaction to the bipartisan commission's recommendations on how to salvage the American enterprise varied among Iraqi politicians, who expressed appreciation, anger and ambivalence at sections of the report. Much depended on whether the study's 79 points seemed to support their ethnic or sectarian group's interests.

Kurdish leaders were outraged by proposals that could weaken Kurdish autonomy by delaying an opportunity for the Kurds to govern the contested oil city of Kirkuk, and by giving the central government control over all oil revenues. Sunni Arab legislators said they had wanted the report's main points to push for a cleansing of Shiite chauvinist elements from the government and security forces.

That is all the more important, the Sunni politicians said, because if American combat units withdraw over the next year, as the report urges, then Shiite-led security forces could commit more atrocities against Sunni Arabs.

"These recommendations might be a solution for the American crisis in Iraq, but not a solution for the Iraqi crisis," said Dhafir al-Ani, a conservative Sunni Arab member of Parliament. "The withdrawal of the American forces at a time when the Iraqi forces are still poorly trained is bad. There should first be a broad purging of the security elements because they were established on a sectarian basis, with militias. There is no assurance that they will enforce justice."

"The Americans can leave and their problems will be finished," he added, "but they will pay a price because all regional stability will disappear, as long as the situation in Iraq stays as it is."

Some of the report's proposals are clearly intended to assuage the fears of Sunni Arabs, like a recommendation that the Americans try to shift control of the elite police units, suspected of being rife with Shiite militiamen, to the Sunni-led Defense Ministry from the Shiite-led Interior Ministry. But Shiite leaders would almost certainly balk at any such move.

Another Sunni Arab legislator, Salim Abdullah, said the report placed too much emphasis on training Iraqi forces and not enough on monitoring those forces for sectarian loyalties.

"We think that improving the Iraqi troops will not be achieved through training only," Mr. Abdullah said. "Corrupt individuals should be removed. The militias should be dealt with, and the security forces should be shielded from political influence."

But Mr. Abdullah praised the report's proposal that the American and Iraqi governments engage in direct talks with regional countries, especially Iran and Syria, to persuade them to stop interfering in Iraq. Iran and Syria are both suspected by the Americans of aiding various militant factions in Iraq. Fear of growing Iranian influence is especially rampant among Sunnis like Mr. Abdullah and Mr. Ani.

"The American administration should be decisive in tightening its grip on the regional countries that interfere in Iraq's affairs, especially Iran and Syria," Mr. Ani said.

A Kurdish legislator, Mahmoud Othman, praised the report when asked his opinion in the early evening. But as he and other Kurdish leaders scrutinized the details, they became more and more angry, he said in a later telephone interview. The report's authors had recommended blocking the most important aims of the Kurds: having oil-rich Kirkuk vote next year on whether to join Iraqi Kurdistan, and taking control of oil revenues that come from future exploration in Kurdistan.

Mr. Othman said those goals were enshrined in the Iraqi Constitution. In fact, one of the recommendations that most angered Mr. Othman and his fellow Kurds was a call for a parliamentary committee to immediately start a review — and possible revision — of the Constitution. The Shiites and Kurds were the main authors of the Constitution and are opposed to any review.

"It's sort of interference in Iraqi affairs, actually," Mr. Othman said. "These points are really worrying for the Kurds."

As Iraqi politicians debated the merits of the report, violence around the country underscored the Baker-Hamilton commission's conclusion that "the situation in Iraq is grave and deteriorating." Ten American soldiers were killed in four separate incidents on Wednesday, the American military said, without giving details. The military also said a soldier was killed Monday in Baghdad.

Officials said at least 34 Iraqis were killed on Wednesday and scores were wounded in mortar attacks, bombings and assassinations.

Will It Work On The Battlefield? (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon

The New York Times, December 7, 2006

The military recommendations issued yesterday by the Iraq Study Group are based more on hope than history and run counter to assessments made by some of its own military advisers.

Ever since the invasion of Iraq in 2003, the United States has struggled in vain to tamp down the violence in Iraq and to build up the capacity of Iraq's security forces. Now the study group is positing that the United States can accomplish in little more than one year what it has failed to carry out in three.

In essence, the study group is projecting that a rapid infusion of American military trainers will so improve the Iraqi security forces that virtually all of the American combat brigades may be withdrawn by the early part of 2008.

"By the first quarter of 2008, subject to unexpected developments in the security situation on the ground, all combat brigades not necessary for force protection could be out of Iraq," the study group says.

Jack Keane, the retired Army chief of staff who served on the group's panel of military advisers, described that goal as entirely impractical. "Based on where we are now we can't get there," General Keane said in an interview, adding that the report's conclusions say more about "the absence of political will in Washington than the harsh realities in Iraq."

The experience of American commanders shows the difficulties in rapidly handing over security responsibilities to Iraq. In June, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the senior American commander in Iraq, developed a plan that called for gradually drawing down the number of American brigade combat teams by December 2007, to just 5 or 6 from the 14 combat brigades that were deployed at the time. In keeping with this approach, American troops in Baghdad began to cut back on their patrols in the capital, calculating that Iraqi security forces would pick up the slack.

But no sooner did General Casey present his plan in Washington than it had to be deferred. With sectarian violence soaring in Baghdad, the United States reinforced its troops there. More American soldiers are now involved in security operations in Baghdad than Iraqi troops.

Now, the Iraq Study Group is essentially taking General Casey's plan off the shelf and carrying it further. The group's final military recommendations were not discussed with the retired officers who serve on the group's Military Senior Adviser Panel before publication, several of those officers said.

DOJ_NMG_0103270

Military experts say there are several difficulties with the panel's recommendation. First, it underestimates the challenge of building a capable Iraqi security force. After several years of desultory efforts, the United States has taken steps to upgrade and better prepare the teams of American advisers who are assigned to Iraqi units. But training the Iraqi Army is more than a matter of teaching combat skills. It requires transforming the character of the force.

"The new Iraqi Army will need years to become equal to the challenge posed by a persistent insurgency and terrorist threat," Lt. Col. Carl D. Grunow, a former military adviser, wrote in a recent issue of Military Review, a journal published by the United States Army.

One big problem, Colonel Grunow notes, is that the Iraqi military is not proficient in counterinsurgency operations or sufficiently sensitive to the risk of civilian casualties.

"They are still fighting their last war, the high-intensity Iran-Iraq war of the 1980s, a war with clear battle lines fought with mass military formations, and one in which civilians on the battlefield were a nuisance, and not a center of gravity," he wrote. The Iraqi military, he added, "must learn to fight using strategies and tactics far different than those used in the past."

Even if the number of American advisers is increased, it is highly unlikely that the Iraqi forces would be capable of assuming the entire responsibility for security throughout the country in little more than a year. It took four years, from 1969 to 1973, for the Nixon administration to make South Vietnamese forces strong enough to hold their own and withdraw American combat forces from Vietnam. Even so, when Congress withheld authority for American airstrikes in support of those forces in 1975, the North Vietnamese quickly defeated the South and reunified the country under Communist rule.

The rapid withdrawal of American combat forces would also deprive the Iraqi military of the opportunity to work as partners with the Americans in combined operations. "There is no meaningful plan for creating a mix of effective Iraqi military forces, police forces, governance and criminal justice system at any point in the near future, much less by 2008," noted Anthony H. Cordesman of the Center for Strategic and International Studies, referring to the group's study.

Barry R. McCaffrey, a retired four-star general, said in an interview that the overall concept of withdrawing American forces as the Iraqis built up their military capability was sound. But he argued that the specific recommendations by the panel raised a second problem: if American combat brigades were withdrawn from Iraq, the thousands of American advisers who remained might find themselves dangerously exposed, particularly if the fighting in Iraq grew into a full-scale civil war. The advisers could be killed or taken hostage.

"They came up with a political thought but then got to tinkering with tactical ideas that in my view don't make any sense," General McCaffrey said. "This is a recipe for national humiliation."

A last issue is that given the deterioration of security in Iraq, it may take the combined efforts of American combat units and Iraqi security forces to try to arrest the spiraling violence. In the end, that task may not be achievable. But since it is American forces that have often worked to curb the sectarian killings — and since many of the Iraqi forces have been infiltrated by sectarian militias — there is reason to believe that the civil strife will grow if the Americans combat forces soon begin to leave.

A preface to the report by James A. Baker III and Lee H. Hamilton, the group's chairmen, said that one aim of the report was "to move our country toward consensus." The study contains all the ingredients of a Washington compromise. What is less apparent is a detailed and convincing military strategy that is likely to work in Iraq.

Recommendations Could Stretch Special Ops (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook, Matt Kelley

USA Today, December 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Iraq Study Group's recommendations would put short-term strains on military people and equipment, while helping with the military's long-term challenges.

Military experts, government analyses and the Iraq Study Group itself all cite potential problems and higher costs facing the proposals outlined in the group's report released Wednesday.

Those recommendations could aggravate the pressure on the military's already overburdened special operations forces and increase the costs of maintaining and replacing war-damaged equipment and weapons.

DOJ_NMG_0103271

The group calls for refocusing U.S. efforts on training and equipping the Iraqi military. U.S. troops could then shift their emphasis from combat power to training, support and special operations, the report says. The panel also calls for the United States to give the Iraqi military better equipment, possibly including some gear American forces would leave behind.

Fighting in Iraq has left the U.S. military with little in reserve to respond to other crises, the report says. The war also costs $2 billion a week, the study says, and hurts ground troops through repeated combat tours and wears out weapons and other equipment.

By refocusing its efforts on training and supporting Iraq's military, the U.S. military could remove most of its combat forces from Iraq by spring 2008, the report says. That would help the Army and Marine Corps, which the report calls "stretched nearly to the breaking point by repeated deployments in Iraq."

However, the group's call for a continued reliance on special operations could worsen pressure on those troops, who government reports say are also stretched thin.

For example, the report says Iraqi security forces should receive more U.S. training, which is the role of special operations troops. A July report from the Government Accountability Office (GAO) says those elite troops are so frequently deployed to war zones that they often do not receive their own recommended amount of training.

Gen. John Abizaid, the U.S. commander in the region, said last month that regular American troops embedded in Iraqi units could help the Iraqis improve.

Doing that "will give us a much better feel for how things are evolving and what's happening on the ground," said Chuck Robb, an Iraq Study Group member who is a former U.S. senator and Marine.

Robb, the only panel member to venture outside the fortified Green Zone in Baghdad, told USA TODAY that "with the kind of leadership that we've recommended and the kind of training that we've recommended, they (Iraqi forces) are capable of performing much better."

Special operations teams also would need to remain in Iraq for counterinsurgency efforts and fighting terrorists aligned with al-Qaeda, the report says.

Most special operations units, however, are short of troops, according to the July GAO report. That report also said 85% of all deployed special operations forces are already in the region controlled by U.S. Central Command, which includes Iraq and Afghanistan.

Not enough candidates are passing the rigorous training to join units such as Army Rangers and Navy SEALs, the GAO report said, and competition from high-paying private contractors prompted the military to offer experienced troops re-enlistment bonuses of up to $150,000.

Some Army Special Forces units are short of medics, for example, limiting how they can be used on the battlefield, the GAO report said.

The study group "should be concerned about our ability to sustain the quality of these forces, as well as to increase their size," says Andrew Krepinevich, a retired Army colonel and executive director of the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments.

The Iraq Study Group also recommends spending the billions of dollars necessary to repair and replace the $2 billion per month of military gear used up in Iraq.

It also suggests leaving some U.S. equipment behind for Iraqi forces and increasing the amount of new U.S. equipment available for Iraqi forces to buy through the Pentagon's Foreign Military Sales program.

That program has proposed selling more than $1 billion worth of weapons and equipment to Iraq.

U.S. forces don't have the maintenance facilities in Iraq to do complete overhauls of vehicles such as Humvees and tanks, however, meaning the Iraqi military doesn't, either.

Army Chief of Staff Gen. Peter Schoomaker complained this summer that intermittent funding has created backlogs of thousands of vehicles waiting for maintenance at depots in the United States.

Schoomaker and the Marine Corps' commandant, Gen. James Conway, have said supplemental funding approved by Congress hasn't kept pace with the $2 billion per month needed to repair and replace equipment damaged or destroyed in Iraq.

Iraq Study Group Report: Necessary, But Not Sufficient (USAT)

By Joseph Biden

USA Today, December 7, 2006

The Baker-Hamilton report is a first step toward a bipartisan way forward in Iraq. The fundamental changes it proposes are necessary, but not sufficient to achieve the objective most Americans share: to leave Iraq without leaving chaos behind.

The report's most valuable contribution is to make clear that staying the course in Iraq is not an option. Thanks to its efforts, the central question is no longer whether to stay in Iraq, but when and how to responsibly leave.

The military redeployment it proposes is not, by itself, a plan. But the knowledge that our troops will not stay in Iraq in these large numbers can help concentrate the Iraqis on the hard political decisions ahead.

We should start to bring our combat troops out in the first half of next year, but with no artificial end date. A residual force should remain, whose mission would be counterterrorism, training, logistics and force protection.

Even if it made strategic sense to keep 145,000 troops in Iraq beyond next year, we could not do so without damaging the military, including: sending soldiers back on third and fourth tours, extending deployment times from 12 to 18 months, ending the practice of a year at home between deployments, fully mobilizing the Guard and Reserves, and returning demobilized soldiers to Iraq through a backdoor draft.

The impact on retention and recruitment would be devastating.

The report is also right that as we start to bring our troops out, we have to bring Iraq's neighbors in to support a peaceful outcome. That includes not just Saudi Arabia, Jordan, Egypt and Turkey, but Iran and Syria, too. Some of Iraq's neighbors have no desire to do us any favors. But like us, they have powerful interests in preventing a full-blown civil war that could become a regional war.

We should also convene an international conference to help hammer out an agreement among Iraqis and secure the support of Iraq's neighbors — or, if chaos ensues anyway, to help contain its fallout.

While the report gets the big military and diplomatic pieces right, it falls short on the most important piece of all: a strategy for a sustainable political settlement.

It is not enough to stand up Iraqi forces. We have to help Iraqis stand together. That is the only way to break the cycle of violence and prevent Iraq from falling apart.

Instead, the report perpetuates one of the Bush's administration's most fundamental mistakes: the belief that a political settlement can be based solely on building up a strong central government.

That policy has been tried and has failed. There is no trust within the government, no trust of the government by the people, and no capacity on the part of the government to deliver basic services to Iraqis.

Six months ago, with Les Gelb of the Council on Foreign Relations, I offered a detailed plan that would give each of Iraq's main groups incentives to pursue their interests peacefully. The details can be found at www.planforiraq.com.

We proposed a federalized Iraq, with three or more largely autonomous regional governments to suit the separate interests of Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds. Baghdad would remain a federal city, and a central government would administer truly common concerns, such as defending Iraq's borders and managing its foreign policy.

Our idea imposes nothing on the Iraqis, whose constitution already provides for this approach.

For federalism to work, the constitution must be amended to guarantee Sunnis — who are sand-rich but oil-poor — a proportionate share of oil revenue, to be administered by the central government with international oversight.

Absent a political settlement, refocusing the mission of our remaining troops on training and engaging Iraq's neighbors will not stabilize Iraq.

Despite its shortcomings, the Baker-Hamilton report has helped spark a fundamental reassessment of our Iraq policy. Right after the New Year, I will focus the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on that same challenge, in collaboration with my Republican counterpart, Sen. Richard Lugar of Indiana.

We will hold intensive and extensive hearings, over many weeks. We won't be wedded to any one plan or proposal. Our mission will be to shine a light on what options remain for America in Iraq and to help complete the work that this report has so valiantly begun.

Study Group Supports Ordering Agency Workers To Iraq (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, December 7, 2006

Federal agencies supporting the Iraq war and reconstruction should order their civilian employees to fill key jobs in the combat zone if not enough volunteers step forward, a high-level commission said in a report presented to the president and Congress yesterday.

The recommendation by the Iraq Study Group, chaired by James A. Baker III, a former secretary of state, and Lee H. Hamilton, a former House member, grew out of a sense that civilian agencies are not contributing enough personnel to Iraq, adding to the burdens on the U.S. military.

The group offered little detail on the staffing recommendation. In general, the State and Defense departments have been able to recruit volunteers to work in Iraq and Afghanistan, though violence has curtailed their movement. But the report clearly envisions a closer relationship between civilian and military personnel, with one recommendation calling on civilian agencies to train for and conduct joint operations with the military.

Although federal agencies can reassign employees based on where they are needed, it is rarely done. Unions discourage forced reassignments and, at many agencies, only senior federal executives are at any real risk of such transfers because they are seen as a mobile part of the government's workforce.

"This would be somewhat unprecedented," said John Palguta, a longtime federal personnel expert and a vice president at the nonprofit Partnership for Public Service. "I am not aware of any civilian agency that has used directed reassignments to send employees to support an area of conflict."

The Iraq Study Group's report acknowledges that non-defense agencies "have little experience with complex overseas interventions to restore and maintain order," especially in a dangerous setting like Iraq.

But, the report says, "the United States has had great difficulty filling civilian assignments in Iraq with sufficient numbers of properly trained personnel at the appropriate rank."

If the government in the short term is unable "to fill key positions in Iraq, civilian agencies must fill those positions with directed assignments," the report recommends.

Such orders, also called "directed reassignments," are typically used when an agency transfers a job to a different location, usually in the United States, and tells the civil service employee to move along with the job. Employees who balk risk losing their jobs.

The commission report says agencies should take steps "to mitigate familial or financial hardships posed by directed assignments," including tax exemptions on salaries similar to those provided to the military.

The American Federation of Government Employees, which has long expressed concern about how some agencies handle employees' temporary reassignments to duty stations far from their homes, declined to comment on the recommendation yesterday.

J. Anthony Holmes, president of the American Foreign Service Association, said a key issue in deploying civilians involves "the circumstances into which you are putting these people." For instance, he said, civilians probably cannot do their jobs in areas where security is dangerous but could carry out their duties in a post-conflict environment.

From a management perspective, "you want people to volunteer," he said. "They are far more productive and will be more successful in accomplishing their tasks."

Palguta said the commission's recommendation could be "a tough lift." He said, "Not many employees are going to be happy about being redirected to a war zone."Postal Agreement

The largest post office union, the American Postal Workers Union, has reached a tentative four-year contract agreement with the U.S. Postal Service, officials announced yesterday.

The agreement covers 272,000 career employees, mostly clerks, who process mail and work at retail windows; building maintenance workers, who perform custodial, mechanical and electronic duties; and truck drivers and mechanics.

DOJ_NMG_0103274

"We believe this tentative agreement is in the best interests of our customers, our employees and all postal stakeholders," said Doug Tulino, Postal Service vice president for labor relations.

The agency declined to provide information on changes in wages, benefits and working conditions for APWU members. "The tentative contract is in the hands of APWU leadership, and we will leave it to them to discuss details of the tentative agreement," said Dave Partenheimer, a Postal Service spokesman.

William Burrus, the APWU president, said terms of the agreement will be announced after the tentative contract is presented to representatives of rank-and-file employees. Burrus called the proposed contract "an outstanding agreement."

Contract talks with the Postal Service's other large union, the National Association of Letter Carriers, have broken down, and the two sides appear headed for binding arbitration.

Welcome Political Cover (NYT)

The New York Times, December 7, 2006

When President Bush insisted that the Iraq Study Group would not provide cover for the White House to chart a "graceful exit" of American troops, he was missing the whole point. The much-anticipated report from the bipartisan panel is precisely about political cover. That is a good thing, if only Mr. Bush has the sense to embrace it.

Iraq is so far gone that nobody expected the panel to come up with a breakthrough solution. As the co-chairmen — former Secretary of State James Baker and former Representative Lee Hamilton — began their letter accompanying yesterday's report, "there is no magic formula to solve the problems of Iraq." And the study was never going to change the basic facts: there is no victory to be had in Iraq, and however American troops withdraw, they will leave behind a deadly mess.

Its real mission was to avert the worst scenario, in which a stubborn George W. Bush spends the next two years blindly insisting he will accept nothing short of victory, while Iraq keeps spiraling out of control and the Iraqis get no closer to being able to contain the chaos after the Americans leave.

That is a recipe for years more of savagery, a spillover of terrorism and instability across the Middle East, more sacrifice of American soldiers and more cynicism and division among the American people. Avoiding it is not the same as winning the war, but it is a way to cut one's losses.

If Mr. Bush has the capacity to seriously reassess his Iraq strategy, he will need exactly the kind of political cover that the Baker-Hamilton group was meant to provide. The central point of the group's 79 unanimous recommendations is that Washington should focus far more aggressively on training Iraqi forces and prepare for a withdrawal of American troops. The report says all combat brigades could be out by early 2008, but that would still leave tens of thousands of soldiers behind to hold the Iraqi Army together.

That is to be combined with a lot more pressure on the Iraqis to make political compromises and take responsibility for their own security (the report lays out clear milestones and says the United States should reduce its military and economic support if the Iraqis resist) and more aggressive regional diplomacy, including talks with Iran and Syria that Mr. Bush has ruled out.

Make no mistake, the report is a stunning indictment of Mr. Bush's failure — in Iraq and no less in Washington. But its recommendations are still couched in language vague enough to allow the president to pretend it is the "new way forward" his aides are now talking up, rather than a timetable for withdrawal, which is on Mr. Bush's no-go list. Predictably, the first reaction of Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, was to insist that "there is nothing in here about pulling back militarily."

The world has watched as Mr. Bush painted himself into a corner and then insisted it was a strategic decision. Even the Iraqis are trying to provide cover to for him to come tiptoeing back to the real world. Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki's call for a regional conference on Iraq would allow the administration to get past its refusal to talk to Tehran and Damascus, by saying that ban was never meant to include Iraqi initiatives.

The Iraq report is a deeply diplomatic document, stuffed with "coulds" and "mights." It is, all in all, exactly the kind of shades-of-gray thinking that Mr. Bush despises, and exactly what he needs to get the country out of the hole he has dug.

The Study Group Reports (WP)

The Washington Post, December 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0103275

THE REPORT OF THE Iraq Study Group outlines a military strategy for Iraq that has already been embraced in large measure by the Iraqi government and U.S. military commanders, if not explicitly by President Bush. It foresees a year-long shift of U.S. forces from fighting insurgents and preventing sectarian war to advising and supporting an Iraqi army that would take responsibility for those missions. If all went well, most U.S. combat units would withdraw by early 2008, but a "robust" American force would stay on to guard against the collapse of the Iraqi government, to fight al-Qaeda and to deter intervention by Iraq's neighbors.

As the study group concedes, this last-ditch strategy to stabilize Iraq might not work. But it is an option worth trying, and one Americans and Iraqis can agree on. The biggest contribution of the group may have been to unite five prominent Republicans and five prominent Democrats behind this plan. As chairmen James A. Baker III and Lee H. Hamilton repeatedly noted, the country desperately needs to build a bipartisan consensus on the war.

The study group's diplomatic proposals are more ambitious and will be more controversial. The report outlines a broad attempt to solve the problems of the Middle East, including the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and the related disputes among Israel, Syria and Lebanon -- worthy goals that have eluded this and every U.S. administration over the past four decades. More practically, it calls for the establishment of an Iraq International Support Group, made up of all of Iraq's neighbors, the permanent members of the U.N. Security Council and possibly other parties that would promote the country's stabilization. This is a good idea that should have been tried long ago. It implies a modification of the Bush administration's refusal to negotiate with Iran or Syria, so it is encouraging that the White House did not rule it out yesterday.

There are other useful recommendations in the report, including an increase in reconstruction aid to Iraq, which is close to running out, and improvements in intelligence-gathering. There is also a proposal to push the Iraqi government toward meeting "milestones" on the way to political reconciliation by threatening to withhold aid or withdraw troops if it does not. The pressure for action is certainly needed. But the danger is that Congress will interpret the policy as a license to place crippling conditions on U.S. support for a government that could not survive without it.

What's missing from the study group report, unfortunately, is any evaluation of what should be done if the new strategy doesn't work -- if, despite the stepped-up training, diplomacy and pressure for Iraqi political reconciliation, the incipient civil war intensifies or the army and government remain too weak to survive on their own. In that all-too-likely scenario, Democrats would probably press for troop withdrawals to proceed regardless, while Mr. Bush has said he will not "pull our troops off the battlefield before the mission is complete."

While the study group has papered over this old debate between "stay the course" and "cut and run," it has not made it go away. With luck the next year will bring both measurable progress toward stability in Iraq and a reduction in U.S. forces and casualties. But it would be well to have a study group or two, inside the administration or out, preparing for the possibility that the United States will face another difficult choice a year from now between a continued commitment of U.S. combat forces and the "slide toward chaos" of which Mr. Baker and Mr. Hamilton grimly warned.

The Iraq Muddle Group (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 7, 2006

President Bush met yesterday with the Iraq Study Group to discuss its long-awaited report, but by far his most important Iraq meeting of the week was Monday's with Shiite leader Abdul Aziz al-Hakim. That's because the way to success in Iraq lies in stronger U.S. support for Baghdad's Shiite-led governing coalition, not in some bipartisan strategic muddle ginned up for domestic political purposes.

This is not to say that yesterday's Study Group report, led by James Baker and Lee Hamilton, serves no useful purpose. In calling for a withdrawal of most U.S. troops by 2008 -- if security conditions allow -- the report rejects any rapid withdrawal or deadline. Likewise, it reinforces the case Mr. Bush has been making about the ugly consequences of failure in Iraq for American interests. This includes the chance of a bloodbath that would make Rwanda look tame. If the report helps to politically isolate John Murtha and the get-out-now left, its authors will have done some good.

As for specific proposals, the Study Group proves Robert Gates's point from his nomination hearing on Tuesday that "there are no new ideas on Iraq." Its best proposal -- embedding more American troops to train and fight with Iraqi military units -- is well under way at the Pentagon. It has been clear for some time that the Iraq Army needs at least to double its current size, and the presence of U.S. troops with Iraqi units has produced better results.

On the other hand, the ISG's proposal to negotiate with Iran and Syria is a very old idea that isn't likely to go anywhere. The report argues that because both Iran and Syria have an "interest in avoiding chaos in Iraq," they will want to cooperate in some larger regional settlement.

Come again? Iran's leadership proclaims its satisfaction with the U.S. troubles in Iraq on an almost daily basis. They seem to believe their interest lies in bleeding the U.S. so much that no President will ever contemplate regime change anywhere else for a very long time. In any case, while Iran and Syria can harm us in Iraq at the margins, Iraq's sectarian violence is primarily indigenous -- fomented by Sunni Baathists and their al Qaeda allies, and countered by Shiite militias.

And this is where the ISG went most awry, with its analysis that comes close to a pox on all Iraqi factions. Of course "national reconciliation" is essential and Iraq's minority Sunnis need to be given a stake in the new Iraq. But the reality is that the main cause of the violence in Iraq -- the main enemy -- are the Sunni terrorists. They can't be appeased with political offers because their goal is to drive out America and then topple the government.

On that point, the best "new" idea on Iraq that we've heard runs exactly counter to the ISG suggestion of "conditional" U.S. support based on forced "reconciliation." According to a report in the Washington Post, State Department Counselor Phillip Zelikow recently drafted a memo on something called the "80% solution," referring to the roughly 80% of Iraqis who are Shiites and Kurds. Mr. Zelikow argues that U.S. attempts to draw violent Sunni factions into the political process have not only failed but also alienated our natural allies among the majority of Iraqis who welcomed the overthrow of Saddam.

This does not mean the U.S. would be taking sides with Shiite death squads against the Sunni terrorists. Far from it, the point would be to reassure Iraq's elected government that the United States is firmly on its side. This is particularly important for Mr. Hakim and other Shiites, many of whom still remember being abandoned by the U.S. after they were urged to rebel against Saddam way back in 1991.

The U.S. has resurrected that mistrust far too often since 2003 -- in the use of Algerian Sunni Lakhdar Brahimi to select Iraq's first interim government, and in the U.S. role earlier this year in forcing out former Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari. Many Shiites now feel Nouri al-Maliki's government is being undercut too.

So it's no surprise that Maliki aides reacted angrily yesterday to the ISG suggestion of "conditional" support. Shiite mistrust also played a role in the cancellation last week of the planned three-way meeting among Mr. Maliki, Mr. Bush, and Jordan's King Abdullah. Our information is the snub had nothing to do with the leak of a memo about Mr. Maliki by National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley (the Bush-Maliki meeting went ahead as planned) but was instead a signal that the Iraqi government wants no part of a "regional solution" that involves concessions to Sunni terrorists.

A fair deal for ordinary Sunnis on oil revenues and other issues is more likely if the Shiite-led government feels secure, not threatened. The Maliki government will also have more clout to disarm Shiite militias if U.S. support seems firm. This strategy is also the best way to counter Iranian influence in Iraq. Most Iraqi Shiites have no desire to take orders from Tehran, but they will surely turn eastward if they feel abandoned by the U.S.

Mr. Bush was diplomatic in welcoming the ISG report yesterday, as he had to be. But one idea he'd do well to reject out of hand is the proposal that backing for Mr. Maliki be conditioned on U.S. benchmarks. The more the U.S. looks like it is forcing a political solution on Baghdad's moderate Shiites, the less likely a genuine "reconciliation" will become.

What They Said ... (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 7, 2006

IT COULD NOT PUT an end to sectarian violence in Iraq, but at least for a day the Iraq Study Group put an end to sectarian bickering in Washington. The panel's five Republicans and five Democrats unanimously agreed that the present strategy in Iraq is not working and signed off on 79 recommendations to the Bush administration.

Their report distills the emerging conventional wisdom in Washington, laced with a measure of wishful thinking. Yes, persuading Iran and Syria to help stabilize Iraq, contrary to the administration's stance, is a worthy pursuit, though it isn't clear why Syria and Iran would want to do so, at least in the immediate term. And yes, settling the Israeli-Palestinian conflict would indeed reduce tensions throughout the Arab world, though linking that issue to the commission's brief was a stretch that plays into the hands of anti-American extremists in the region.

The report also engages in some suspiciously tidy thinking when it says that most U.S. combat troops can exit Iraq by the first quarter of 2008. The commission seems to be offering President Bush the "graceful exit" he has said is not possible. But the formulation is unsatisfying and carefully hedged.

The report says the situation in Iraq is "grave and deteriorating" and concedes that the U.S. cannot pull out abruptly. Yet its recipe for turning the corner — ramp up the training of the Iraqi army while reducing U.S. combat units — is disingenuously optimistic. No one can argue with a recommendation to train Iraqi units at an accelerated pace and to include more U.S. troops serving alongside them. But more direct U.S. involvement in the daily battle to secure Baghdad may also be necessary, especially in the short term.

More useful is the report's discussion of Iraqi governance. To counter the impression that the United States has given the Iraqi government a blank check to do as it pleases, the commission calls for consequences if Baghdad fails to meet specific milestones on governance and national unity. For instance, future U.S. assistance should be conditioned on the government's willingness to take on Shiite militias. This is the most timely part of the report, in light of the Bush administration's own doubts about the government of Prime Minister Nouri Maliki and the moral imperative of preventing U.S. troops from becoming partisans in an Iraqi civil war.

One of the most refreshing of the report's recommendations doesn't appear until No. 72. It won't get U.S. troops out any faster, or bring democracy to Iraq. It would, however, end a gross subversion of democratic checks and balances here at home.

The commission calls out the Bush administration for its excessive reliance on supplemental appropriations bills to pay for the war. This is a way of bypassing House and Senate committees that spend nearly a year examining the president's annual budget request. The emergency bills make it impossible to tell what's going to Iraq and what's going to Afghanistan or somewhere else.

In this, as in so many other areas of the war, the administration's strategy seems designed to avoid congressional review — and in this case, it also runs up the federal tab and conceals the true costs of the war from the American people.

... And Who Will Listen? (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 7, 2006

IT'S EASY TO MAKE fun of the Iraq Study Group, which in many ways epitomizes Washington's tendency to disguise the obvious as profound. But independent commissions have a long and (mostly) honorable history in the United States, and it would be a mistake to dismiss the 79 recommendations of the Iraq Study Group simply because they are familiar. Such commissions often have an influence that lasts beyond their final report.

They come in three basic varieties: First, there are what might be called forensic commissions such as the Warren Commission, chaired by former Chief Justice Earl Warren. It investigated the assassination of President Kennedy and endorsed a "single-bullet theory" that sustained conspiracy theorists long before anyone had heard of Oliver Stone.

Then there are the philosophical commissions, which, though convened because of a specific event, come to broad conclusions about U.S. society. The so-called Kerner Commission, appointed by President Johnson after race riots in 1967, commanded attention by blaming the disorders on white racism and famously warning that the nation was "moving toward two societies, one black, one white — separate and unequal."

Finally, there are programmatic commissions, such as the National Commission on Social Security Reform (a.k.a. the Greenspan Commission) that in 1983 proposed a strategy to keep the retirement system solvent.

What makes a commission influential? It helps if it is bipartisan, though it's hardly a guarantee of relevance. The 9/11 commission, with Republican Chairman Tom Kean and Democratic Vice Chairman Lee Hamilton (the co-chairman of the Iraq Study Group), was more successful at winning publicity than at changing policy. A commission also is likelier to gain traction for its recommendations if the president accepts them, or at least doesn't reject them; President Bush has called the Iraq Study Group's report "interesting," which qualifies as non-rejection.

DOJ_NMG_0103278

Politicians and scholars still cite the sobering conclusions of the Kerner Commission. The Warren Commission report is still demonized by some assassination buffs as the quintessential coverup. And, at least among nervous politicians in Washington, the Greenspan Commission is fondly remembered (and likely to be emulated) for the political cover it gave Congress.

Will the Baker-Hamilton panel secure a similar niche in the memory of the nation, or at least of its political class? Or will it become a trivia question, like the Shafer Commission, better known (well, somewhat better known) as the National Commission on Marijuana and Drug Abuse? The answer lies less in what the group proposed than in whether its recommendations come to be seen as a turning point in U.S. involvement in Iraq.

Baker Report's Whiff Of Realism On Iraq (FT)

Financial Times, December 7, 2006

There can be few more surreal moments in international politics than a president of the US welcoming the findings of a group of American elder statesmen which concludes that his defining policy – the invasion and occupation of Iraq – has caused local meltdown and could cause mayhem across the Middle East.

Naturally, it adds to the air of unreality when President George W. Bush keeps insisting he is not seeking a "graceful exit" from Iraq. As if.

The report of the Iraq Study Group, headed by James Baker, secretary of state to George Bush Sr, and Lee Hamilton, the former Democratic congressman, pulls few punches, except perhaps in its almost histrionic overuse of the conditional could to describe events already under way ("neighbouring countries could intervene" in Iraq; "the global standing of the US could be diminished" and so on).

The ISG's recommendations are that US troops withdraw from combat to a supporting role with Iraqi forces and start pulling out "responsibly" over the next year or so. To that end, the Iraqi government should be held to measur-able goals on security and "national reconciliation" between Sunni and Shia, locked in a sectarian war that is claiming around 5,000 lives a month.

The group also calls for a "diplomatic offensive" to get Iraq's neighbours – including Iran and Syria – to help rebuild its security, and a new push to settle the Israeli-Palestinian conflict at the heart of the region's instability.

These are all sane suggestions. The question is: will a Bush administration trapped in denial act on them and, even if it does, will it be too late?

Mr Bush may move because, despite his protestations, the Baker exercise is intended to help him as he flounders towards the Iraqi exit. But there is no indication he is willing to engage with Iran or capable of pressing Israel to give up enough occupied land to enable the Palestinians to build a viable state.

If, as the ISG says, the US wishes at least to improve the chances of success in Iraq and the region, these are not optional choices but, as this newspaper has long argued, absolute necessities.

The US will never command Arab support unless it makes an honest attempt to secure justice for the Palestinians. Nor will it ever again be able to hold the ring in the Middle East without reaching some modus vivendi with Iran. The Iranians are the clear winners from the fiasco in Iraq. The Bush administration casually overturned a millennium-old Sunni Arab order, oversaw the installation of Tehran's friends in Baghdad and then, as the consequences of its actions unfolded, scurried back to its old Sunni autocrat allies in Egypt and Saudi Arabia in search of solutions.

Wednesday's advice to Mr Bush is clear: for there to be any chance of an orderly withdrawal that leaves behind some sort of stability in Iraq he should accept the Baker package as a whole.

Baker-Hamilton Does Its Job (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, December 7, 2006

DUBAI -- The Iraq Study Group's report achieved the goal of any blue-ribbon commission: It stated the obvious, emphatically.

DOJ_NMG_0103279

"The situation in Iraq is grave and deteriorating." Of various proposals for fixing Iraq, "all have flaws." A "precipitate" withdrawal would be a mistake, but so would a big increase in U.S. troops. America should set "milestones" for the Iraqi government to control all provinces by next September. The U.S. military should shift to a training and advising mission so that most American troops can leave by early 2008. But there is no "magic formula," and even if this approach fails, the United States "should not make an open-ended commitment to keep large numbers of American troops deployed in Iraq."

A cynic might argue that this laundry list is precisely what the Bush administration was moving toward in its own internal review of policy. But I think that's the point about the bipartisan commission headed by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and ex-representative Lee H. Hamilton. They have stamped an interwoven "D" and "R" on recommendations that seem so familiar you wonder why they haven't been official policy all along. (Some of them have been, though you wouldn't have known it from President Bush's bluff and bluster.)

What's new in the Baker-Hamilton approach is the part that's least likely to be successful -- the call for an International Support Group that, in theory, would include the regional bad boys, Iran and Syria, along with foot-draggers such as Russia, China and France. And while they're at it, Baker and Hamilton propose a crash effort to resolve the Palestinian conflict, make peace between Israel and Syria and resolve the mess in Lebanon.

I like this "New Diplomatic Offensive" precisely because it is so ambitious. It would put the United States back in the business of trying to solve the Arab-Israeli problem, which has been driving the Middle East crazy for nearly 40 years. As for Iran and Syria, the great advantage of asking them to join a global effort to stabilize Iraq is that if they say no, it's blood on their hands. As the report notes, "An Iranian refusal to do so would demonstrate to Iraq and the rest of the world Iran's rejectionist attitude and approach, which could lead to its isolation."

And what is America's leverage for bringing Iran and Syria to the table (other than the implicit threat to walk away and let them worry about the Iraqi civil war)? The report includes this delicious Bakeresque ploy: "Saudi Arabia's agreement not to intervene with assistance to Sunni Arab Iraqis could be an essential quid pro quo for similar forbearance on the part of other neighbors, especially Iran."

Aha! So that explains the unusual op-ed by quasi-official Saudi analyst Nawaf Obaid in The Post on Nov. 29 threatening that Saudi troops would be sent into Iraq if America should leave. It was a bargaining chip.

Another laudable aspect of the Baker-Hamilton report (especially in comparison with Bush's rhetoric) is that it doesn't mince words about how bad things are in Iraq. The Iraqi army has made only "fitful progress toward becoming a reliable and disciplined fighting force." The Iraqi police are "substantially worse" than the army. The results of the latest effort to pacify Baghdad have been "disheartening." Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki means well, but he "has taken little meaningful action" against militias. Sunni Arabs haven't yet "made the strategic decision to abandon violent insurgency." No reconciliation will be possible without an unpalatable amnesty for Iraqis who fought against U.S. forces. At least we are beginning to tell the truth here.

The final reason to embrace the Baker-Hamilton report is that its combination of cut-your-losses pragmatism and earnest do-gooderism will reassure the world that America has turned a page on Iraq. The level of anti-American sentiment in the Middle East these days is genuinely frightening. It has become the organizing principle of political life, even in once-friendly countries such as Lebanon. This is the real national security threat to America -- this sense in the rest of the world that Iraq symbolizes America's fatal new combination of arrogance and incompetence.

This report asks the world to help us find our way back home. Even if its proposals don't succeed, Baker-Hamilton can still accomplish its purpose, to "enable the United States to begin to move its combat forces out of Iraq responsibly."

A Report Overtaken By Reality (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, December 7, 2006

The Iraq Study Group, like the policy it was created to critique, was overtaken by the unexpectedly rapid crumbling of the U.S. position in Iraq since the ISG was formed in March. The deterioration was manifested in last week's misbegotten summit between President Bush and Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, which made brutally clear how difficult it will be to apply even the ISG's temperate recommendations to the deteriorating reality.

DOJ_NMG_0103280

Summits usually do, and generally should, resemble American political conventions -- they should not be deliberative events but should ratify decisions made earlier. The ISG's recommendations must be read in light of these facts from the week during which the recommendations were being written:

Calling Iraq's prime minister "the right guy" for Iraq, Bush met him in Jordan, presumably because Iraq is too dangerous a venue for discussing how to, in Bush's words, "complete" the job. The job is to stabilize Iraq, which cannot be done without breaking the Mahdi Army, which cannot be done without bringing down Maliki, who is beholden to Moqtada al-Sadr, the cleric who more or less controls the Mahdi Army, which probably is larger and more capable than Iraq's army.

Also in the week before the ISG's report, the leaked Donald Rumsfeld memo urged policy to "go minimalist." That is generally good advice to government, but much of the rest of the memo, with its 21 "illustrative new courses of action" -- a large number, and evidence that none is especially promising -- echoed the 1960s Great Society confidence in government-engineered behavior modification: jobs programs for unemployed young Iraqis, reallocation of reconstruction funds to "stop rewarding bad behavior" and "start rewarding good behavior," and bribery ("provide money to key political and religious leaders").

It is beyond dispiriting that after 45 months of war an American official can think that this semi-genocidal conflict over the survival of groups divided about the meaning of God's will can now be dampened by clever economics. By what the ISG did not recommend -- e.g., many more troops and much more money -- it recognized that the deterioration is beyond much remediation.

When the ISG made a four-day visit to Iraq in August, its members were taken to the Green Zone, in a city so dangerous that only one ISG member -- former senator Chuck Robb, a Marine veteran of Vietnam combat -- left it, to visit Marines in the turbulent Anbar province. But, then, long before the ISG came to study it, Iraq seemed impervious to America's plans for ameliorating its dysfunctions.

The ISG's central conclusion, important to say with the group's imprimatur even though the conclusion is obvious, is that the problem with Iraq is the Iraqis, a semi-nation of peoples who are very difficult to help. The ISG's report will help accomplish what it recommends -- increase pressure on Iraq's "government" in the hope of turning it into a government by June, when Maliki says Iraq will be able to cope with its security needs.

How likely is that? Look back two years. In June 2004, at the time the Coalition Provisional Authority was to transfer sovereignty to what it thought would be an Iraqi government, Americans were toiling to finish their work of occupation: "A lawyer who had once clerked for Supreme Court Chief Justice William Rehnquist was poring over a draft edict requiring Iraqi political parties to engage in American-style financial disclosure." Such surreal vignettes abound in "Imperial Life in the Emerald City: Inside Iraq's Green Zone," by The Post's Rajiv Chandrasekaran. The book, which should be read along with the ISG report, would be hilarious were it not horrifying that so much valor and suffering have been expended in this context:

Halliburton, writes Chandrasekaran, hired Pakistanis and Indians, but no Iraqis, for kitchen work. "Nobody ever explained why, but everyone knew. They could poison the food." Of the CPA staff, "More than half, according to one estimate, had gotten their first passport in order to travel to Iraq." Two CPA staffers said that before they were hired, they were asked if they supported Roe v. Wade. The traffic code the CPA wrote for Iraq stipulated that "the driver shall hold the steering wheel with both hands" and "rest should be taken for five minutes for every one hour of driving." But Chandrasekaran's driver, who like other Iraqis had obeyed the laws under Saddam's police state, began disregarding all traffic laws. "When I asked him what he was doing, he turned to me, smiled, and said, 'Mr. Rajiv, democracy is wonderful. Now we can do whatever we want.' "

Not exactly.

It's A War, Not A Buffet (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 7, 2006

IN WASHINGTON, sometimes it's preferable to be wrong in a group than to be right alone.

Nothing demonstrates the triumph of this truism better than the release Wednesday of the final Iraq Study Group report. The commission's chairman, James A. Baker III, could not have been more obvious if he had used hand puppets to illustrate what he thought was most important about this supposedly momentous occasion: the fact that all the report's authors actually agree with its contents.

DOJ_NMG_0103281

Their product, Baker gushed, is "the only recommended approach that will enjoy, in our opinion, complete bipartisan support, at least from the 10 people that you see up here." Whoop-de-do. No one in the media was sufficiently motivated to ask the emperors why they had no clothes on, or to raise the simple question, "Who cares?"

Instead, viewers at home (all three broadcast networks broke in to cover the "news" live) watched as one commission member after another grew misty-eyed over their own statesmanship. Former Clinton Chief of Staff Leon Panetta waxed lyrical about how this document represented "one last chance at unifying this country on this war." Heads sagely nodded at the relentless self-adulation of commissioners who put their "partisan differences" behind them in the spirit of unanimity, unity, bipartisanship, comity, handholding and all around mutual respect and love.

(It's no wonder one of their key recommendations is to form an international Iraq "support group." Who can resist the image of Iran's Mahmoud Ahmadinejad whining about how his father never loved him, only to be interrupted by King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia complaining that the Zionists ate all the good doughnuts?)

At the end of the day, the report reflects the man who put the deal together. Baker is a deal maker, a power broker, a difference splitter. And that's the real spirit of the Baker-Hamilton commission.

Some people want more troops in Iraq, so it calls for some more troops at first — so as to better train the Iraqis. And then, because other people want far fewer troops, it calls for a timetable for far fewer troops by 2008. Because no foreign policy commission could ever be complete without blaming the Israeli-Palestinian conflict for something, the group throws a bone to that crowd as well. And because Baker thinks everything is a negotiation, he sees nothing wrong with chatting up everyone — including terrorist militias and our enemies in Iran and Syria.

The commissioners are latter-day Laodiceans, whom the Book of Revelation describes as "neither cold nor hot … [but] lukewarm." As a result, most of the report hits stratospheric heights of banality. For example, the commission put aside partisan differences to reach the startling conclusion that "Syria can establish hotlines to exchange information with the Iraqis." If it requires consensus to deliver such Solomonic wisdom, then I say "feh" on consensus.

The group also recommends that "Iran should stem the flow of arms and training to Iraq, respect Iraq's sovereignty and territorial integrity and use its influence over Iraqi Shia groups to encourage national reconciliation." Phew. Thank goodness Vernon Jordan signed on to that one. If only nine out of 10 had agreed, some people might have concluded that maybe Iran shouldn't do that stuff.

In short, Baker did not seek to find a solution for Iraq at all. His mission was to stuff a grab bag with enough mundane blather that nine graybeards plus Sandra Day O'Connor could assent without really risking anything. Indeed, former Justice O'Connor was a perfect choice given her preternatural gift for reaching decisions with no discernible principle to them other than the need to please everybody a little. Yogi Berra once said, "If you come to a fork in the road, take it." That, it seems, was the commission's approach.

According to the New York Times, the findings are "a compromise between distinct paths that the group has debated since March." And because "everyone felt good about where we ended up," according to one member of the commission quoted in the Times, they must have gotten it right. Right?

Unfortunately, that's not right. Nowhere does the commission ever seriously consider how to win the war in Iraq. Why? Because winning is no longer a possible consensus position. And pulling out isn't a consensus position either. So rather than a real strategy about Iraq, we get Laodicean tripe about how the Iraq Study Group is our last best hope to unite Americans. I'm sorry, but that wasn't its mandate.

Some have labeled the commission's plan of handing off Iraq to the Iraqis a replay of Nixon's Vietnamization. But the similarities go beyond that. In fact, the commission is making the same core mistake that was made in the Vietnam era: treating a war like a political problem to be haggled, spun and bartered. It may not seem like it because Baker & Co. claim so often to be transcending politics in the name of unity. But in fact, their political values trump everything, including the war.

No Way To Win A War (WSJ)

By Eliot Cohen

The Wall Street Journal, December 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0103282

The theory of the thing is very peculiar indeed. You are in the middle of a war -- a hard war, a war that is going badly. If the government has bogged down, if the people inside have gone stale, you would say that the sound thing, the Churchillian or Lincolnian or Rooseveltian thing, would be, first, to fire a bunch of officials (generals as well as top civilians), promote or bring in fresh talent, and put together a small group of people to take a new and unillusioned look. Those people would report back in secrecy to the president and his most senior advisers and aides.

They would consist of experienced soldiers and civilians in whom the president (who, after all, has to make the strategic decisions, and is the accountable executive) has trust. There would not be many of them, a half dozen or so, and they would have to be hardy enough to visit the war zone for several weeks, talking not just to politicians and generals but to captains and sergeants. They would go see things for themselves. They would visit a forward operating base near Tikrit; they would spend some time with Iraqi soldiers in Taji; they would take their chances in a convoy to al Asad, or even a patrol in Tal Afar.

They -- not their staff of a few soldiers and secretaries -- would do the probing, digging, thinking, discussing and, above all, the writing. The chairman of the group would insist that they air their disagreements candidly and thoroughly in front of the president, engaging in a debate that might last a day, perhaps longer. The rest of us would not find out about the panel until months, or even years, after it reported back; maybe not until the war was over. * * *

The administration's congressional critics (including those of its own party) came up with a different solution: the Iraq Study Group (ISG), which has now produced a document that consists of 50 pages of recommendations, preceded by a 40-page thumbnail sketch of the current situation in Iraq and 50 pages of maps, lists of people, and full-length biographies of the commissioners. This is a group composed, for the most part, of retired eminent public officials, most with limited or no expertise in the waging or study of war. It consists of individuals carefully selected with an eye to diverse partisan and other irrelevant personal characteristics. These worthies, with not one chairman but two (for balance, of course), turned to several score experts known to disagree vehemently with one another about the best course of action to be pursued in Iraq.

Some of the commission members and their advisers cordially detest the president and his administration and opposed him and his war from the outset; others were equally passionate in their defense of both the man and the conflict. And yet this diverse group had an overwhelming mandate, from the beginning, to produce a consensus document. The commission members spent four days in Iraq, and with the exception of a one-day foray by former Marine Chuck Robb, they stayed in the Green Zone, that bubble of palaces and residences that has little to do with the real Iraq of Basra, Kirkuk, Ramadi, Baquba and Mosul. At the end, they had breakfast with the president and a few hours later posted their conclusions on the Internet for all the world to ponder. There is something of farce in all this, an invocation of wisdom from a cohesive Washington elite that does not exist, a desperate wish to believe in the gravitas and the statecraft of grave men (and women) who can sort out the mess in which the country finds itself.

A fatuous process yields, necessarily, fatuous results. "Iraq's neighbors are not doing enough to help Iraq achieve stability" -- a statement only somewhat ameliorated by the admission that some are even "undercutting stability," which sounds as though Syria and Iran were being downright rude, rather than providing indispensable assistance to those who have filled the burn wards of Walter Reed, the morgue in Baghdad, and the cemetery at Arlington. The selected remedy is, first and foremost, rather like the ISG's credo for its own functioning, consensus. "The United States should immediately launch a new diplomatic offensive to build an international consensus for stability in Iraq and the region," as if our chief failure with Bashar Assad or Mahmoud Ahmadinejad lies with the hitherto unnoticed laziness or rhetorical ineptitude of our diplomats, or as though Europe, Saudi Arabia and Israel have not yet figured out that stability in Iraq is a good thing. "Syria should control its border" and "Iran should respect Iraq's sovereignty."

No kidding -- but who is going to make them? That perennial solution, "resolution of the Arab-Israeli conflict," makes its appearance, including direct negotiations between Israel and Palestinians, but only with "those who accept Israel's right to exist." The report conveniently forgets that the elected leaders of Palestine do not, in fact, accept Israel's right to exist. And it also neglects the grim reality that one of the most terrible things about Gaza, and possibly the West Bank as well, is that no one, not even Hamas, is really in charge.

Part of Iran's price for easing up on us in Iraq is pretty clearly taking the heat off its nuclear program; the ISG recommends that that issue "should continue to be dealt with by the five permanent members of the United Nations Security Council plus

Germany." Well, what deal should the U.S. be willing to cut on Iranian nuclear weapons? Do we think the Iranians would deliver? And what are the long-term consequences?

War, and warlike statecraft, is a hard business, and though this is supposed to be a report dominated by "realists," there is nothing realistic in failing to spell out the bloody deeds, grim probabilities and dismal consequences associated with even the best course of action. Indeed, some parts of the report read as sheer fantasy -- Recommendation 15, for example, which provides that part of the American deal with Syria should include the latter's full cooperation in investigating the Hariri assassination, verifiable cessation of Syrian aid to Hezbollah, and its support for persuading Hamas to recognize Israel.

The prescriptions for internal processes in Iraq are only somewhat better. The ISG argues that American forces should shift to developing Iraqi security forces and backing them up, which is more or less the course we are on now. It talks of milestones for Iraqi performance, as if Iraqi benchmarking were more a problem than Iraqi will, and Iraqi will more the problem than Iraqi capability. It suggests announcing our own planned redeployments without considering the most obvious consequence, which is that Iraqis of many political hues will decide that the Americans are leaving, and the time has come to cut deals with Jaish al Mahdi, or the Badr organization, or al Qaeda in Iraq, or any of the other cutthroat outfits infesting that bleeding country.

Quite apart from the psychological impact of our actions, there is the sober fact that the Iraqi army is small, 138,000-strong (and that number probably overstated), and that building effective security forces takes time. The 188,000-man police forces are corrupt, riddled with militia influence, and in need of a thorough overhaul. We cannot build the Iraqi security forces without a substantial combat presence. Nor is the problem merely one of training, as Iraqi corporals driving around in pickup trucks without functional radios might have sourly pointed out, had they had the chance to talk to a Study Group member.

At least the ISG has given considerable thought to preparing us for future conflict. Consider Recommendations 47 and 48. Congress, they declare, should allocate money to repair the clapped-out equipment the Army and Marines will bring back from Iraq. This is no doubt better than, say, heaving Bradley infantry fighting vehicles overboard on the way back to American ports in order to provide a home for new coral reefs. "As [American] redeployment proceeds, military leaders should emphasize training and education of forces that have returned to the United States in order to restore the force to full combat capability." Pentagon planners would do well to pursue this plan rather than give the troops six months of leave and then having them paint the sorely neglected rocks outside the sergeant major's office.

The great war leaders, in their private deliberations, shied away from vagueness. Haziness about ends and means, about what to do and how to do it, is a mark of strategic ineptitude; in war it gets people killed. But a Churchill could only call the flattening of German cities "terror bombing" in private.

Thus, unsurprisingly, in a public document of this kind, euphemism and imprecision abound. The U.S. needs to give "disincentives" to Syria and Iran: But the real question has always been whether we are willing to use a variety of overt and covert means -- from bombing insurgent safe houses to sabotaging refineries, from mining harbors to supporting their own insurgents -- to do so. And, in fact, the report mentions no means for squeezing either country.

True, as James Baker irritably noted at the press conference releasing the report, the U.S. talked to the Soviet Union during the Cold War. But as the U.S. did so it also bankrupted the U.S.S.R. in an arms race, undermined its client governments in Eastern Europe by supporting Polish labor unions, and killed its soldiers by providing surface-to-air missiles to Afghan guerrillas. Real pain, and not merely tough talk sweetened by a bucket of goodies, paves the way for successful negotiations with brutal opponents. * * *

What we need in Iraq is not a New Diplomatic Offensive (capitals in the original) so much as energy and competence in fighting the fight. From the outset of the Iraq war much of our difficulty has stemmed not so much from failures to find the right strategy, as from an astounding and depressing inability to implement the strategic and operational choices we have nominally made.

This inability has come from things as personal as picking the wrong people for key positions, in the apparent belief that generals are interchangeable cogs in a counterinsurgency machine. It has come from an unwillingness or inability to grab the bureaucracy by the throat and make it act -- which is why, three years after the insurgency began, we still send soldiers out to risk roadside bomb attacks in overweight Humvees when there are half a dozen commercially available armored vehicles designed to minimize the effects of such blasts. It is why -- although the government has declared long before the ISG issued its report that training the Iraqis is Job One -- we still embed fewer than a dozen American advisers in an Iraqi battalion when the right number is three to five times that many.

We have not come up to the brink of failure because we did not know how important it is to employ young Iraqi men or to keep detained insurgents out of circulation or to prevent militia penetration of the security forces by vetting the commanders of those forces. We have known these things -- but we have not done these things.

The creation of the Iraq Study Group reflects the vain hope that well-meaning, senior, former public officials can find ideas that have not already occurred to people inside government; that those new ideas can redeem incompetent execution and insufficient resources; that salvation can come from a Washington establishment whose wisdom was exaggerated in its heyday, and which has in any event succumbed to a kind of political-intellectual entropy since the 1960s; that a public commission can do the work of oversight that Congress has shirked for five years in the misguided belief that it would thus support an administration struggling to do its best in a difficult situation. This is no way to run a war, and most definitely, no way to win it.

Go Long? Go Big? Go Back To Congress (WP)

By Michael J. Glennon

The Washington Post, December 7, 2006

With President Bush apparently inclined to accept some of the recommendations released by the Iraq Study Group yesterday and reject others, there's an important consideration to keep in mind. Although it's widely assumed that the president alone is empowered to decide what military option the United States should pursue in Iraq, that is not the case. Congress did not, as many believe, write the president a blank check in 2002 with regard to the use of force in Iraq. It still has a lot to say on the subject.

Since its earliest days, the Supreme Court has recognized a president's obligation to respect congressional restrictions when Congress has authorized "imperfect war" -- a war fought for limited purposes. In an imperfect war, Justice Bushrod Washington said in Bas v. Tingy (1800), those "who are authorized to commit hostilities . . . can go no farther than to the extent of their commission." The following year, in Talbot v. Seeman (1801), Chief Justice John Marshall wrote that "[t]he whole powers of war being, by the Constitution of the United States, vested in congress, the acts of that body can alone be resorted to as our guides in this enquiry."

Congress in 2002 authorized imperfect war in approving the use of force in Iraq for specific, limited objectives. As those objectives are achieved, or different ones are pursued, legislative reauthorization will be required. Absent congressional approval, the president cannot use force in Iraq to pursue new objectives, beyond the protection of forces being withdrawn.

Congress specified two objectives in 2002: to "defend the national security of the United States against the continuing threat posed by Iraq," as its resolution put it, and to "enforce all relevant United Nations Security Council resolutions regarding Iraq." The "continuing threat" referred to the danger posed in 2002 and earlier by Saddam Hussein's regime. That threat was seen to flow from the regime's pursuit and possession of weapons of mass destruction. Iraq, the resolution noted, "attempted to thwart the efforts of weapons inspectors to identify and destroy" these weapons.

In 2002, Congress said Iraq continued "to possess and develop a significant chemical and biological weapons capability," actively sought a nuclear capability, and supported and harbored terrorist organizations. Doing so placed Iraq in "material and unacceptable breach" of its international obligations, as set out in various Security Council resolutions. The threat, the resolution found, was that "the current Iraqi regime" would either employ weapons of mass destruction in a surprise attack against the United States or "provide them to international terrorists who would do so."

When President Bush signed the 2002 authorization, he said that "Iraq will either comply with all U.N. resolutions, rid itself of weapons of mass destruction, and end its support for terrorists, or it will be compelled to do so."

Iraq has now done so. Saddam Hussein's regime is history, and the threat posed by it is gone. Hussein himself has been captured, tried and sentenced. A new constitution has been adopted by the Iraqi people. A different government is in place. That government is in compliance with all relevant Security Council resolutions. It does not possess or seek weapons of mass destruction. It does not support or harbor terrorists.

There are, of course, terrorists present in Iraq today who pose a threat to American troops there. They may someday pose a threat to the general U.S. population. But Congress in 2002 authorized use of force against the old Iraqi government, not against groups unaffiliated with Saddam Hussein's regime (many of which actually opposed it). Fewer and fewer of those who are fighting American troops are remnants of Hussein's regime. Hostility to the American presence in Iraq is increasingly broad-based, with polls now showing majority support -- even among Shiites -- for attacking American troops.

Whatever the semantic characterization, the war looks increasingly unlike the one that Congress authorized. What options, then, would require renewed congressional approval? Negotiation is an exclusive presidential prerogative; a decision to talk directly with Syria or Iran or to convene a regional peace conference would be for the executive alone. But military options are another matter. The options to "go big" or to "go long" -- to increase the magnitude or duration of the U.S. effort by systematically taking on assorted Shiite militias, opportunistic criminals, foreign jihadists and others who were not part of Saddam's regime -- would not fit within Congress's existing authority. Congress in 2002 authorized the president to use force in a war against the sitting Iraqi government, not for an Iraqi government or against an opposition that did not then exist.

As a matter of sound policy, as well as constitutional principle, Congress should participate in weighing recommendations on future military action. Whatever military option is selected, its success will depend upon broad support from the American people. Congressional involvement will not guarantee that support, but congressional exclusion will almost surely preclude it.

Blunt Talk For An Audience Of One (LAT)

By Doyle McManus

The Los Angeles Times, December 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — Some bipartisan commissions try to change public opinion on contentious national issues; others try to help Congress find compromise solutions to thorny problems.

The Iraq Study Group led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.) had a different — and unusual — goal: persuading President Bush to change his mind about staying the course in Iraq.

"This is highly unusual," an adviser to the group said today, after the panel released its final report. "It's one thing for people inside the administration to tell the president what to do. But for an outside group to say, 'Here, son, let us give you a road map for your foreign policy?' That's remarkable."

To try to make it easier for the president — a man who prides himself on his consistency, and who is consequently criticized by opponents as stubborn — the 10-member panel delivered its report in two parts, each with a different tone.

The first part of the report was an assessment of the situation in Iraq as "grave and deteriorating" — tough language that Baker and his colleagues deliberately chose to try to break through the shield of defiant confidence that Bush has often deployed on the issue of Iraq.

"At least, after this report, Bush will now be prevented from painting a rosy picture," the adviser said.

But the second part of the report was a carefully calibrated list of recommendations, many of which gave the president considerable leeway to choose specific policies.

For example, while the report recommended that the United States plan to complete most of its military training mission in Iraq by the first quarter of 2008, it noted that it was echoing a date that U.S. military commanders had already projected -- and added that the timetable could be extended if unforeseen circumstances required.

That was part of a concerted effort by the commission to make it as easy as possible for Bush to adopt some version of its ideas, members said.

"We're not here to vex or embarrass," said former Sen. Alan Simpson (R-Wyo.), as the panel presented its findings to Bush at the White House this morning.

DOJ_NMG_0103286

For the same reason, Baker gave Bush a private preview of the report's findings in a one-on-one lunch Tuesday — both to avoid blindsiding the president and to make a sales pitch for the report's recommendations.

Bush was courteous but noncommittal in his comments as he received the report.

"I told the members that this report ... will be taken very seriously by this administration," the president said. "This report gives a very tough assessment of the situation in Iraq. It is a report that brings some really very interesting proposals, and we will take every proposal seriously, and we will act in a timely fashion."

Members of the commission said they were pleased that Bush gave them as much attention as he did, a full hour's worth. "He could have scheduled us for 20 minutes plus 10 minutes for the cameras," said former Atty. Gen. Edwin Meese III.

Later in the day, though, White House spokesman Tony Snow seemed to pour cold water on any expectations that Bush might quickly accept the panel's recommendation that he open talks with Iran and Syria about ways to stabilize Iraq.

"I'm not going to give you an answer to that question today," Snow said.

In recent weeks, Bush preemptively objected to some of the commission's reported recommendations, saying he did not favor unconditional talks with Iran and was not seeking "a graceful exit" from Iraq.

The answer to how far Bush will move, members of the commission say, will depend on how much political pressure he feels from Congress and the public to adopt their findings. Baker and Hamilton plan to give speeches around the country and to testify before the new, Democratic-led Congress next year to keep the pressure up, aides said.

Meanwhile, the administration has at least two policy reviews of its own under way — launched hastily once the Baker-Hamilton commission gained prominence — and plans to review those at the end of the year.

Officials said Bush is likely to adopt findings that are close to his own policies -- such as shifting U.S. troops to advisory roles -- but at a pace the Pentagon proposes, which may be slower than the Baker-Hamilton panel called for.

As for talks with Iran and Syria, the president is likely to say that is up to the government of Iraq, not him. Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki has already called for an international conference to support security measures in Iraq that would include Iran and Syria.

From Hundreds Of Sources, Panel Forged Consensus (WP)

By Peter Baker, Robin Wright And Dafna Linzer

The Washington Post, December 7, 2006

After all the testimony and fact-finding, after all the white papers and working groups, after the flak-jacket, bombs-in-the-background visit to Baghdad, it came down to the same issue that has animated the broader national debate about Iraq for months: Stay or get out.

The Iraq Study Group was starting final deliberations last month when the issue threatened to disrupt the careful consensus its members had tried to forge. Former defense secretary William J. Perry had drafted a proposal calling for a timetable to withdraw U.S. troops, according to accounts by insiders. Former secretary of state James A. Baker III resisted a firm date, wanting to leave that to the president.

"I'm not going to sign anything that is going to paper over the problem," Perry said.

"Well, if that's the case, that's the case," Baker replied.

In the end, though, Baker and Perry walked off together to settle their differences rather than let them split the commission. With suggestions from other members, they crafted careful language that they both could support, a recommendation to pull out nearly all U.S. combat units by early 2008 -- a goal, not a timetable, but a date nonetheless.

The fissure and its resolution culminated a process marked by that rarest of qualities in a polarized era: bipartisanship. At a time when Washington prefers confrontation to compromise, five Republicans and five Democrats sat down to tackle the country's most urgent crisis and came up with a document they all could sign. It proved to be a nine-month study of how to bridge not only Iraq's deep divide but also America's.

Whether the end result will prove meaningful is another question. A plan emerging from the middle invariably unsettles those at either end who view it as wholly inadequate. Even some of the authors consider the report released yesterday a "messy compromise," as one put it. But the story of how a little-noticed commission created by Congress evolved into a political powerhouse and a symbol of national unity harks back to a different time, when for better or worse "Wise Men" advised presidents and shaped policy.

The Iraq Study Group had its origins in a September 2005 trip to Iraq by Rep. Frank R. Wolf (R-Va.), a quiet legislative veteran with a strong moral streak and a driving interest in international human rights. "I saw some things that were dramatically different," recalled Wolf, who had visited twice previously. "You could just feel that things had shifted."

So he conceived the idea of a bipartisan commission that would cut through the domestic rhetoric and offer sober counsel. The Bush administration reacted coolly but ultimately did not block it. In fact, not many took notice. The announcement of the commission in March generated just a single paragraph in the next day's newspaper. Congress did not authorize $1 million in funding until June.

Baker and his co-chairman, former congressman Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), recruited an all-star establishment lineup, including former Cabinet secretaries and senators, a former Supreme Court justice and a backroom powerbroker. Average age: 74. "The only thing we have in common is gray hair," joked former attorney general Edwin Meese III. But they shared a common commitment, he added. "We parked our partisanship at the door."

What would arguably prove to be one of the most anticipated study groups in modern times started tentatively. "At first, they were a little bit uncertain of what they were going to do and even whether it would amount to anything," said Daniel P. Serwer, the group's executive director. "There were a lot of initial questions: What was our role? How can we manage? We're not Iraq experts -- where are we going to get the expertise?"

Under the auspices of the U.S. Institute of Peace and three other think tanks, the commission created four working groups consisting of 44 foreign policy analysts and Iraq specialists to advise it. During its first phase, it set out to define U.S. goals and learn about Iraq. Over nine months, 31 papers were prepared for the panel. Testimony was taken from hundreds of U.S., Iraqi, Arabic and European officials, including President Bush, Vice President Cheney and former president Bill Clinton, as well as scholars, journalists and military officers.

By summer, the expert advisers had developed the first options paper centered on different goals. The experts originally explored four options: "Victory in Iraq," "Defeat Al Qaeda and Stabilize Baghdad," "Make Peace Work" and "Redeploy and Contain," as they were called in a July memo. The first and third were quickly discarded. The last two pitted a more limited military mission against a phased withdrawal over nine to 12 months.

The turning point came in September, when seven of the 10 members traveled to Baghdad aboard a C-130 military transport, decked out in bulletproof vests and helmets as the plane corkscrewed to a landing to avoid enemy rockets. They then flew aboard Black Hawk helicopters to the Green Zone as other choppers fired flares to draw off any heat-seeking missiles.

The four days there made a powerful impression on the panel members, most of whom knew nothing more about Iraq than what they had seen on television and read in the newspapers. "I'll never forget the helicopters coming in at night delivering wounded to the hospital in the Green Zone," recalled member Leon E. Panetta, who was Clinton's White House chief of staff. "We've all seen 'MASH,' and yet it was happening right there."

Explosions outside the Green Zone rattled the guesthouse and trailers where they slept. "You knew somewhere either a car bomb has gone off or something has happened," Panetta said. "And then in the morning, you could sometimes see the smoke."

Only one member, former senator Charles S. Robb (D-Va.), a retired Marine, left the Green Zone, venturing out to look at the impact of the operation intended to secure Baghdad. By the time they returned home, many of the commissioners had concluded that the war was going worse than they had realized. One internal working paper said that 30,000 to 40,000 Iraqis have been dying each year since the 2003 invasion.

The trip "altered their thinking," said Paul Hughes, a commission aide who had served in Iraq and escorted the members on their trip. "Every one of them came out and said there is no immediate exit. There is no way America could turn and walk away from Iraq."

Referring to the insistence of Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.) on a prompt withdrawal, Hughes said that "the Murtha cut-and-run option was a non-starter."

DOJ_NMG_0103288

Robb was especially interested in sending more U.S. forces, according to one participant, and the panel considered proposals to deploy 100,000 to 200,000 additional troops. Ultimately, though, the panel discovered that there might be only 20,000 available, prompting vigorous discussion that led members to conclude that a substantial surge was unworkable.

"By September, you did not hear anyone supporting the idea of victory or more troops very much," said Marina S. Ottaway, a working-group member from the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. "There had been a lot of pretending for a while, but that ended in the fall."

Yet many were slow to support even a phased withdrawal. In a straw poll in September, only two of the commission's 44 advisers favored the idea. Over the next eight weeks, as casualties mounted, support for withdrawal grew exponentially. In e-mails, Wayne White, a former Middle East intelligence analyst, implored holdouts to accept that the United States had badly damaged whole swaths of Iraq and had lost Anbar province to al-Qaeda.

"It sounds great to pump one's chest and declare that we cannot abandon Anbar and such areas to these elements," he wrote. "But . . . can anyone offer a refreshing, new and promising military strategy for beating them soundly with our already-overstretched forces in Iraq, Iraq's woeful police and disappointing army?"

In the last straw vote, on Nov. 3, half of the 44 advisers supported withdrawal.

By then, with the midterm elections upon them, commissioners had cut out the advisers and were talking only among themselves. Baker's tour on behalf of a book he had written raised the panel's public profile, and leaks about the deliberations heightened expectations about the coming report.

The 10 members gathered in Washington on Nov. 27 to begin final deliberations. Baker thought that a major troop withdrawal should happen by the 2008 elections and that it would take six months to complete, according to insiders. But he opposed the specific timetable Perry advanced. Panetta helped resolve the disagreement by suggesting that they adopt a date put forward by Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the Iraq commander, who had just proposed finishing training and equipping Iraqi forces by the first quarter of 2008.

Every line in the 96-page report was carefully debated, and all members agreed in the end. "When we struck consensus, there was a real sense of relief," said former U.S. diplomat Edward P. Djerejian, who co-wrote the drafts with fellow adviser Christopher A. Kojm. "People started cracking jokes."

Vernon E. Jordan Jr., a Clinton confidant who served on the panel and hosted all the other members at his Washington house Tuesday night for a celebratory dinner of crab cakes, beef and souffle, said the debate was the kind Washington used to have. "Nobody was storming out of the room, nobody was screaming at anybody," he said. "What I have seen over the years is civility taking a back seat and giving way to hostility. . . . The good of this report is that civility has been rediscovered."

Baker Brought High-profile Presence To Panel (LAT)

By Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, December 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — His hair was a touch thinner, the skin on his face less taut.

At one point today, James A. Baker III joked that he was presiding over a "bunch of has-beens" as he unveiled the findings of the Iraq Study Group, a bipartisan panel of ex-government officials charged with charting a new course for the United States in Iraq.

But in many ways, Baker was a remarkably familiar presence in a remarkably familiar role -- talking diplomacy in his Texas twang, seeking solutions for a crisis in Iraq, and trying to rescue a president named Bush.

It's been 15 years since Baker, 76, served as secretary of State to the elder President Bush during the Persian Gulf War. And six more since Baker led the GOP legal fight during the Florida election recount that delivered the presidency to his longtime friend's son.

Since then, Baker's influence in the Oval Office has seemed to range from minimal to nonexistent.

But as co-chairman of the Iraq Study Group, Baker has re-emerged. Along with Robert M. Gates, the nominee to be the next secretary of Defense, Baker is part of an old guard of foreign policy realists elbowing their way back into a debate dominated since the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks by hard-line neoconservatives.

DOJ_NMG_0103289

During today's news conference, Baker outlined a series of steps that the White House has previously scorned, including diplomatic engagement with Iran and Syria, and eventual withdrawal of combat troops from Iraq. For a man long seen as the ultimate Bush family insider, he also offered a pointed rebuke to the president.

"We do not recommend a 'stay the course' solution," he said, using a phrase that was a favorite of President Bush earlier this year. "In our opinion, that approach is no longer viable."

Bush praised the work of the panel, saying: "We probably won't agree with every proposal," but stressing that "we take it very seriously, and we'll act on it in a timely fashion."

The study group was launched in relative obscurity nine months ago, conceived by a Republican congressman, Frank Wolf of Virginia, who was dismayed by the deteriorating situation in Iraq. The first member to sign on was Lee Hamilton, a former Democratic congressman from Indiana who had been vice chairman of the panel that investigated the Sept. 11 attacks.

But those involved in the formation of the study group said that the critical recruit was Baker, and that his involvement has been crucial to capturing the attention of policymakers and improving the odds that the panel's findings would not be brushed aside by the White House.

"We talked about a number of possibilities" to lead the panel, said David Abshire, president of the Center for the Study of the Presidency, who helped Wolf form the Iraq Study Group and made the initial call to Baker.

"They were all prominent people," Abshire said of the other candidates. "But none would have had his cache."

Baker agreed to take the job only after securing permission from the president. Once that was in place, Baker stepped into the latest in a series of assignments he has taken for members of the Bush clan since he and the elder Bush became friends and tennis partners in Texas in the late 1950s.

Baker, who had been an attorney and registered Democrat in Houston, took his first political job when the senior Bush asked him to help run his 1970 campaign for the Senate. Bush lost, but Baker proved adept in the world of politics, and the job helped bring him out of a depression that had gripped him when his first wife died of breast cancer earlier that year.

Baker went on to handle a series of subsequent campaign assignments and high-level positions in Washington. He ran Bush's unsuccessful 1980 campaign for president, then served as Treasury secretary and chief of staff for President Reagan. After leading Bush's successful 1988 campaign for the White House, Baker stepped into the role he savored most, secretary of State.

From that post, he witnessed the end of the Cold War and pushed for Arab-Israeli peace. But he is best known for leading the effort to assemble a broad coalition of countries to expel Saddam Hussein's army from Kuwait in the 1991 Gulf War.

As the elder Bush's re-election 1992 campaign foundered, Baker was called upon to leave the State Department and step back into the campaign -- a sacrifice he did not relish.

His perceived lack of enthusiasm for returning to the world of politics is said to have strained his relationship with Barbara Bush as well as with George W. Bush.

In a book, Baker described the younger Bush as "the cut-up in the Bush family." When that cut-up decided to run for president and enlisted advisers, Baker said he was not included.

In fact, Bush's campaign team did come calling the morning after the 2000 election, when the vote in Florida was deadlocked. But after that successful mission, Baker was sidelined again until the Iraq Study Group was formed.

From the beginning, Baker insisted the group shouldn't release its findings until after the midterm elections. Others thought it was a mistake to wait while soldiers were dying and conditions in Iraq continued to deteriorate, Abshire said.

But Baker's judgment proved wise because a report released before the White House had been chastened by a Democratic election sweep probably would have been ignored.

"He's a very shrewd operator," Abshire said of Baker. "He's a strategist."

During today's news conference, Baker said President Bush and other policymakers are free to ignore the group's findings -- but do so at the risk of their own peril.

The group's report "doesn't bind the leadership on the Hill, and it doesn't bind the president," Baker said. "But it is the only recommended approach that will enjoy, in our opinion, complete bipartisan support, at least from the 10 people that you see up here."

Footnote To History: Rituals Of Delivering The Iraq Report (WP)

By David Montgomery

The Washington Post, December 7, 2006

"The Iraq Study Group Report" landed on Washington with all the pomp, circumstance, choreography, videography, confusion, cynicism and hope that Washington yearns for when the Wise Men (and Woman) hold forth with An Answer.

At the White House, President Bush got a copy signed by the Wise Ones -- and promptly dispatched it to the National Archives for posterity. On Capitol Hill, Rep. Frank Wolf, the Virginia Republican who got the whole thing rolling a year ago, was brought nearly to tears by the result. In cyberspace, 400,000 people downloaded the report within hours from a Web site that had been bulked up to withstand 50 million hits in coming days. Across town, citizens trudged to bookstores for their copies and found them . . . sold out, or not yet delivered, in some sort of distribution infarction. With delivery services maxed out, Random House resorted to having its own employees ferry copies from a Westminster, Md., warehouse to bookstores in D.C.

Not bad for what, in the end, turned out to be a rather slender paperback -- a 96-page, $10.95 volume, whose juicier bits had already been leaked by spoilers.

Parts of it read like a song of the doomed, with phrases like "grave and deteriorating" and "Pessimism is pervasive." It was heavy stuff, coming a day after defense secretary nominee Robert Gates testified that the war in Iraq is not being won. Few dared dismiss it outright as mere rhetoric.

"There's almost a biblical thing about wise elderly people," said Wolf, referring to the 10 study group members led by former secretary of state James Baker and former Democratic representative Lee Hamilton of Indiana. "I mean, Sandra Day O'Connor" -- the woman on the panel -- "is not looking for another job. So they can speak truth."

Whenever there's a major dump of heaped, hyped wisdom on this town -- the last time was the 9/11 Commission report, also supervised by the honorable Mr. Hamilton -- an old-fashioned ritual kicks in. Some proceedings will never be digitized; some deliveries can't be made by Random House.

Yesterday near dawn, the commission members were ushered into the White House to hand-deliver the document to the president. He accepted it, congratulated them and said, "I'm not going to comment on it until I've read it."

Next the motorcade of long black sedans climbed Capitol Hill, police escort sirens heralding their arrival. All over town American flags were snapping northwards. Police officers at the House-side entrance to the Capitol shooed away a workman for caulking the sidewalk upon which the Wise Ones would walk.

At the Capitol, the guards did not bother to run their bomb-detecting mirrors beneath these sedans. Out popped Baker carrying a thick green folder, its title partially obscured by his arm: "The Iraq . . . " Hamilton had a thick blue folder. Baker had a bright red scarf, O'Connor a pink one. And here came the rest of the reunion pantheon of bipartisan establishment Washington, the study group members: O'Connor, Lawrence Eagleburger, Vernon Jordan, Edwin Meese, Leon Panetta, William Perry, Charles Robb, Alan Simpson.

Study group staffers carried copies of the paperback books in cardboard boxes, 24 to a box, which were sealed with orange admonitions: "Do not put on sale until 12/6/2006, 12 p.m. EST."

The Wise Ones met behind closed doors with House leadership, passed out copies of the report, and then it was on to the Senate side. Baker and Hamilton led the way, jaunty of step, with book bearers and police escorts in tow, along the polished basement corridor, past a banquet kitchen and a locker room where waiters were fastening bow ties.

By prearrangement, dozens of photographers were staked out to document (a) the team's arrival to transmit the report to the Senate, (b) the short walk of leaders Bill Frist and Harry Reid down a corridor with Baker and Hamilton, and (c) Senate leaders receiving their copies of the paperback in a conference room.

"They're going to go where the second chandelier is," a media handler reliably informed the camera-toting mob.

Grasping his paperback and appearing to read from prepared remarks, Frist said, "I look forward to hearing their recommendations."

"You're all American patriots," said Reid to the Wise Ones.

Next, Hamilton was presiding over a hushed gathering in the big second-floor conference room of the Hart Senate Office Building. Weren't we all here before? Right! Summer 2004, and he was co-chairing the 9/11 Commission! This time, his partner was Baker, instead of Tom Kean. There were two dozen television cameras, at least as many still cameras and more than 200 journalists. O'Connor's bright pink ensemble matched the complexion of Meese's face.

Picking up the theme of doom, Hamilton offered this revelation about Iraq: "The current approach is not working."

But there was hope, Baker followed, if the administration heeds the group's 79 recommendations -- even though "there is no magic formula that will solve the problems of Iraq."

Simpson saw a different kind of hope, and got some laughs, when he riffed on the bipartisan spirit of the commission: "We're just sincere enough to believe . . . that all people with a D behind their name did not become a guard at Lenin's tomb, and all the people with an R behind their name did not crawl out of a cave in the mountains, and that maybe we can do something."

In news studios all over town, the pundits went straight to work.

Bill Kristol, editor of the Weekly Standard, on Fox News: "It's a deeply irresponsible report. . . . The key is to win the war, not to have everyone sitting around Washington feeling good that 'Hey, we've got a bipartisan document!' "

Tim Russert, Washington bureau chief of NBC News, on MSNBC: "This was such a sobering report! Powerful, passionate, bipartisan, unanimous -- I think it's not only a wake-up call for the Bush White House, but I think for the whole country."

On the other side of the Mall from the Capitol, at the U.S. Institute of Peace, a techie pressed a button to make the report downloadable from the institute's Web site: Now members of the public could see it for themselves at www.usip.org.

By 4 p.m. the report had been downloaded 400,000 times -- and there were three other think tanks that also had it.

The peace institute, a federally funded think tank, supported the study group's work, funded with $1 million appropriated by Congress. The study group, in a bit of moonlighting as book agents, invited several publishing houses to compete to put out the paperback -- even though the work is in the public domain and anyone can publish it. According to Random House, it got the job for being able to keep the retail price reasonable and bring it out fast; the manuscript wasn't delivered until Friday.

A source close to the study group said no money changed hands in the deal. Random House merely got a headstart over anyone else who might want to publish the material, said the source, who requested anonymity because he is not authorized to speak to the press.

An unspecified portion of proceeds from book sales will go to the National Military Family Association, a Random House spokesman said. The spokesman would not say how many copies are being printed but said a third press run may be required shortly. The book form of the 9/11 Commission's report sold more than a million copies.

For hours yesterday, many prominent bookstores in Washington had received no books, or had not received as many as they had ordered. Reporters snapped up almost all the initial copies.

"BBC, al-Jazeera, CBS, NBC, New York Times, Washington Post," Kramerbooks general manager Mitch Brown said at midday. He had received 24 books instead of the 72 he'd wanted. "So we don't even have any to sell to citizens."

"We have 38 [advance] special orders, which is huge," said Carla Cohen, co-owner of Politics and Prose. And yet, until late yesterday afternoon, she had no books to fulfill those orders. "It was very embarrassing to us," she said.

At the Borders near Metro Center, general manager Michael Redmond had 48 books instead of the 300 he ordered. He was standing next to the meager display, wearing a communications headset, frantically canvassing sources for more books. He knew his market: "Dry policy documents are what this town lives for," he said.

Tucking his chin toward his headset microphone, he said, "If we need to send someone to UPS to pick them up, we'll do that!"

Russell Perreault, publicity director for Vintage Books, the Random House imprint, said the logistics of getting the book out in one day had overwhelmed the publisher and its delivery services. He said all ordered books had arrived by the end of the day, even though bookstores had been expecting to begin selling as soon as the noon embargo was lifted.

Ann Wilcox, a lawyer with an office near the Borders at 14th and F streets NW, was that mythic entity, an inquisitive citizen with no insider connection to the day's drama, but interested nonetheless. She had opposed the war from the beginning. On this morning, she had been following live coverage of the study group news conference on the radio. Now she was in the bookstore, slipping one of the precious paperbacks off the display rack.

"I wanted to take a closer look at the recommendations," she said. "Hopefully," she added, the recommendations will be reflected "in actual government policy."

DOJ_NMG_0103292

With that, she set her course back to her office against a stiff breeze, with the Truth of the Wise Ones tucked under her arm.

Bush, Blair To Meet To Discuss Iraq (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, December 7, 2006

President Bush faces urgent pressure to find a fresh strategy in Iraq as a new defense secretary heads to the Pentagon and a scathing bipartisan commission report says his war policies have failed and that "time is running out."

The Iraq Study Group's report said the situation in Iraq was "grave and deteriorating" after nearly four years of bloodshed and more than 2,900 American deaths. The report gave weight to the president's talks on Thursday with British Prime Minister Tony Blair, his closest ally in the unpopular war.

Bush, possibly with counsel from Blair, could embrace some or all 79 of the Iraq Study Group's recommendations. The president also could ignore them and chart his own new course based on internal reviews being done at the Pentagon, State Department and the White House.

"It's clear that the present situation is not one that could be sustained or accepted," White House press secretary Tony Snow said Wednesday.

The panel's recommendations ranged from gradually withdrawing U.S. combat forces during the next year to ramping up the training of Iraqi security forces to enlisting diplomatic help from Iraq's neighbors — not only to resolve problems in Iraq but to find an end to the long-running conflict between Israel and the Palestinians.

The White House was cautious not to specifically reject any of the group's ideas outright and vowed that Bush would entertain suggestions from all political circles before charting a new way forward.

But the president already has rejected the idea of direct talks with Iran and Syria. The administration continues to insist that Iran verifiably suspend uranium enrichment before the United States would start direct talks, although Snow left the door open for discussions through an outside group.

"There's some very good ideas in there," Bush said about the report after meeting Wednesday afternoon with lawmakers. "Not all of us around the table agree with every idea, but we do agree that it shows that bipartisan consensus on important issues is possible."

When a reporter asked whether Bush was capable of making dramatic changes in his war plan, Snow said: "Well, you're assuming that the president has to pull U-turns. I'm not sure I agree."

Democrats, meanwhile, clamored for change.

"I'm encouraged," said Rep. Jane Harman, D-Calif., "and I feel the stay-the-course strategy is officially dead."

"The American people have spoken," said incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid. "The Baker-Hamilton Iraq Study Group has spoken. They have all demanded a change of course in Iraq, and the Bush administration must listen."

Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., said the key question was whether Bush was ready for a change of course.

"All eyes now are on this president," Schumer said.

Bush's national security adviser, Stephen Hadley, has said Bush would make his decision within weeks.

"We believe that the situation in Iraq today is very, very serious," said James A. Baker III, the former Republican secretary of state who led the panel jointly with former Rep. Lee Hamilton, D-Ind. "We do not know if it can be turned around."

While the panel concluded that a stable, democratic Iraq was still possible, its pessimistic assessment of the situation contrasted with Bush's upbeat prediction that the U.S.-led coalition was on the road to victory.

"We're winning, and we will win, unless we leave before the job is done," Bush said at a White House news conference on Oct. 25.

The White House insists that Bush will not outsource his decision-making on Iraq, yet the changing political landscape would seem to make it difficult for him not to embrace or — at least seriously consider — opposing views.

"The politics have shifted so this report now becomes the default position for many in the public and many in political life," said Jon B. Alterman, a former State Department official who specialized in the Middle East.

DOJ_NMG_0103293

"The president now isn't the one defining the terms of the debate. He's responding to a debate that others have framed, and a debate that others have framed on some terms that he has said are unacceptable.

"What I think is striking is that the president has said that defeat is not an option," said Alterman, now director of Mideast programs at the Center for Strategic and International Studies. "And what this report says is that defeat is a real possibility."

Leon Panetta, a Democratic member of the Iraq Study Group, said Bush needs to unify an America divided by the war.

"I think the president understands that he simply is not going to be able to proceed with whatever policy changes he wants to implement if we're divided," Panetta said. "That is the principal goal, in my mind, that he has to accomplish."

Bush And Blair To Meet After US Report Urges For Iraq Policy Overhaul (AFP)

By Olivier Knox

AFP, December 7, 2006

US President George W. Bush is set to host British Prime Minister Tony Blair at the White House for talks likely to focus on a hard-hitting report that urged a strategic change in Iraq.

Bush on Wednesday received the report from the Iraq Study Group, led by former US secretary of state James Baker, warning that even a sharp change of policy on Iraq may not avert a regional conflict.

The president and the prime minister "have a number of issues to discuss, including Iraq, the broader war on terror, the NATO commitment to Afghanistan, Sudan, as well as free and fair trade," said Bush national security spokesman Gordon Johndroe on Thursday.

US and British officials have steadfastly denied that Blair's visit was timed to coincide with the release of the grim Iraq report.

White House officials said a frenetic schedule over the past month -- including the November US congressional elections, and Bush trips to Asia, Europe and the Middle East -- had stymied long-standing plans for a meeting.

But the report -- which bluntly says Bush's Iraq policy is "not working", warns that the situation in Iraq is "grave and deteriorating" and calls for most US combat troops to be withdrawn by early 2008 -- is likely to dominate their roughly hour-long meeting.

British media on Thursday welcomed the report, but were not convinced that Bush would actually adopt most of the committee's recommendations.

The two leaders, shoulder-to-shoulder on the March 2003 invasion to topple Saddam Hussein, have opposed setting a timetable for pulling out US and British forces.

There are currently some 135,000 US soldiers and 7,100 British soldiers serving in Iraq.

But there are disagreements between the two on some world issues, notably over Bush's resistance to set carbon-dioxide emission limits to cut down polluting greenhouse gasses, and over the link between the Israeli-Palestinian peace process and Iraq.

Blair on Wednesday said that strife-torn Iraq can yet be salvaged -- but as part of a wider Middle East strategy centered on the peace process.

"We have to pursue what I call a policy for the whole Middle East, and that means in particular and starting with finding a solution to the Israel-Palestinian conflict, which I think is absolutely essential if we are to put that region on a stable footing."

That chimed with a key Iraq Study Group finding that the United States cannot achieve its goals in the Middle East unless it deals directly with the Arab-Israeli conflict and regional instability.

Does Bush agree that the two conflicts are closely linked? "I don't know," said White House spokesman Tony Snow.

"The commission thinks that there clearly is a link here, and that to the extent that you get resolution on the Palestinian-Israeli issue, that can only be helpful. The president believes that," he told reporters.

The meeting follows November 7 elections in which Bush's Republican Party lost control of Congress to the opposition Democrats, and the departures of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and UN Ambassador John Bolton -- both Iraq war hawks.

It also comes one week after a peculiar dispute inside the State Department triggered when a senior analyst said he was "ashamed" of the way Bush treated Blair and that US-British relations were "totally one-sided" in Washington's favor.

DOJ_NMG_0103294

The Times of London quoted Kendall Myers, a foreign research analyst in the department's Bureau of Intelligence and Research, as saying that Britain's self-appointed role as a bridge between America and Europe was "disappearing before our eyes".

"We typically ignore them and take no notice. ... It's a sad business," Myers was quoted as saying, adding that he felt a "little ashamed" of Bush's treatment of Blair, according to the paper.

The US State Department repudiated the statement, and Blair on Wednesday rejected charges that he had subjugated Britain's foreign policy to Washington's, saying: "We've got to decide this policy based on the British national interest."

10 U.S. Troops Killed In Iraq (WP)

By Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, December 7, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 6 -- Ten American troops died in Iraq on Wednesday, the U.S. military reported, matching the highest number of U.S. service members killed on a single day in the past year. It was also a deadly day for Iraqi civilians, with at least 40 killed in car bombings and mortar attacks across the capital.

The U.S. troops died in four incidents, a military spokesman, Lt. Col. Christopher C. Garver, said Wednesday night. He declined to provide details about how or where they were killed because family members were still being notified.

"It's kind of a confluence of events," he said. "They are not all linked together."

The deaths bring the total number of U.S. service members killed in Iraq so far this month to 29, according to Pentagon reports and the Web site iCasualties.org, which tracks Iraq war fatalities. Most of the deaths identified were caused by hostile fire, including roadside bombs and grenades. Six of the deaths resulted from accidents, including the crash of a Marine CH-46 Sea Knight helicopter Sunday in Iraq's western Anbar province.

The U.S. military has said it is focusing its efforts on Baghdad, where sectarian warfare between Sunni Arabs and Shiite Muslims has become a top concern. U.S. troops continue to clash daily with suspected insurgents in Anbar province and have also been assisting the Iraqi army in conducting operations.

"We are out there working, and it puts us at risk," Garver said.

U.S. air and ground forces conducted a raid Wednesday in search of foreign fighters in Khanaqin, near the Iranian border, killing one suspected insurgent, the U.S. military said. A U.S. aircraft received small-arms fire as it left the site. U.S. forces shot back, destroying a vehicle and killing the armed suspect, the military said.

The U.S. military also announced that a soldier was killed Sunday during combat operations. No other details were released.

At Camp Cropper near Baghdad, a detainee died in U.S. military custody on Saturday, the military said in a statement. It said the unidentified detainee had suffered two heart attacks.

A car bomb explosion Wednesday afternoon in Sadr City, a teeming Shiite slum, killed three civilians and wounded eight, according to the U.S. military. Also in Sadr City, a suicide bomber in a taxi detonated explosives in a crowded marketplace, killing 13 people and injuring 25, according to an Interior Ministry source.

The attacks appeared to be the first in Sadr City since multiple car bombings and mortar shells killed more than 200 people there on Nov. 23, sparking a wave of tit-for-tat killings.

In Baghdad, a roadside bomb detonated near the old Defense Ministry building in the Rusafa neighborhood, killing 15 people and wounding 25, the U.S. military said. Police said they found 48 bodies in different parts of the capital, news services reported.

In the city of Baqubah, about 35 miles northeast of Baghdad, three civilians were killed and four were wounded when a car bomb exploded at the gate of Khalis Hospital. The blast, which was followed by a drive-by shooting, caused a power outage, forcing some victims to seek treatment at another hospital.

At a news conference in Baghdad, Iraq's national security adviser, Mowaffak al-Rubaie, announced that security forces had killed a senior aide to Abu Ayyub al-Masri, the leader of the insurgent group al-Qaeda in Iraq, who took over after his predecessor, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, died in a U.S. airstrike in June.

DOJ_NMG_0103295

Rubaie did not specify when or where the aide, known as Abu Taha, was killed. He said eight leaders of Ansar al-Sunna, an insurgent group allied with al-Qaeda in Iraq, were captured. He estimated that three-fifths of the organization's leaders have now been killed.

"The noose is closing in on him," Rubaie said of al-Qaeda in Iraq's leader.

Suspected insurgents blew up an oil pipeline from the Kirkuk to Baiji refineries, igniting a fire that was eventually contained, said Capt. Mahmoud Sherzad of the Oil Protection Force.

Also Wednesday, former president Saddam Hussein appeared in court despite his threat on Monday to boycott his genocide trial. Hussein and six other defendants are on trial for the so-called Anfal campaign of the late 1980s, which prosecutors say resulted in the deaths of as many as 180,000 ethnic Kurds.

Hussein spent the day listening to three prosecution witnesses, including a doctor who described treating victims of poison gas attacks.

Quiet US Bid To Talk To Iraqi Insurgents (CSM)

By David Enders

The Christian Science Monitor, December 7, 2006

As American and Iraqi politicians weigh the merits of engaging regional powers in the search for solutions in Iraq, it appears that both Baghdad and Washington are also quietly talking with Iraq's insurgent leaders in an effort to end the unrelenting violence.

US officials have not commented on reports of these recent meetings with resistance-group representatives. But Arab journalists, politicians, and officials in Jordan say they've occurred.

The meetings have come amid pressure from two key Shiite politicians on Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to alter course. The opposition has also stepped up efforts to outflank his increasingly unpopular rule. And in the US, the White House is sifting recommendations from the Iraq Study Group and other reviews as discontent grows over the administration's strategy.

This week, Saleh al-Mutlaq, a secular politician accused by rivals of links to the insurgency, announced a broad alliance he is calling the National Salvation Front. The bloc aims to unite opposition parties against Mr. Maliki and Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, the leader of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq (SCIRI), who met with the Bush administration in Washington on Monday.

Iraq's ambassador to Jordan, Saad al-Hayani, says that meetings have taken place in the Iraqi Embassy here between US representatives and members of the resistance in the past few months, as well as between Iraqis who have accepted and rejected the political process under US occupation, some of whom were directly involved with the insurgency.

"Two large meetings happened here in the embassy," Mr. Hayani says. "They included leaders from the last government, the Baathists, and the old Army. They were offered the opportunity to participate in the political situation if their hands were clean. The meetings were successful and necessary and beneficial."

The current Iraqi government has floated trial balloons regarding amnesties for fighters, though the US government has frequently come out against reconciliation with anyone who has attacked US troops.

In Amman, members of the former government appear to move freely. Among those waiting to meet with Hayani earlier this week was the last Iraqi ambassador to Jordan under Saddam Hussein's government. Hayani also says US officials have met with insurgent representatives in Baghdad and Cyprus. He added that he hopes insurgents can be persuaded to take part in the political process, but that their demands of a US withdrawal and the dismissal of the current Iraqi government had provided little common ground for talks.

Moayed Abu Subieh, a Jordanian journalist who has written about such meetings, says that for the majority of those fighting, their foremost demand remains US withdrawal. Previously, insurgent groups had called for a timetable for withdrawal as a condition for laying down arms, but that demand appears to have solidified into a call for immediate withdrawal.

Mr. Abu Subieh, who writes for Al-Ghad, says that he has knowledge that talks have occurred between US officials and members of the Islamic Army of Iraq, which is made up mostly of members of Mr. Hussein's former military and has been claiming responsibility for attacks on US troops since 2003.

While the group wants to see the US withdraw, he says negotiations with this and other groups are the only way to keep Maliki in power. Further weakening of the government, he says, will only make guerrilla fighters stronger political actors. He also says that many of the groups pay close attention to American politics.

"There were supposed to be negotiations (between Iraqi groups in Amman) on Nov. 9 after the US elections but they were postponed after the failure of the Republicans," he said. "People were waiting for Bush's visit to Amman to clarify his positions on the Iraqi situation and his support for Maliki's government."

The US Embassy in Amman directed all inquiries about the meetings with insurgent groups to the embassy in Baghdad, which had not replied by press time.

President Bush's renewed support for Maliki's government and its current path, Abu Subieh says, was likely only to add steam to those fighting for US withdrawal. He added that the meetings involved just part of what is a multifaceted resistance.

Others, however, say that such meetings are of little significance. "As far as we know, America has not spoken with any of the really active resistance," says Bashar al-Faili, a member of the Association of Muslim Scholars (AMS), a Sunni political group.

The AMS, while it is now participating in the political process and has elected members in the Iraqi parliament, has frequently made demands similar to those of insurgent groups. Many Iraqis accuse its leaders of having direct links to insurgents, especially the Islamic Army of Iraq.

The Iraqi government recently issued an arrest warrant for AMS spokesman Harith al-Dhari, accusing him of "supporting terrorism." Mr. Dhari is presently spending time in Jordan and other countries in the region.

"Maybe they are talking to small entities, and the reason for that is that the active resistance won't negotiate, because they want America to withdraw from Iraq," Mr. Faili argues. "This is a huge mistake - Americans have to be logical. They have to be realistic and to know one thing - that they are not going to stay in Iraq. That they are not going to have bases in Iraq."

The AMS is also part of the National Salvation Front, the initiative announced by Mr. Mutlaq.

The bloc includes Shiite and Sunni parties that are united in their call for regional and international dialogues on solving the Iraq "catastrophe." The only parties not participating are Maliki's Dawa Party, the country's two main Kurdish parties, and Hakim's SCIRI. It also includes the Fadhila Party led by Ayatollah Samir Yacoubi, a strong Shiite party that rivals SCIRI's power in southern Iraq.

"It is like a shadow government," Mustafa al-Hiti, a member of parliament with Mutlaq's party, says of the new front. "There must be change."

In and around Baghdad Wednesday, more than 100 people were killed or found dead. Three American troops died Monday, two as a result of insurgent attacks. Despite a string of ambushes, mortar attacks, and bombings Tuesday, the chief US military spokesman told reporters that all of Iraq would be under Baghdad's control by the fall of 2007, with US soldiers and Marines and other coalition forces playing a supporting role.

Meanwhile, a new poll by WorldPublicOpinion.org found that 75 percent of Americans believe that to stabilize Iraq, the US should enter talks with Iran and Syria, and nearly 80 percent support an international conference on Iraq.

A majority also opposes keeping US forces in Iraq indefinitely and instead supports committing to a timetable for their withdrawal within two years or less, the poll found.

Suicide Bomber Strikes At American Firm In Southern Afghanistan (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, December 7, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, Dec. 6 — A suicide bomber blew himself up on Wednesday outside the offices of an American security firm in the southern city of Kandahar, killing two American security officers and nine Afghan members of the staff, other employees at the scene said.

There was some confusion about the number of deaths.

A United States Embassy spokesman confirmed the deaths of two Americans, but police officials said they could confirm the deaths of only five Afghans, instead of the nine reported by people at the scene. A statement from President Hamid Karzai condemning the attack put the total at six, including the two Americans.

DOJ_NMG_0103297

The explosion was just yards from a NATO military compound, where a Canadian-led Provincial Reconstruction Team handles reconstruction and development work for the province.

The bomb attack, the fifth in Kandahar in 10 days, seems to fulfill Western military and diplomatic warnings that insurgents would turn to bombings in urban areas now that winter conditions have made fighting in the mountains more difficult. Afghanistan has had more than 100 suicide bombings this year, killing close to 250 people, most of them civilians.

The bomber arrived by bicycle at 7 a.m. As he approached the entrance of the security firm, U.S. Protection and Investigations, which is based in Houston, he threw aside his bike and rushed at the staff members, who were gathered at the gate as they received their assignments for the day.

"We tried to stop him, but before we could, he set off the explosion," said Jamil Ahmad, 32, an employee.

Mr. Ahmad said 11 people from the firm were killed and 3 were wounded. The dead were two American senior security coordinators, an Afghan escort manager, six armed guards and two drivers, he said.

A Taliban spokesman claimed responsibility for the attack in a phone call, [a news service] reported.

Threatening Letters Lead To Charges (SPRINGNL)

Springfield (MO) News-Leader, December 7, 2006

An Oregon man was indicted by a federal grand jury for mailing threatening letters to a federal judge and former U.S. attorney, the current U.S. attorney for the Western District of Missouri announced Monday.

Bruce Dewayne Jensen, 29 — serving a sentence in the U.S. Medical Center for Federal Prisoners — was charged in a three-count indictment returned Wednesday.

According to the allegations, Jensen:

- Mailed a threatening letter to former U.S. Attorney Todd P. Graves on March 3, 2005.

- Mailed a threatening letter to U.S. Magistrate Judge James C. England on March 3, 2005.

- Mailed a threatening letter to the clerk of the U.S. District Court in Springfield. It contained a threat to injure U.S. Magistrate Judge James C. England, on Sept. 13, 2006.

The case is being prosecuted by Deputy U.S. Attorney Michael A. Jones. It was investigated by the FBI and the Medical Center for Federal Prisoners.

Paulose Picks Up Dayton's Support To Serve As U.S. Attorney (AP)

AP, December 7, 2006

WASHINGTON - Minnesota's acting U.S. attorney picked up key support Wednesday for permanent confirmation, but it wasn't immediately clear whether Rachel Paulose could expect a vote before Congress adjourns this year.

Paulose met Wednesday with Sen. Mark Dayton, who hadn't taken a position on her nomination because he said she hadn't sought a meeting. Afterward, he said she had his support.

Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., had already backed Paulose, calling her "an extremely competent and capable professional." But the Senate Judiciary Committee generally doesn't vote on a nominee without the support of both of a nominee's home-state senators.

Paulose, 33, has been acting U.S. attorney for nine months, and President Bush nominated her to the permanent post four months ago. If the Senate fails to take up her nomination before adjourning next week, Bush can resubmit her next year.

If confirmed to permanently succeed Tom Heffelfinger, Paulose would be the youngest current U.S. attorney and Minnesota's first woman confirmed to the post.

Bush also could make a recess appointment of Paulose, which would last through the end of 2008.

Fannie Mae Moves Toward Resolution With Restatement (WSJ)

By James R. Hagerty

The Wall Street Journal, December 7, 2006

Fannie Mae took another step toward resolving its accounting fiasco by announcing a restatement of results that reduced retained earnings as of June 30, 2004, by $6.3 billion.

But the long-awaited restatement by the government-sponsored mortgage company increased stockholders' equity by $4.1 billion as of the same date. That is because of big increases in the value of mortgage securities held by Fannie that were reclassified as being available for sale as part of correcting past accounting errors. Those increases more than offset the reduction in retained earnings.

The restatement comes two years after regulators found that Fannie had violated more than a dozen accounting rules, partly in an effort to make earnings growth appear smoother and to trigger maximum bonuses for executives.

The need to correct its accounting practices and upgrade computer systems had prevented Fannie from reporting results since mid-2004. The restatement provides results through 2004, but the company still must catch up on results for 2005 and 2006. Fannie didn't say when it will report those results.

Fannie reported net income of $4.97 billion for 2004, down from a restated $8.08 billion in 2003.

Trying to cheer up shareholders, Fannie increased its quarterly dividend to 40 cents a common share from 26 cents.

The company's losses on derivatives and mortgage-purchase commitments were less severe than earlier expected. Fannie previously estimated that correcting improper accounting would result in the recognition of $10.8 billion of such losses as of the end of 2004. But the company said the losses turned out to be $7.9 billion. The value of such derivatives and commitments fluctuates as interest rates rise and fall.

Fannie's accounting woes were made worse by what the company now admits was inadequate investment in the past in computer systems and personnel to ensure compliance with complex and ever-changing accounting standards.

To rectify those problems, Fannie has spent more than $1.5 billion over the past two years on consultants, computer upgrades and other items related to the restatement and demands made by regulators. The company currently is paying 2,800 outside accountants, lawyers and other consultants to resolve these problems.

Fannie also agreed last May to pay fines of $400 million to settle charges of accounting fraud by the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight, or Ofheo. Fannie and some former top executives still are fighting lawsuits filed by shareholders who say they were misled by the company's past earnings statements.

In all, the company's costs for cleaning up the accounting mess are likely to total well over $2 billion.

The company's share price also has taken a big hit. Ahead of the disclosure yesterday, Fannie shares closed at $58.50, up 57 cents, in New York Stock Exchange composite trading, compared with a peak of about $80 in February 2004, before regulators found the accounting problems.

Fannie Mae To Restate Results By $6.3 Billion Because Of Accounting (NYT)

By Eric Dash

The New York Times, December 7, 2006

Fannie Mae, the largest buyer of American mortgages, said yesterday that it would reduce its earnings by $6.3 billion to correct several years of accounting problems in one of the nation's biggest financial scandals.

Federal regulators, meanwhile, said they planned to file a lawsuit before the end of the year in an effort to recover millions of dollars from Fannie Mae's former top two executives, whose bonuses were tied to the manipulated earnings. Franklin D. Raines, the former chairman and chief executive, and J. Timothy Howard, who had been chief financial officer, were ousted from the company in December 2004, and investigators have laid much of the blame on their shoulders.

"We will file charges within the next couple of weeks," James B. Lockhart III, director of the Office of Housing and Enterprise Oversight, said in a brief interview yesterday. "Unfortunately, the legal process is very cumbersome."

A lawyer for Mr. Raines declined to comment, and a lawyer representing Mr. Howard did not return phone calls yesterday. A Fannie Mae spokesman also declined to comment.

DOJ_NMG_0103299

The two moves are significant steps in the effort to clean up Fannie Mae — formally, the Federal National Mortgage Association — a company whose influence once reverberated through the corridors of Washington and Wall Street. Over the last two years, though, the company has been mired in scandal.

Federal investigators have searched through the company's records, leading the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Office of Housing and Enterprise Oversight, or Ofheo, to exact a $400 million civil penalty in May. Members of Congress have jousted over the need for a more powerful regulator and for limits on the size of its mortgage portfolio, although a bill may not be passed until at least early in the new year.

"We continue to move ahead," Daniel H. Mudd, who succeeded Mr. Raines as Fannie Mae's chief executive in 2004, said in a statement.

In a filing with the S.E.C. late yesterday, Fannie said that errors related to the way it accounted for complex derivatives resulted in a $7.9 billion loss after taxes — or about $2.9 billion less than what the company had previously estimated. But Fannie Mae said it misstated earnings by $6.3 billion when it worked through the financial statements from 2001 through the first two quarters of 2004, the last time it filed official results. Fannie Mae is still updating its financial statements from then — a process that Wall Street analysts and its regulator anticipate could take at least a year more.

The restatement is among the biggest for an American company, although it falls short of the $11 billion correction taken by WorldCom when it wiped out its phony profits.

Mr. Lockhart said that Fannie was "making great progress." Still, he noted that there was a long way to go. "They are putting a lot of hard work on getting the numbers out, but they show significant errors and do not even agree with their estimates."

Analysts said, though, that the actual numbers were less important than the message they sent.

"It gives investors some confidence they are getting their act together from a financial perspective," said Robert Napoli, an analyst with Piper Jaffray.

Ofheo may be facing a more difficult task than Fannie Mae as it prepares to try to recoup the many millions of dollars Mr. Raines and Mr. Howard received as a result of the improper accounting. Regulators have said that of the $90 million paid to Mr. Raines from 1998 to 2003 at least $52 million — more than half — was tied to bonus targets that were reached by manipulating accounting.

Ofheo is already trying to recover several million dollars in compensation from the former chief executive of a smaller government-connected lender, Freddie Mac, which was involved in similar accounting improprieties. That case has been in legal gridlock for nearly three years.

"We are making progress, but it is taking very long," Mr. Lockhart said yesterday.

Last month, Fannie Mae said it would pay Mr. Raines $2.6 million in "deferred compensation" and other amounts to partly resolve a dispute that it violated his employment contract when he was ousted.

It is likely that both Mr. Raines and Mr. Howard will vigorously contest attempts to make them repay money, especially since Fannie Mae is footing their legal bills.

As for Fannie Mae, Ofheo has required the company to increase its capital reserves and limit its asset growth until it can certify that its financial statements are current. That strict oversight has hindered its ability to use its capital, such as paying its dividend or buying back shares.

Some lawmakers are seeking greater oversight. Congress has been locked in a debate over new legislation that would give Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac — the Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corporation — a more powerful regulator.

Yesterday, Representative Barney Frank, Democrat of Massachusetts, who is expected to head the House Financial Services Committee, said he thought that lawmakers could pass a bill "fairly early next year," according to Bloomberg News. Others, including some House Republican aides, said they considered that overly optimistic.

The restatement was announced after the market closed yesterday. Earlier, shares of Fannie Mae rose 57 cents, or nearly 1 percent, to $58.50. The stock once traded above $77 before the scandal was disclosed in the fall of 2004.

Fannie Mae Final Tally: $6.3 Billion Overstated (WP)

By David S. Hilzenrath

DOJ_NMG_0103300

The Washington Post, December 7, 2006

It took an army of accountants two years and more than $1.4 billion to quantify the mess, but Fannie Mae yesterday issued the final tally of its accounting errors, saying it overstated past profits by $6.3 billion.

That was less than some of the mortgage funding company's past estimates, which were as high as $10.8 billion.

Fannie Mae's chief executive, Daniel H. Mudd, said in a news release that the restatement was "a critical milestone in Fannie Mae's progress toward building a stronger, better company."

Yesterday's report corrected a wide variety of errors that occurred before June 2004. The company remains unable to provide audited financial results for 2005 or quarterly reports for this year, and a spokesman could not say when Fannie Mae would return to timely financial reporting.

The restatement shows that the company "was grossly mismanaged by previous management," said James B. Lockhart III, director of the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight, an agency that oversees Fannie Mae.

"They underspent dramatically on systems, internal controls, risk management -- all the basic building blocks of a good corporation," and went "beyond mismanagement to manipulating earnings," Lockhart said.

The alleged fraud at Fannie Mae highlighted how accounting problems persist in corporate America, even after the watershed financial scandals at Enron and WorldCom. Chartered by the government, Fannie Mae is one of the nation's largest financial institutions and plays a major role in the housing finance system. Investors have treated its bonds as almost interchangeable with U.S. Treasury securities.

Regulators accused Fannie Mae of flouting accounting rules to maintain an illusion of smooth earnings growth. The scandal toppled former chairman and chief executive Franklin D. Raines, who headed the Office of Management and Budget in the Clinton administration and was a spokesman on corporate governance policy for the Business Roundtable, a group of top executives.

Lockhart said yesterday that his agency plans to sue Raines and former chief financial officer J. Timothy Howard to recover compensation they received while Fannie Mae's earnings were manipulated.

Raines has denied that he authorized, encouraged or knew about accounting violations. An investigation led by former New Hampshire senator Warren B. Rudman for members of Fannie Mae's board concluded that Raines "contributed to a culture that improperly stressed stable earnings growth." But the report's authors said they did not find that Raines knew the company departed from accounting rules "in significant ways."

An attorney for Raines declined to comment yesterday. Steven M. Salky, an attorney for Howard, said his client "acted properly at all times, and we look forward to disproving OFHEO's ill-founded allegations."

Raines's compensation totaled more than $90 million from 1998 through 2003. More than $52 million was tied to meeting earnings targets, OFHEO said in a May report.

Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.), the incoming House Financial Services Committee chairman, said yesterday that he expected Congress to pass a bill next year to strengthen oversight of Fannie Mae and its cousin, Freddie Mac. Lawmakers and Bush administration officials have been trying unsuccessfully to overcome disagreements and enact such change since Freddie Mac disclosed billions of dollars of accounting problems in 2003.

About 4,000 employees and outside contractors labored to produce Fannie Mae's accounting restatement. The $6.3 billion cumulative reduction in past earnings was the net result of corrections from three years. The restatement increased Fannie Mae's profit by $1.2 billion in the first half of 2004 and by $176 million in 2003. The restatement decreased profit by $705 million in 2002 and by $7 billion in earlier periods.

According to the Securities and Exchange Commission, senior management manipulated the company's 1998 earnings to trigger maximum bonuses. In later years, the company disregarded requirements that it adjust quarterly income to reflect changes in the value of financial instruments known as derivatives, regulators said. Most of the restatement related to derivatives.

Fannie Mae's former auditor, KPMG, certified Fannie Mae's annual financial statements despite flagging the company's decision to delay booking almost $200 million of 1998 expenses, according to Rudman's investigation. KPMG has declined to comment.

In a settlement with regulators in May, Fannie Mae neither admitted nor denied wrongdoing but agreed to pay penalties of $400 million.

Fannie Mae's continuing failure to issue current audited financial statements could have caused it to be delisted from the New York Stock Exchange, but the exchange has allowed the company's shares to continue trading. Fannie Mae issued its restatement after the market closed yesterday.

The filing is fresh ammunition for shareholders suing Fannie Mae. Meanwhile, the Justice Department is investigating whether Raines and Howard committed perjury when they defended Fannie Mae at a House hearing in 2004. Though the SEC settled with the company, it has not closed its investigation as it relates to other parties.

Last year, 1,155 U.S. corporations issued accounting corrections -- nearly one in 10 of the nation's publicly traded companies, according to the research firm Glass Lewis & Co.

Fannie Mae Erases $6.3 Billion in Profit in Restatement Bringing End to Accounting Scandal

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Fannie Mae erased $6.3 billion in profit in a long-awaited restatement Wednesday capping the accounting scandal that stunned financial markets and brought the ouster of top executives and a record fine against the government-sponsored mortgage leader.

The correction of its earnings from 2001 through June 30, 2004, ordered by the Securities and Exchange Commission two years ago, was well below Fannie Mae's earlier estimate of $10.8 billion. The reworking of its accounting is costing the company some $1 billion this year to conduct. It is the first earnings statement filed by Fannie Mae, which finances one of every five home loans in the United States, since late 2004.

The scandal erupted in the fall of that year when federal regulators accused Washington-based Fannie Mae -- with its long-standing prestige, vaunted political clout and reputation for financial excellence -- of serious accounting problems and earnings manipulation to meet Wall Street targets.

Fannie Mae on Wednesday announced an increase in its quarterly dividend to 40 cents from 26 cents.

Its chief executive, Daniel Mudd, received a pay package of $13.1 million, including a $2.6 million bonus, for 2005, the company also disclosed in an SEC filing. Mudd, who was the top operations official at the time of the accounting misdeeds, was elevated to the top position in a management shakeup in December 2004.

Last May, the federal agency that regulates Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, its smaller sibling in the $8 trillion home-mortgage market, issued a blistering report alleging a six-year accounting fraud at Fannie Mae, the second-largest U.S. financial institution after Citigroup Inc. Regulators said the scheme included manipulations to reach quarterly earnings targets so that company executives could pocket hundreds of millions in bonuses from 1998 to 2004.

Fannie Mae paid a record $400 million civil fine in a settlement with the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight and the SEC. It also agreed to limit the growth of its multibillion-dollar mortgage holdings, capping them at $727 billion, and to make top-to-bottom changes in its corporate culture, accounting procedures and ways of managing risk.

The completion of the restatement "is a key step forward for the company and represents two years of hard work," OFHEO Director James B. Lockhart said in a statement Wednesday. "Much remains to be done. ... Fannie Mae faces enormous challenges in fixing its operational and risk management systems, in (financial controls) compliance, and in producing audited financial statements for 2005 and 2006."

In detailing its restatement, Fannie Mae cited a $7 billion net decrease from previously reported earnings for periods prior to 2002, a $705 million reduction for 2002, a $176 million increase for 2003 and a $1.2 billion increase for the first six months of 2004.

Freddie Mac, which also is government-sponsored and has its stock publicly traded, had its own accounting scandal that came to light in June 2003. The company misstated earnings by some $5 billion -- mostly underreported -- for 2000-2002 to smooth out volatility in profit and uphold its image on Wall Street as a steady performer.

Over the last two years, Fannie Mae has disclosed a passel of new accounting problems that had been uncovered in several areas, including its core business of issuing securities backed by the billions of dollars of home mortgages annually that it buys from lenders and bundles together for resale to investors worldwide. Other problems were revealed in loans, houses acquired through foreclosures, interest on delinquent home loans and reverse mortgages.

They all were in addition to the accounting-rule violations that came to light in September 2004 involving derivatives, the financial instruments that Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac use to hedge against swings in interest rates.

Fannie Mae's chief executive Franklin Raines, a prominent Washington figure who was White House budget director in the Clinton administration, was swept out of office in December 2004 along with then-chief financial officer Timothy Howard.

Lockhart has said his agency was considering suing former executives to recover tainted bonus money if Fannie Mae failed to recoup it.

Fannie Mae escaped criminal prosecution over the accounting failure. The Justice Department had pursued a criminal investigation, but federal prosecutors said in August that they had shut down their probe without bringing any action. The SEC still could bring civil actions against individual executives, including people no longer at Fannie Mae, with the burden of proof less stringent than in criminal prosecutions.

Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac were created by Congress to pump money into the home-mortgage market to keep interest rates low and make home ownership affordable for low- and moderate-income people.

Fannie Mae stock closed Wednesday at $58.50, up 57 cents, on the New York Stock Exchange. It has traded in a range of $46.17 to $62.37 over the last 52 weeks.

Home Depot Backdated Options From 1981 To 2000 (WSJ)

By Ann Zimmerman

The Wall Street Journal, December 7, 2006

Home Depot Inc. said an internal investigation found that the company routinely backdated stock options for 20 years, from 1981 to 2000, and as a result it understated compensation expense by $200 million.

With fiscal 2006 sales of $81.5 billion, the home-improvement retailer is one of the largest companies to admit to backdating stock options. The practice stopped in the fall of 2000 at the same time that current Chief Executive Bob Nardelli took the helm at the retailer. During the previous two decades, the company was run by founders Bernie Marcus and Arthur Blank, but neither founder received stock options. The company wouldn't say who did receive the awards and who made the decision to backdate them.

Home Depot's admission that executives backdated options beginning more than 25 years ago is the earliest finding to date, and means the practice began far earlier than the technology boom when stock options became a popular compensation tool. In Home Depot's case, the practice goes back to its inception as a public company.

"For annual option grants and certain quarterly grants from 1981 through November 2000, the stated grant date was routinely earlier than the actual date on which the grants were approved by a committee of the board of directors," the company said in a statement released late yesterday.

It added that in almost every case, the stock price on the apparent approval date was higher than the price on the stated grant date. The management personnel responsible for these actions have since left the company.

In one instance, employees in February 2000 were given 1.7 million options at $53 a share -- a monthly low. Home Depot's stock price when the board actually approved the grant, nearly two months later, was $57.25, or 8% higher. Three of the company's six highest-paid officers received options at the favorable $53 price, regulatory filings show.

Home Depot is one of more than 130 companies, including titans such as Apple Computer Inc. and UnitedHealth Group Inc., that are facing scrutiny from federal prosecutors and regulators examining whether executives improperly backdated stock-option grants. Options typically are designed to give recipients an incentive to see their company's share price rise, by allowing them to purchase shares in the future at the market price on the day the option was granted. Grants that are backdated to more favorable, lower-priced days give recipients an instant, built-in profit.

Home Depot said that as a result of the findings it will decrease retained earnings by $200 million and increase paid-in capital by the same amount. The company also said it is reviewing the potential tax implications relating to its stock-options-granting practices.

The company wouldn't say whether it planned to demand that recipients return any of the money, citing pending related litigation against the company, as well as pending inquiries by the SEC and the U.S. attorney for the Southern District of New York. In another statement, the company said it was pleased that the investigation found no wrongdoing by any current board members.

"We are also pleased that the anticipated adjustment to the company's equity accounts will be reflected as the correction of an error and, as expected, is not material to the company's financial position or results of operations," the statement added.

Probe: Home Depot Backdated Options (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, December 7, 2006

Home Depot routinely backdated stock options grants for executives and employees at all levels of the company for nearly 20 years, according to an internal investigation whose results the company announced Wednesday.

It said in a statement the investigation by a board subcommittee and the Hogan & Hartson law firm found "there was no intentional wrongdoing by any current member of the company's management team or its board of directors."

Because of the errors, which included regular backdating of grants from 1981 through November 2000, the company had unrecorded expenses of about $200 million, Home Depot said.

For the fiscal year 2006, the giant home improvement retailer reported earnings of $5.8 billion on revenue of $81.5 billion.

Home Depot disclosed in September that the Securities and Exchange Commission has begun an informal inquiry into the company's stock option practices and the U.S. Attorney's Office in New York has asked for information.

For Home Depot's annual option grants and some quarterly grants from 1981 through November 2000, the "stated grant date was routinely earlier than the actual date on which the grants were approved by a committee of the board of directors," the company's statement said. "In almost every instance, the stock price on the apparent approval date was higher than the price on the stated grant date."

The company blamed "management personnel, who have since left the company," for the practice. Selecting a date with a low stock price increased the options' value.

Home Depot's findings could cause public relations problems for two members of its board:

•CEO Robert Nardelli. Named CEO on Dec. 6, 2000, Nardelli had nothing to do with the backdating earlier, according to the report. But he has become a lightning rod for criticism of excessive CEO pay. He has collected some $200 million in salary, bonuses and options since joining the company, but Home Depot's shares have declined in value during that time.

•Kenneth Langone. A co-founder and longtime member of Home Depot's board, he sat on board committees that oversaw option grants for many of the years when options were backdated.

Langone is already embroiled in a separate executive compensation controversy. New York State Attorney General Eliot Spitzer has accused him and former New York Stock Exchange CEO Richard Grasso of hiding the true value of Grasso's pay package from the NYSE board.

DOJ_NMG_0103304

Grasso was ousted at the NYSE in 2003 after disclosing that he was due $189 million. Langone headed the NYSE compensation committee during part of the time that Grasso's compensation soared.

Jim McCarthy, a spokesman for Langone, said there was absolutely no connection between the two matters.

Home Depot Probe Reveals Backdating (FT)

By Andrew Ward In Atlanta

Financial Times, December 7, 2006

An internal investigation of stock option practices at Home Depot, the second largest US retailer, has discovered $200m of unrecorded expenses related to the backdating of option grants during its 26 years as a public company.

Almost all the backdating occurred during the 1980s and 1990s, when Home Depot was one of America's fastest growing retailers, expanding from a three-store start-up in 1979 to a $45bn nationwide chain in 2000.

The investigation, by a sub-committee of Home Depot's board, concluded that no intentional backdating had taken place since Bob Nardelli, the current chief executive, took charge in 2000, and cleared all current management and directors of wrongdoing.

Home Depot launched the inquiry in August after becoming the largest US company to be ensnared in the scandal over backdating of stock options to increase the potential value of compensation packages.

More than 160 companies have acknowledged that they are either facing regulatory inquiries or carrying out internal investigations of the way they handed out stock options. Home Depot said the unrecorded ex-penses would not have a material impact on its financial statements.

The company said its billionaire founders, Bernie Marcus and Arthur Blank, were not among the recipients of backdated stock options. But the investigation has cast fresh light on a period when Home Depot was known for its free-wheeling, entrepreneurial culture. Mr Nardelli, a former executive at General Electric, was hired to replace Mr Blank in 2000 after narrowly losing out in the battle to succeed Jack Welch as chairman of GE.

While he has faced criticism for his hefty compensation package, Mr Nardelli has received credit for taming Home Depot's "cowboy culture" and injecting GE-style discipline into its management. Home Depot's investigation found that before 2000, the stated grant date for stock options was "routinely earlier than the actual date on which the grants were approved".

"In almost every instance, the stock price on the apparent approval date was higher than the price on the stated grant date," the report said.

Backdating is not necessarily illegal but the practice has forced several companies to restate earnings and sparked probes by the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Justice Department.

Pediatrix Says Options Backdated, Board Member Quits (Update3) (BLOOM)

By Shannon Pettypiece

Bloomberg, December 7, 2006

Dec. 6 (Bloomberg) -- Pediatrix Medical Group Inc. said a preliminary review found evidence that stock options were backdated and a board member has resigned.

The company, the largest U.S. provider of care for premature babies, may have to record additional compensation expenses of $28 million for the period from 1995 through 2006, according to a statement distributed today by Business Wire.

Pediatrix is among at least 186 companies that have disclosed internal or federal investigations into how they grant stock options to executives. At least 79 companies have announced they must restate previously reported financial results, and more than 60 executives and directors at companies under investigation have left their jobs.

Lawrence M. Mullen resigned from the Pediatrix board after the preliminary report by the audit committee. Mullen ``had a significant role" in running the company's stock-option program and practices, according to today's statement.

Backdating of stock options involves timing the grants to executives to coincide with days when the stock price was low, to boost the probability of greater gains as the shares rise. A stock-options contract gives the holder the right to buy or sell a specific amount of stock at a set price, by a certain date.

Pediatrix, which is based in Sunrise, Florida, also reported that U.S. antitrust investigators closed an examination of the company's acquisition in 2001 of Magella Healthcare Corp. and took no action.

Pediatrix said today it hasn't determined whether it will have to restate earnings. Bob Kneeley, a spokesman, said the company delayed earnings in the second and third quarters. He declined to comment on the investigation beyond what is in today's release.

Mullen couldn't be reached for comment because his name was pulled from the company directory and the office was closed following the release of the announcement. His home number wasn't listed.

Stock Option Scandals Take Down A Record Number Of GCs (LAW)

By D.M. Osborne, Corporate Counsel

Corporate Counsel, December 7, 2006

Nothing in memory has ever caused as many GCs to lose their jobs as quickly as stock options backdating. In little more than a year, 12 general counsel have stepped down amid options problems at their companies. These legal chiefs constitute about a quarter of the 40-plus executives who have lost their jobs in the steadily expanding options controversy. Indeed, backdating has forced out as many GCs as CEOs.

By all indications, the casualty list will only grow. "I expect that we will see more general counsel lose their jobs," says Erik Lie, the University of Iowa business professor whose research into backdating kindled the current firestorm.

Some of these GCs won't deserve their fate, Lie adds: "My sense is that a lot of innocent people might be implicated in this, including, possibly, general counsel." Indeed, a review of government documents and official company statements about options-related investigations shows that in some cases, the GC appears to have been little more than a fall guy. In other instances, however, company and government reports have directly faulted in-house lawyers for failing to intervene when grant dates on options were deliberately altered to enrich their recipients.

So far the U.S. Department of Justice and the Securities and Exchange Commission are scrutinizing option grants at more than 130 companies. But Lie thinks that another 70 may have engaged in backdating, based on his statistical analysis of 8,000 businesses that issued options between 1996 and 2005.

Government probes have already resulted in criminal and civil actions against executive at two companies, Brocade Communications Systems Inc. and Comverse Technology Inc. One of those nailed at Comverse was the company's GC, William Sorin, who pleaded guilty in November to a single count of criminal conspiracy. Sorin, who will be sentenced in February, faces up to five years in jail and a $250,000 penalty.

Other general counsel should brace themselves for government scrutiny as well, warns Walter Ricciardi, the SEC's deputy director of enforcement. "[Our] staff is taking a close look at the role of attorneys, especially to the extent that they were involved in the process by which options were awarded," Ricciardi says.

Of course, not all government investigations will result in a civil suit or criminal indictment. "Many of these GCs won't ever be charged with wrongdoing," predicts Russell Ryan, a former assistant director of enforcement at the SEC and now a partner in the Washington, D.C., office of King & Spalding.

Ryan says that some company boards may have given GCs the boot mainly to show regulators and the market that they've cleaned house. "In today's climate, general counsel can leave or lose their jobs for any number of reasons falling far short of the intentional misconduct that typically results in enforcement action against lawyers," he adds.

GCs who have been tarred in the options mess will also have to fight off the plaintiffs bar. At least seven legal chiefs who have left their posts at companies with backdating problems have been named as defendants in shareholder derivative actions. As Martha Faye Africa, managing director of legal placement firm Major Lindsey & Africa, says: "We're in an era where there's a new definition of risk for general counsel."

How A Giant Insurer Decided To Oust Hugely Successful CEO (WSJ)

By James Bandler And Charles Forelle

The Wall Street Journal, December 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0103306

Over the past 15 years, the board of UnitedHealth Group Inc. couldn't have been more supportive of its chairman and chief executive, William McGuire. Directors lavished close to $2 billion in compensation on him, counting stock options, as he built UnitedHealth into one of the country's largest health insurers.

Some directors moved with him in social and charity circles. "We're so lucky to have Bill," director Mary Mundinger said earlier this year. "He's brilliant."

Last week, Dr. McGuire left his job, following a vote by the same board to dump him. It acted unanimously in October after concluding that his explanations for a pattern of unusually well-timed stock-option grants didn't add up. Dr. McGuire thus became one of the biggest casualties in the options backdating scandal, which so far has swept away more than 60 corporate officials, including 16 CEOs. (See related article on page A3).

How did one of America's most pliant boards turn on its star chief executive? Dr. McGuire's support slowly leached away over the course of a six-month internal investigation. Documentation that could support his defense was sparse. A board-ordered statistical analysis undercut his arguments. And his closest board ally was sidelined by a conflict of interest that unsettled other directors. In the end, directors felt pressure after their lawyer told them federal regulators appeared likely to charge the UnitedHealth chief.

Now, Dr. McGuire and the board are girding for tense negotiations over how much of his giant cache of stock options, many still unexercised, he'll be able to take with him. He has already agreed to surrender about $200 million of those options' value, and people close to the situation say the company hopes to get back at the very least $250 million more. He is still likely to end up with more than $1 billion, although last week a federal judge hearing a shareholder lawsuit temporarily barred him from exercising any options or receiving any retirement pay.

Dr. McGuire's lawyer, David Brodsky, said, "While neither a lawyer nor accountant, Dr. McGuire believed that the processes by which options were granted were transparent, appropriate and approved. Indeed, experts who reviewed these processes never raised concerns at the time about the stock options program." Dr. McGuire himself declined to be interviewed.

Dr. McGuire's troubles began in March, when The Wall Street Journal published an article raising questions about exceptional patterns of stock-option grants at a number of companies, including UnitedHealth. In three separate instances, the article found, Dr. McGuire had received options at UnitedHealth stock's lowest closing price of the year.

That made them especially valuable, since options typically convey a right to buy the employer's stock in the future at the price on the grant date. The formula means a recipient can profit only if the stock rises. But it turns out many companies cheated by granting options on one date and pretending they had been issued earlier, when the stock was cheaper. Besides Dr. McGuire's grants at yearly lows, a number of his other grants were dated just before price runups.

After the article, Dr. McGuire initiated an internal investigation. In early April, the board formed a special committee. It hired William McLucas, a former Securities and Exchange Commission enforcement director, now at the law firm of Wilmer Cutler Pickering Hale & Dorr.

At the outset, Dr. McGuire could draw on a big reservoir of goodwill from directors. A former pulmonologist, he helped coordinate care when the wife of one director, William Spears, fell ill. Dr. McGuire's family foundation and the company gave generously to charities some directors were involved with. And directors had made millions from their UnitedHealth options as the stock soared more than 50-fold during Dr. McGuire's tenure. That enormous rise accounted for most of the millions Dr. McGuire earned.

Of 10 outside directors, the CEO had strong support from at least four: Mr. Spears, a New York money manager and friend; Ms. Mundinger, dean of Columbia University's nursing school; Thomas H. Kean Sr., a former New Jersey governor and chairman of the 9/11 commission; and Gail Wilensky, a specialist in health-care policy. The first three had served on the compensation committee during much of the period under scrutiny, making their own conduct an issue in the internal probe.

But Dr. McGuire's core allies would have little role in shaping the investigation. That fell to the special committee, led by James Johnson, a former chief of mortgage giant Fannie Mae who recently served as an adviser to Sen. John Kerry's presidential run. Also on the panel was Douglas Leatherdale, a former chief of insurer St. Paul Cos., and Richard Burke, a founder and retired CEO of UnitedHealth, who was friendly with Dr. McGuire. The committee closely supervised the lawyers and accountants doing the actual digging. Other directors were filled in later and less frequently.

Key Question

Complicating matters was that the board had given Dr. McGuire broad latitude to issue options to subordinates as well as to a right to choose when he wanted option grants to himself made. After picking a date, he had to get approval from the compensation committee. The key question the WilmerHale lawyers faced: Did the board committee really approve Dr. McGuire's grants on the dates reflected in company regulatory filings? Or might they have been backdated to low-price days that would make them more lucrative?

Directors asked for records to show the options were approved on recorded grant dates. Management came up largely empty-handed. Some minutes of compensation-committee meetings were missing. Others didn't mention approval of any grants near a period in question.

In interviews with the WilmerHale lawyers and in phone calls with directors, Dr. McGuire said he hadn't backdated anything but, rather, had chosen to receive grants when the stock was low after a decline, according to people briefed on the conversations. He expressed disappointment that there wasn't more corroboration and that underlings hadn't kept proper paperwork.

Dr. McGuire also stated that as a man of high ethical standards, he wouldn't have fabricated anything. He said that after picking a date for his grants, he would seek approval from Mr. Spears, head of the compensation committee, or occasionally another panel member.

The main person who could verify this account was Mr. Spears. He told the board's lawyers that while he recalled conversations with Dr. McGuire, he couldn't be sure when they actually took place. Phone records showed the two talked frequently, often around the times of some grants, but these records proved little because the two were close friends.

Mr. Spears's value as a witness soon suffered a blow. The money manager told the lawyers he had handled more than $55 million of the McGuire family's fortune and had accepted a $500,000 investment in his own business from Dr. McGuire.

• Perfect Payday: Complete coverage2

Mr. Spears maintained he had disclosed this conflict of interest to the board before. Two 1999 documents supported that account: an email and an executive's handwritten meeting minutes. But among the directors, only Mr. Kean thought it was possible he could recall having been told of the relationship, say people familiar with the matter; the others said they had no idea.

Many directors were "incredulous" when they learned of the financial tie at a meeting in the spring, according to someone who was there when the board was briefed. While directors felt Mr. Spears was honest, the entanglements tainted any defense he might have made of Dr. McGuire. Aware of fellow directors' feelings, Mr. Spears stayed on the debate's sidelines in later meetings, says someone familiar with the gatherings.

Dr. McGuire expressed frustration that his reputation was being hurt by a scandal he considered hyped. "He indicated that this was way blown out of proportion and unfair," says Irwin Redlener, a friend and co-founder of the Children's Health Fund, a not-for-profit group UnitedHealth supported.

On June 25, Mr. McLucas brought some compelling data to the board's special committee. His presentation showed that grants were regularly dated at or near the stock's lowest prices for the quarter, a suspicious pattern. Later, directors learned that after the mid-2002 passage of new federal rules requiring almost immediate disclosure of option grants, there wasn't a single quarter in which the large grants customarily given to top executives were dated at a quarterly low.

The point: After rules had made backdating impossible, Dr. McGuire's purported ability to pick propitious grant dates vanished. That juxtaposition wounded a key line of defense and "made everyone in the room sit up and focus," says one person close to the situation.

Mr. Johnson was becoming convinced the CEO would have to depart. The former Fannie Mae chief was well aware of how negative perceptions can hurt a company. In a 2004 accounting scandal that brushed close to him, Fannie Mae suffered a stock-price decline, congressional grilling and the loss of its chief executive at the time. One person recalls Mr. Johnson saying in June or July that it was unlikely Dr. McGuire would be able to survive.

On July 11, directors convened for a regular meeting in Minneapolis. Dr. McGuire made a pre-emptive move. He sent directors a five-page memo suggesting a series of steps to deal with the options problem, say people familiar with its contents. He said the board could reprice any tainted options, name a chief administrative officer to remedy deficient record-keeping and make other changes to processes. Deep in the memo, Dr. McGuire said he would be ready to leave if the board thought that was in the company's best interest.

The board didn't want to act before the full scope of the problem was known. It took no action.

In late August the lawyers running the probe made another unsettling finding. In late 1999, the board had approved new options for Dr. McGuire and others to replace a batch that were temporarily worthless. That is, their exercise price was higher than the current stock price because of a stock decline after they were issued. In granting the replacements, the company had suspended, rather than canceled, the old ones, largely for accounting reasons.

Mr. McLucas learned that in August 2000, the suspended options had been reactivated, meaning that the recipients, including Dr. McGuire, effectively got a huge second helping. For Dr. McGuire, the profit embedded in the extra options -- the difference between their exercise price and UnitedHealth's market price -- is now around $250 million. The maneuver skirted disclosure requirements and potentially violated accounting rules, WilmerHale lawyers concluded.

Mr. McLucas brought the issue to the special committee and eventually to other directors. Lawyers later said two directors recalled some discussion in 2000 of reactivating suspended options for other employees, but no compensation committee member recalled intending such a lucrative award for Dr. McGuire himself. "Alarm bells were going," says a person close to the board.

Skirmish Over Math

Meanwhile, a side skirmish broke out over math. The Wall Street Journal's analysis had found that the odds of Dr. McGuire's highly favorable pattern of awards occurring by chance were one in 200 million or greater. Some directors, including Ms. Mundinger, who has a doctorate in public health, criticized the Journal's methodology. The result was a lengthy statistical discussion among directors that resolved little.

After word reached directors that Dr. McGuire had hired a statistics firm to help him rebut the Journal's findings, the WilmerHale lawyers decided to bring in their own numbers experts. In a board meeting on Oct. 2, the lawyers presented an analysis from a firm called Lexecon Inc. It said there were many ways to crunch the numbers, each yielding different probabilities. But all the odds were very long. In the end, Dr. McGuire never presented statistical data to directors.

By early October, the investigative work was all but finished. A squadron of lawyers and accountants had plumbed millions of pages of documents and conducted interviews with more than 80 witnesses. After discussing Mr. McLucas's findings, special-committee members agreed that the situation was serious and the CEO's departure was a likely outcome.

It fell to Mr. Burke, the former UnitedHealth CEO, to travel to Minnesota to tell his old comrade the bad news. But to the surprise of some committee members, Mr. Burke proposed a solution short of Dr. McGuire's departure. He suggested the CEO temporarily step aside until the options tempest calmed, according to people familiar with the matter. Dr. McGuire rejected the idea out of hand, two people close to the situation say. If the board wanted him to leave, he said, he'd leave.

Outside directors set Friday, Oct. 13, as the day for a critical meeting at WilmerHale's Washington offices. The agenda: a review of the investigative report and a discussion of Dr. McGuire's fate. At that point, some directors hadn't yet made up their minds.

The meeting began around 10 a.m. in a large room filled with directors and their lawyers. Directors not on the special committee received the 14-page report for the first time that morning, a person close to the board says. The strongly-worded report concluded it was likely that backdating had occurred and that Dr. McGuire played a central role. Citing the CEO's claim that he didn't backdate any stock options, the report dryly said, "Certain facts run contrary to this assertion."

The report didn't suggest any complicity by directors on the compensation committee. It said it "might have been better" if they had paid more attention to the granting process and asked more questions.

Seated around the conference-room table, the directors took about a half hour to read through the report. No one spoke.

DOJ_NMG_0103309

Directors asked Mr. McLucas for his assessment. According to several people, he said that he thought it was likely the SEC would bring charges against Dr. McGuire, and that the agency could seek to bar him from serving as an officer or director of a public company.

Mr. McLucas told directors they should make their decisions based on Dr. McGuire's conduct. But he also said they would be in a difficult spot if they voted to keep him and the SEC sought a short time later to remove him. UnitedHealth has since given the results of its probe to federal prosecutors and the SEC, neither of which has taken action.

At about 4 p.m., a subdued Dr. McGuire addressed directors. He spoke somberly, without notes, for about 40 minutes, talking about how much the company meant to him and how proud he was of its success. He said he believed he had acted ethically and appropriately, say people familiar with the meeting. "I apologize to everyone for putting the company through this trauma," one person recalls him saying.

Some directors couldn't meet his gaze. "It was an anguishing event," said another person in the room who had been close to Dr. McGuire.

Dr. McGuire's lawyer, Mr. Brodsky, of Latham & Watkins, made a brief presentation, saying the WilmerHale report had given short shrift to evidence of his client's innocence. Mr. Brodsky, a former federal prosecutor, said the CEO's money-management relationship with Mr. Spears had been properly disclosed, citing a company lawyer's 1999 email saying "the full board" had been apprised of financial conflicts.

Mr. Brodsky also contested the report's treatment of a McGuire memo that counted against him. In it, the CEO wrote to the compensation committee on Oct. 22, 1999, about a grant that "should be awarded." Despite his use of the future tense, this stock-option grant ultimately bore an earlier date: Oct. 13, the day the stock closed at its lowest price that year. Mr. Brodsky called this meaningless. He said the memo was a rewrite of an earlier draft, and Dr. McGuire merely hadn't fixed the verb tenses.

Dr. McGuire and his lawyer left the room, and directors asked Mr. McLucas for his impression of the defense. "I don't think there's anything we've heard that would change our assessment," one person recalls the lawyer saying.

Directors took no action that Friday. On Sunday, the board had scheduled a meeting in Minnesota. Exhausted, they changed plans and convened instead in Washington. Dr. McGuire didn't attend.

Mr. Spears, the compensation-committee member who managed some of Dr. McGuire's money, arrived at the meeting. He then submitted his own resignation from the board and left.

At the meeting, directors took a vote on a 14-step plan to deal with the options issue. It included Dr. McGuire's immediate departure as chairman and his resignation as chief executive by Dec. 1. The vote was unanimous. Mr. Burke traveled to Minnesota to deliver the news.

Later, several directors called Dr. McGuire to express their gratitude for his service and their sadness over the way things had ended. Dr. McGuire was distressed, said a person familiar with one of these conversations. "He continues to believe he did nothing wrong, which makes it all the more painful."

Last Thursday was the last day Dr. McGuire reported to his 10th-floor office. A private man, he left that day without emotional goodbyes. Said one person close to the matter, "He slipped out without anyone noticing."

Frank Offers Compromise To Business (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, December 7, 2006

Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.) yesterday held out an olive branch to business interests, announcing that he would be open to cooperating on trade, immigration and outsourcing if industry gave ground on union drives, health-care reforms and minimum-wage proposals.

At a briefing to introduce his legislative agenda, Frank, the incoming chairman of the House Financial Services Committee, addressed several hot-button issues, including a mounting push by business interests to slash what they consider burdensome regulations.

DOJ_NMG_0103310

The lawmaker said he had met with leaders of the Securities and Exchange Commission and an accounting industry oversight board to urge them to give businesses some relief from a costly audit rule prescribed by the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley law. Over the next two weeks, the agencies are set to present proposed changes to the rule, which requires that auditors review corporate financial controls to prevent fraud and mistakes.

"There's a general consensus that you can preserve principles of Sarbanes-Oxley without exempting anybody and make it less burdensome," Frank said.

Frank also vowed to hold hearings on a report issued last week by the Committee on Capital Markets Regulation, a private group that has won support from Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr.

He reserved judgment on proposals that would make it more difficult for consumers to sue businesses, auditors and corporate board members, saying that the issue fell under the jurisdiction of another congressional panel.

But Frank said he agreed with several other recommendations, including indicting companies only as a last resort and rolling back controversial Justice Department guidelines that urge companies to waive their attorney-client privilege.

Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty has been considering changes to a memo that says when prosecutors should bring criminal charges against businesses, but he has not released any revisions. In the meantime, Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) is set to introduce legislation to supersede those guidelines as early as today.

In contrast to his conciliatory tone on those issues, Frank decried the widening inequality of incomes as the "number one problem facing the U.S. domestically" and pledged to hold hearings early next year on soaring executive compensation.

A bill Frank had introduced promoting greater disclosure of executive pay packages will come up again, he said, because few members of corporate boards protest excessive pay demands by chief executives.

Frank expressed general agreement with proposals that would give shareholders more say in the way businesses operate, calling that approach a worthy alternative to regulation.

The SEC is weighing how much power to allow shareholders to nominate and reject candidates for corporate board membership. Business groups argue that granting such power to shareholders could allow special interests such as union-backed pension funds to hijack corporate agendas. Amid threats from industry representatives who said they would sue over the measure, the SEC yesterday postponed consideration of the issue, removing it from the topics it will consider at its Dec. 13 meeting.

Frank expressed less confidence in arguments that U.S. rules are forcing companies to move abroad and hurting American competitiveness. He said similar doomsday arguments were made by technology firms that bitterly opposed treating stock options as an expense on their books.

He rejected the prospect of legislation to tighten oversight of hedge funds, lightly regulated pools of capital designed for wealthy investors and institutions. But Frank said not enough is known about the more than 9,000 hedge funds and their risks, so hearings with no "predisposition to regulation one way or another" are likely, particularly examining instances in which public employee pension funds have invested with hedge fund managers.

New Chair To Explore Economic Inequality (AP)

By Jeannine Aversa

AP, December 7, 2006

Incoming House Financial Services Committee Chairman Barney Frank said Wednesday he plans to delve deeper into why some Americans are not reaping the benefits of a mostly healthy economy, which he called the "No. 1 problem" facing the country.

The Massachusetts lawmaker, in a wide-ranging discussion with reporters, highlighted some of his priorities once he takes over the committee, when the new Democratic-controlled Congress convenes in early January.

While the economy's growth, as measured by gross domestic product, has been expanding at a decent pace, the inflation-adjusted wages of workers have lagged.

After a long period of sluggish wage gains, workers in recent months have started to see an improvement as lower prices for gasoline and other goods have allowed their paychecks to go further.

DOJ_NMG_0103311

There is an "increasing disconnect between growth in the gross domestic product and the well-being of the average citizen," Frank said.

Frank said he wants to begin to hold hearings in February to explore the matter and "get people to understand the facts." Frank said he would work with his congressional colleagues, business groups and others for possible legislative solutions.

The Bush administration, which has acknowledged the lag in "real," that is inflation-adjusted wages, has expressed confidence that the situation is turning around. Edward Lazear, chairman of the White House's Council of Economic Advisers, last month predicted: "I would anticipate that we will have positive and strongly positive real wage growth though next year."

On other matters, Frank said he wants to advance legislation aimed at dealing with "predatory" lending practices to some borrowers, boosting the supply of affordable housing, reforming mortgage giants Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac and shaping provisions that govern foreign investment in the United States.

Sources: HP To Settle Civil Complaint (CNET)

By Ina Fried, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News, December 7, 2006

California's attorney general expected to announce that company has settled complaints related to spy scandal, CNET News.com has learned.

The California attorney general's office is expected to announce Thursday that it has settled civil complaints with Hewlett-Packard over the company's spying tactics, CNET News.com has learned.

The civil complaints are separate from the criminal charges already brought forward by the attorney general's office. Five people, including former HP Chairman Patricia Dunn, are facing felony charges in connection with HP's campaign to determine the source of unauthorized media leaks. All five have pleaded not guilty.

A lawyer for the attorney general's office confirmed that an announcement is scheduled for Thursday, but would not confirm or deny the civil settlement. CNET News.com reported last week that the state's top prosecutor was considering a civil complaint over HP's tactics.

An HP representative declined to comment.

As part of its effort to uncover the source of news stories, HP investigators employed the practice of "pretexting," or using false pretenses, to obtain the phone records of more than a dozen people, including board members, journalists and HP employees. The company also employed physical surveillance and sent a bogus tip with an electronic tracer to a CNET News.com reporter.

After the company's tactics came to light, Congress held hearings, and the FBI and Justice Department also launched probes. HP also faces a formal SEC inquiry into the matter.

The scandal also prompted the departures of Dunn, general counsel Ann Baskins and two other HP employees.

Judge Seeks Parmalat Settlement (FT)

By Adrian Michaels In Milan

Financial Times, December 7, 2006

A judge in New York has ordered Bank of America and the former auditors to Parmalat to set out in writing their stances on a settlement in the multibillion dollar damages case surrounding the collapse of the Italian dairy company.

Judge Lewis Kaplan has also told Parmalat itself to submit what it would accept to settle the case, telling all groups involved to consider a global settlement and to send letters relating to a deal to Henry Pitman, another judge.

Judge Pitman is to review the letters and start to assess the possibility of a global settlement in the week of December 18, according to a transcript of a hearing presided over by Judge Kaplan at the end of November and obtained by the Financial Times.

Bank of America and auditors Grant Thornton and Deloitte are being targeted for damages as it is alleged they helped prolong fraud at the company, which collapsed at the end of 2003. None has admitted wrongdoing.

Pressure on the parties to settle came to light two weeks ago when Parmalat revealed that Judge Kaplan had suspended proceedings until next year. That written settlement proposals have been demanded underscores the judge's intent.

The judge said at the hearing: "The time may be ripe to precipitate, if it is conceivable to do, a global settlement or as close to a global settlement as can be achieved...I am directing you all to talk to each other and to see where we can go."

Shares in Parmalat, which was reborn under new management on the Milan stock exchange last year, have risen 10 per cent in the past month. Analysts estimate that Parmalat's market capitalisation of €5bn ($6.7bn) includes about €2bn that investors believe could be recovered via litigation.

Any settlement could increase pressure on Citigroup, which is being separately sued by Parmalat, to also reach an agreement.

Parmalat is pursuing another dozen or so banks in Italy for damages and targeting about 50 institutions in "revocatory" actions that seek to unwind financial transactions carried out in the months leading up to the company's collapse. About €400m has already been recovered from Morgan Stanley, Banca Popolare Italiana and Nextra.

Bank of America, Parmalat, Deloitte and Grant Thornton would not comment on Wednesday.

People close to some of the banks and auditors involved acknowledge that an all-embracing settlement would be desirable but point out it would have to include an end to a separate class- action case in the US. Talks several months ago of settlement foundered as the two sides had been far apart in their offers, people close to the negotiations said.

Credit Suisse and Italy's Banca Nazionale del Lavoro recently signed a memorandum of understanding in a proposed settlement of their part of a class-action claim against them, offering to pay $25m each if the agreement could be concluded.

Lone Star Probe Spawns Charges, But None Against The Equity Firm (WSJ)

By Evan Ramstad And Lina Yoon

The Wall Street Journal, December 7, 2006

SEOUL, South Korea -- Prosecutors here said they would charge former government officials and bankers for fraud in the 2003 sale of a controlling stake in Korea Exchange Bank to Lone Star Funds. But they brought no charges against the Dallas-based private-equity firm that has been trying to sell its stake in the bank since March.

The prosecutors said in a news conference Thursday morning in Seoul that KEB managers and government officials worked with Lone Star to make the nation's fifth-largest bank look financially troubled in order to get regulatory approval for the 2003 deal. They called the transaction -- in which Lone Star paid $1.2 billion for 51% of the bank -- "inappropriate" but not illegal and said they continue to investigate.

The prosecutors said they would indict 15 people in the matter, but they identified only two: Byeon Yang Ho, a former official at the Ministry of Finance and Economy, and Lee Kang Won, former chief executive officer of KEB.

Their probe began in late March, just a week after another Korean bank, Kookmin Bank, agreed to buy Lone Star's and other shares in KEB amounting to a 65% stake for $6.6 billion. Lone Star's profit in the deal would have amounted to about $4.5 billion.

The size of that deal and Lone Star's resulting profit shocked politicians and the Korean public. Many were upset when foreign investors over the past two years made big money by selling the control of Korean banks they had purchased in the wake of the country's economic collapse in the late 1990s.

On Nov. 20, prosecutors indicted Lone Star and KEB for alleged stock manipulation related to the merger of the bank with its separately listed credit-card unit shortly after Lone Star took over in 2003. Three days later, Lone Star ended its agreement to sell KEB stake to Kookmin Bank.

But for much of the probe, prosecutors have focused on the original sale of KEB to Lone Star. Korean politicians who pushed for the investigation claim the price Lone Star paid was too low, although it represented a 13% premium to the bank's market value at the time.

Loser Pays (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0103313

One reason the tort bar files so many frivolous lawsuits is that there have been very few penalties for its legal abuses. So congratulations are due to a Texas judge who last week ordered class-action kingpin Bill Lerach to pay up for his latest wretched excess.

Federal Judge Melinda Harmon's good deed came at the end of a high-profile suit against Alliance Capital. She dismissed the case in summary fashion and invoked a little-used legal rule that requires the Lerach firm to pay Alliance's legal fees. While the plaintiffs might have had cause for filing the suit, the judge said, by the end of discovery it was clear "the continuance of the claim against Alliance was at that point without merit" and so the Lerach firm must pay for dragging Alliance past that point.

We'd call that justice, with the caveat that Judge Harmon is probably too generous in saying Mr. Lerach had a reason to sue in the first place. The suit was a Lerach Special, a novel attempt to pry money from a company only tangentially involved with the Enron debacle. An Alliance executive, Frank Savage, had served on Enron's board from 1999 to 2001. During his Enron tenure, he'd signed a registration statement for a bond issue that included false financial statements. Mr. Lerach's elastic legal theory was that Alliance had put Mr. Savage on the Enron board, and thus the company was liable for his actions.

Judge Harmon found that Ken Lay, Enron's chairman at the time, had invited Mr. Savage to join the board, and that Alliance had merely acquiesced. She also found that there was no evidence that either Alliance or Mr. Savage had known the registration statement was false. And she said all of this was obvious by the end of discovery, though that didn't stop Mr. Lerach from fighting on, no doubt in the hope that Alliance would settle just to make him go away.

So Judge Harmon reached back to a section of the 1933 Securities Act, which allows a court to shift costs to an opposing party if a case is frivolous or without merit. That rule, Section 11(e), is rarely invoked. But Judge Harmon used it and took the additional and unusual step of assessing the penalty against the law firm, rather than the plaintiff. A stricter version of such a "loser pays" rule is a feature of British tort law and would be a splendid U.S. reform.

She acknowledged that dunning the law firm goes against a ruling of the Second Circuit Court of Appeals, which has found that Section 11(e) "was not intended to authorize an award against the parties' attorney." But she noted that no other Circuit Court had adopted that philosophy and that "licensed" plaintiffs attorneys know better than their clients when a case has become "frivolous." Her court is part of the Fifth Circuit.

To be sure, Mr. Lerach's client was the University of California Board of Regents and no babe in the tort woods. Like many public pension representatives, the California regents have become willing fronts for the tort bar. But Judge Harmon is right that the real culprit here is Mr. Lerach, whose former firm, Milberg Weiss, was indicted this year for paying kickbacks to plaintiffs in its suits. Let's hope more judges take their duty to protect the integrity of the courts more seriously and make the loser of a frivolous lawsuit pay.

CRIMINAL LAW:

More Than 1,000 Officials Snared In FBI Corruption Probes (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press

AP, December 7, 2006

WASHINGTON – More than 1,000 government employees, including hundreds of police officers, have been convicted over the last two years in FBI corruption cases against crooked public officials, Director Robert Mueller said Wednesday.

In prepared testimony to the Senate panel that oversees the bureau, Mueller called public corruption cases the FBI's “top criminal investigative priority.”

Public corruption “erodes public confidence and undermines the strength of our democracy,” Mueller said in his testimony. “Unchecked, it threatens our government and our way of life.”

Mueller was to appear Wednesday morning before the Senate Judiciary Committee in one of its last hearings before Democrats take control of the panel next year. His remarks also outlined strides the FBI has taken to protect the nation against terror attacks since 2001.

DOJ_NMG_0103314

Over the last year, the Justice Department has targeted about a dozen high-profile House and Senate lawmakers in corruption cases – including three Republicans in the month before the Nov. 7 election that shifted power in Congress to Democrats.

Overall, 177 federal officials have been convicted in corruption cases over the last two years, Mueller said. During the same time, the FBI investigated cases against 158 state officials, 360 local officials and more than 365 police officers. It was not immediately clear how many police officers represented local, state or federal law enforcement agencies.

Last year alone, the FBI saw a 25 percent rise in its public corruption investigations, resulting in 890 indictments and 759 convictions, Mueller said. There are 2,118 cases still pending, he said.

A chunk of the cases were the result of a Phoenix-based sting, code-named Operation Lively Green, which Mueller said so far has targeted 99 suspects in a bribery investigation of cocaine trafficking across the U.S.-Mexican border. More than 70 military personnel, prison guards and other law enforcement workers so far have been convicted of taking bribes to help move several hundred kilograms of cocaine across the border to Phoenix and Las Vegas, sometimes wearing uniforms and using military vehicles.

FBI Corruption Probes Snare Officials, Officers (USAT)

USA Today, December 7, 2006

More than 1,000 government employees, including hundreds of police officers, have been convicted in FBI corruption cases in the past two years, Director Robert Mueller said. He told the Senate Judiciary Committee that public corruption cases are the agency's "top criminal investigative priority." Those convicted include 177 federal officials, 158 state officials, 360 local officials and more than 365 police officers, Mueller said.

Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., pressed Mueller for information on the National Security Agency's warrantless domestic eavesdropping program against suspected terrorists. "What assurances can you provide that the program is worthwhile?" he asked. "Have arrests been made? Have terror cells been broken?"

Mueller said he has briefed the intelligence committees but wasn't authorized to share the information with the Judiciary panel.

Hurricane Center gets a new director

Veteran National Weather Service forecaster Bill Proenza was named to head the National Hurricane Center. He will succeed the retiring Max Mayfield, who headed the Miami-based agency since 2000 and became familiar to millions of Americans from his frequent TV interviews during the busy 2004 and 2005 storm seasons. Proenza, 62, director of the weather service's southern region, will take over Jan. 3, Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez said.

Black Caucus picks Kilpatrick as leader

The Congressional Black Caucus unanimously chose Rep. Carolyn Kilpatrick, D-Mich., as its chairwoman for the next two years. She replaces Rep. Mel Watt, D-N.C. When the new Democratic-controlled House of Representatives convenes in January, the 43-member caucus will include the third-ranking member in the House, Majority Whip James Clyburn of South Carolina. Four members may be committee chairmen and 20 may head subcommittees.

"That's more power than African-Americans have ever had in the Congress," said Ronald Walters, a political scientist and director of the African American Leadership Institute at the University of Maryland.

Vice president's daughter is pregnant

Mary Cheney, daughter of Vice President Cheney and wife Lynne, is pregnant. Mary Cheney, 37, and her partner of 15 years, Heather Poe, 45, are expecting a baby in late spring, said Lea Anne McBride, a spokeswoman for the vice president. She said the Cheneys "are looking forward with eager anticipation" to the arrival of their sixth grandchild. Cheney was her father's aide during the 2004 campaign.

FBI Focus Yields Spike In Corruption Cases (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, December 7, 2006

Congress isn't the only place where public corruption is on the rise.

DOJ_NMG_0103315

More than 1,000 federal, state and local government employees across the country have been convicted in government corruption cases over the past two years, including hundreds of crooked police officers and others who have dipped into the taxpayers' till, FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III said yesterday.

The numbers underscore the extent to which public corruption has become a primary, if little-noticed, focus of FBI criminal investigators, taking its place alongside preventing terrorism as one the bureau's fundamental missions.

All told, public-corruption investigations have surged by 30 percent in the past four years, to more than 2,000, officials said. The FBI now dedicates more than 600 agents and 15 percent of its criminal investigative resources to government graft.

"Public corruption is the top criminal priority for the FBI," Mueller told the Senate Judiciary Committee, adding later: "If we do not investigate these cases, they perhaps will not be investigated."

The highest-profile cases have been in Congress, including the probe into the web of corruption surrounding former lobbyist Jack Abramoff that led to guilty pleas from former congressman Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio) and some Capitol Hill aides, and a separate investigation that led to a guilty plea from former congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.). The FBI also prompted a showdown with House leaders earlier this year after it searched the Capitol Hill office of Rep. William J. Jefferson (D-La.) in connection with a probe of financial deals he was involved in.

But most of the FBI's corruption inquiries focus on state legislatures, city halls and police stations, Mueller said. The list of convictions over the past two years includes 158 state officials, 360 local officials and 365 police officers, Mueller said. One hundred seventy-seven of the convictions involved federal officials.

Among the biggest local cases were Operation Tennessee Waltz, in which 10 state officials and legislators were accused of taking payoffs in a sting operation; Operation Wrinkled Robe, a bribery investigation that led to arrests of two state judges in Louisiana; and an ongoing inquiry in Alaska that is focusing on whether state legislators accepted payments from an oil-field-services company.

Perhaps the biggest case is Operation Lively Green in Arizona, which Mueller said has targeted 99 suspects so far as part of a drug-related probe along the U.S.-Mexican border. Prison guards, service members and law-enforcement officers have been convicted of taking bribes to help move cocaine across the border.

Law-enforcement experts said it is impossible to say whether the increase in corruption cases reflects a rise in criminality among public officials or the greater emphasis at the FBI on such prosecutions.

The number of FBI agents assigned to corruption cases has ballooned from 451 in 2001 to 618 in 2006, officials said, and Mueller has made corruption the top priority for the bureau's criminal investigative division.

James Alan Fox, a criminology professor at Northeastern University in Boston, said that "nobody really knows if the extent of corruption is higher than previous decades. All we know is that the FBI is finding more because it's focusing on these cases."

Franklin E. Zimring, a law professor at the University of California at Berkeley who has studied prosecution of public-corruption cases, said such cases are extremely difficult to pursue because they are time-consuming and well-hidden.

"Unless you have ex-wives or frustrated business partners, nobody's going to phone you and say, 'My gosh, this is happening.' You have to go out and look for it," Zimring said. "It's a lot like narcotics and prostitution in two respects: It's very labor-intensive for law enforcement, and the amount of it you find is very closely related to the amount of it that you look for."

Mueller also disclosed that the bureau is investigating leaks to the media surrounding one corruption probe, an FBI investigation of Rep. Curt Weldon (R-Pa.), who lost his seat Nov. 7. Mueller indicated that the FBI and the Justice Department have opened "a series" of leak investigations into the Weldon case and others.

The FBI's probe of alleged influence peddling was reported Oct. 13 by McClatchy Newspapers, which cited an unidentified law-enforcement source.

The FBI's shift toward public-corruption cases has come at the same time that it has dramatically decreased its role in investigating violent gangs and crime. Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) told Mueller that the FBI needs to focus more resources on violent crime amid evidence that national crime rates are on the rise.

"I think you've got a real need for a mission reevaluation," she said.

Mueller said that, although he hopes to add resources to investigating violent crime, "I think our priorities are appropriately aligned."

FBI Is Probing Leak Of Curt Weldon Investigation, Mueller Says (BLOOM)

By Robert Schmidt

Bloomberg, December 7, 2006

Dec. 6 (Bloomberg) -- The Federal Bureau of Investigation is conducting a leak investigation into the disclosure several weeks before the congressional elections that the FBI is probing U.S. Representative Curt Weldon, the agency's director said.

FBI chief Robert Mueller told the Senate Judiciary Committee today that the agency is pursuing ``a series" of leak probes of its agents, including one involved in the Weldon matter. The Pennsylvania Republican, who lost his seat on Nov. 7, was involved in a tight race when the news of the investigation broke.

``I was exceptionally disappointed, and that is being charitable in terms of my response," Mueller said about the leak. ``It is unfair in advance of an election, but, as importantly to us, it adversely affected the investigation."

The FBI probe of alleged influence peddling was first reported Oct. 13 by McClatchy Newspapers, which cited an anonymous law enforcement agent. Three days later, agents raided the home of Weldon's daughter and five other targets.

Senator Arlen Specter, a Pennsylvania Republican and chairman of the judiciary committee, questioned Mueller about the Weldon leak during a hearing in Washington, calling it ``highly prejudicial."

Weldon, who called the investigation politically motivated, was defeated by Democrat Joseph Sestak.

Political Influence

The FBI is probing whether Weldon used his political influence to steer business to help his daughter Karen win consulting deals, a person familiar with the matter has said.

Mueller said that at least one of the bureau's leak probes is being handled as a criminal investigation. He told the senators that he believes investigators are having ``some success" in discovering who the leakers are but declined to give any details.

Republican and Democratic Senators sharply questioned Mueller on such issues as the rising violent crime rate, the Bush administration program that wiretaps suspected terrorists without a court order and potential budget problems with a new paperless case file system.

Senator Patrick Leahy, the Vermont Democrat who will take over as committee chairman next year, promised to press the FBI on privacy issues related to personal information the government collects to protect against terrorist attacks.

``There is a growing concern in this country that our government knows too much about us," Leahy said.

Leahy told Mueller that ``oversight of the FBI and the Department of Justice will be one of my highest priorities next year.''

Mueller disputed Leahy's claim that the bureau's new computerized case management system, called Sentinel, was underfunded by $56.7 million. A Justice Department inspector general report earlier this week identified the funding problem and expressed concern that the FBI would take money away from its law enforcement mission to fill the gap.

``There are no cost overruns and there are no budget shortfalls," Mueller said, adding that the $425 million projected price tag for the program hasn't changed.

FBI Probes Media Leaks In Corruption Cases (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, The Associated Press

AP, December 7, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The FBI has begun several internal investigations, including at least one that could result in criminal charges, over leaks to the media about public corruption probes shortly before last month's elections.

At least one of the alleged leaks involves the federal inquiry of Rep. Curt Weldon, R-Pa. He lost his House seat weeks after the FBI raided the homes and offices of his daughter and her business partner.

"There are a series of investigations we've undertaken, some by our inspection side, and some, at least one we're looking at as a criminal investigation," FBI Director Robert Mueller told the Senate Judiciary Committee on Wednesday.

"Although I usually say I can neither confirm nor deny an investigation, I think it's fair to say in this particular case we are pursuing it, and by that I mean (the leak involving) Congressman Weldon," Mueller said.

Mueller described himself as "exceptionally disappointed, and that is being charitable, in terms of my response upon hearing about the leak."

On Oct. 13, McClatchy Newspapers reported that the FBI was looking into whether Weldon illegally steered $1 million in contracts to his daughter's lobbying firm. Agents followed up with the raid three days later, in part out of fear that evidence would be destroyed after the investigation was exposed.

Officials also confirmed federal investigations of several other House lawmakers that month, including former Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla., and retiring Rep. Jim Kolbe, R-Ariz. All three men have maintained their innocence.

Senators scolded Mueller about the leaks. The committee chairman, Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., said the disclosures were "just disastrous" for suspects who have not been charged, much less proven guilty.

Similarly, Sen. Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, lectured Mueller about refusing to brief lawmakers about the FBI's continuing investigation of the 2001 anthrax attacks _ even though many sensitive details were reported in several newspapers.

"This looks like an example of the FBI's left hand not knowing what the right hand is doing," Grassley said. "You're telling me that you won't answer questions about the anthrax investigation, while someone else is telling the public that you're keeping us fully informed."

Leak investigations at the FBI, particularly those that could bring criminal penalties, are rare, former agents and experts said. They are hard to prove, particularly if some of the information has already been reported in the media or revealed in court documents.

Disclosing information a grand jury is considering is a serious crime, and such leaks often aim "to sway public opinion in favor of the government," said Martin Pinales, president of the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers.

"They also have the possibility of swaying the jury pool down the road," Pinales said. "So, in that context, they're a problem."

On the other hand, leaks may sometimes be the price of having an open government in a democracy, said Ronald Collins, a scholar at the First Amendment Center.

"Legally, those who leak do so at their own peril," Collins said. "Does the public's right to know, does knowledge of our government depend on leaks _ including illegal leaks? Unquestionably."

FBI agents can be forced to take lie-detector tests or otherwise cooperate with investigations to avoid losing their security clearances, and in turn, their pay. Information about ongoing criminal cases generally is shared with prosecutors and other law enforcement authorities _ widening the scope of suspects in leak cases.

Fred Bragg of the FBI Agents Association said his group "would invite a strong look at any leak matter _ and we look forward to those results."

Son Of Ex-Liberian President Indicted In Miami On Torture Charges (MH)

By Jay Weaver

The Miami Herald, December 7, 2006

A federal grand jury in Miami today indicted the son of former Liberian President Charles Taylor on torture charges in what is believed to be the first criminal case of its kind in the country.

Charles McArthur Emmanuel, 29, accused of committing atrocities in Liberia as the former head of a paramilitary unit in his father's government, already is in custody in the Federal Detention Center in Miami. He faces sentencing Thursday on a separate passport-fraud conviction.

Emmanuel, a U.S. citizen born in Boston who is known as "Chuckie" Taylor, admitted that he falsified his application for a passport to enter the United States from Trinidad on March 30. He was arrested by U.S. Customs and Border Protection agents upon his arrival at Miami International Airport.

His father, who was arrested the day before in Africa, faces a U.N.-backed war crimes trial for alleged atrocities during Sierre Leone's civil war. The elder Taylor also has been linked to killings, kidnappings, torture and other violence in Liberia, where his son headed the "Demon Forces," the security unit blamed for many of the alleged atrocities.

Liberian nationals and human rights activists lauded Emmanuel's prosecution as a day of justice.

"Chuckie was very feared, more feared than his father," said

Hassan Bility, a Liberian journalist and critic of the former president, who was jailed by the regime in an underground torture cell for six months in 2002.

DOJ_NMG_0103318

"This is a guy who killed young girls who wouldn't have sex with him," said Bility, who was granted U.S. asylum in 2003 and lives in Boston. ``This is a guy who tormented a lot of families."

Emmanuel's lawyer in the passport case, Miguel Caridad, could not be reached for comment.

Since last spring, federal prosecutors in Miami and Washington, D.C., have been building a criminal case against Emmanuel on torture allegations stemming from his role in the Taylor government, which was in power from 1997 to 2003, an era scarred by civil war and ethnic conflict.

The significance of Emmanuel's prosecution was so great that U.S. attorney R. Alexander Acosta flew to Washington to join U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to announce the indictment at a news conference this afternoon.

Human rights activists, who have focused world attention on the alleged atrocities in Liberia, hailed the prosecution of Emmanuel, the former head of the 800-man Anti-Terrorism Unit in Liberia.

A report by Human Rights Watch described the ATU as a force created by Taylor shortly after he became president in 1997, claiming it was involved in abuse of civilians, extortion, looting, murders, recruitment of child soldiers and torture.

Some torture victims were held in water-filled holes in the ground, "beaten and sexually abused, and forced to drink urine and eat cigarette butts," the Human Rights Watch report found.

Elise Keppler, a lawyer for the New York-based group, called the prosecution of Taylor's son "hugely significant," noting that it is the first case brought under a decade-old federal torture law.

"It's an historic step and has enormous importance for victims in Liberia and the U.S. government in bringing justice for atrocities committed abroad," Keppler said, adding this first prosecution was ``long overdue."

Bility, the journalist who worked for Liberia's The Analyst newspaper, cited Emmanuel's alleged role in various atrocities. The ATU, he said, was essentially a "hit squad" for the Taylor government.

"Chuckie is now going to have to account for his terrible deeds," Bility said.

Before joining his father in Africa, Emmanuel led a troubled life as a youth in Central Florida.

He had a lengthy juvenile arrest record in the early 1990s growing up in the Orlando area, according to court papers filed in the separate passport case. Among the charges: assault and battery, auto theft, robbery, resisting arrest and grand larceny.

One Florida mental health assessment of Emmanuel in 1994, when he went by the name Roy Belfast Jr. after his stepfather, said he had "an extensive history of aggressive criminal charges" and ``problems with anger control."

When he was arrested at the Miami airport last March, authorities found dozens of pages of Emmanuel's writings that appeared to be rap lyrics filled with violent imagery and obscenities, according to records filed in the passport case.

There were several references to the ATU and such lines as 'we ain't takin' no slack/ya'll try to tackle mine/layin bodies in stacks" and ``take this for free/six feet under is where you gonna be."

In that case, Emmanuel pleaded guilty in September to lying on a U.S. passport application about his father's identity and faces up to 10 years in prison. He identified his father as "Steven Daniel Smith" on the application, rather than Taylor or his stepfather, Roy Belfast.

Under federal sentencing guidelines, however, he is expected to serve 1 ½ years in prison.

Anti-Torture Statute Used To Indict Son Of Liberia's Ex-Leader (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith

The Washington Post, December 7, 2006

The Justice Department invoked a 12-year-old federal anti-torture statute for the first time yesterday, indicting the son of former Liberian president Charles Taylor in connection with the alleged use of a hot iron, scalding water and an electrical device to shock and burn an ally of his father's political opponents.

The indictment involves a rare use of a U.S. human rights law against a foreign national or a U.S. citizen over an act committed outside U.S. territory. Taylor's son allegedly committed the torture in the Liberian capital of Monrovia in July 2002, while he headed an "antiterrorist unit" charged with protecting Taylor.

DOJ_NMG_0103319

The son -- who is known as Chuckie Taylor but who legally changed his name to Roy Belfast Jr. in 1990 -- has been in a Florida jail for the past nine months on charges of trying to enter the United States on a false passport. In a court pleading in that case, his attorney said that Belfast, 29, has "consistently denied any criminal acts while in Africa."

Human Rights Watch, an advocacy group, had been lobbying the Bush administration to invoke the statute against Taylor since his arrest at the Miami airport after a flight from Trinidad. Amnesty International, which said in 2002 that at least 150 human rights abusers were living in the United States and called the country a "haven for torturers," had separately been pressing the Justice Department to invoke the 1994 criminal statute.

The charges are "important for Liberia, but also important because it opens a precedent," said Elise Keppler, a lawyer in Human Rights Watch's international justice program.

Until now, however, the government had preferred to seek extradition rather than criminal indictments. "These cases are hard cases," Julie L. Myers, head of the Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) agency, said at a news conference yesterday. "In this case alone, we had agents from . . . three different agencies flying all over the world to get evidence."

Myers called the indictment a milestone. She said it will send "a clear message that the United States will not be a safe haven for human rights violators." She noted that her agency created a new unit in 2003 to investigate human rights crimes. Myers described the Taylor case as "only one of numerous criminal investigations . . . in the United States where ICE agents are working closely with the Department of Justice on a variety of charges."

At the time of his arrest, Taylor admitted using a false passport, saying he was trying to evade a travel ban imposed on his family by the United Nations. Federal immigration authorities said that Taylor, who was born in Boston while his father was a student there, was trying to sneak back into the country after fleeing in 1994 to evade Florida charges of attempted robbery, aggravated assault and firearms possession.

Taylor's father escaped from a Massachusetts jail in 1985 to evade extradition on charges of embezzlement in Liberia, then formed a rebel group in his homeland. He took power there in 1997 after a seven-year civil war that killed 250,000 people. He was indicted on war crimes charges by a U.N.-sanctioned court in 2003 and arrested in Nigeria last March.

Yesterday's indictment of Belfast alleges that the torture, involving a co-conspirator who was not named, was committed after the victim was brought to the presidential residence.

Torture Charges A First In U.S. (WT)

By Jerry Seper, THE WASHINGTON TIMES

The Washington Times, December 7, 2006

A federal grand jury in Miami has charged the son of former Liberian President Charles Taylor in the 2002 torture of a man who was burned with a hot iron, forced at gunpoint to hold scalding water, repeatedly shocked and had salt rubbed into his wounds.

Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher said the indictment, handed up in U.S. District Court in Miami, accuses Roy Belfast Jr., 29, who also is known as Charles Taylor Jr., Charles Taylor II and Charles McArthur Emmanuel, with one count of torture, one count of conspiracy to torture, and one count of using a firearm during the commission of a violent crime.

Mrs. Fisher said the indictment charges Belfast, who was born in the United States, with participating in the July 2002 torture in Monrovia, Liberia, while he was serving as chief of a violent paramilitary unit during his father's regime.

"This marks the first time the Justice Department has charged a defendant with the crime of torture," Mrs. Fisher said.

According to the indictment, the victim -- who was not identified -- was abducted from his home and transported to various locations, ultimately arriving at the residence of Mr. Taylor, who was then president of Liberia. It said Belfast observed questioning of the victim at this location before he was transported to the residence of a co-conspirator for continued interrogation.

While at the residence, the indictment said, Belfast and others tortured the victim, including burning his flesh with a hot iron, burning various parts of his body with scalding water, repeatedly electrically shocking the victim's genitalia and other body parts, and rubbing salt into the victim's wounds.

Belfast is in federal custody in connection with a criminal charge of passport fraud, to which he pleaded guilty on Sept. 15. He admitted lying on his passport application by listing his father as "Steven Daniel Smith" rather than Charles Taylor or his stepfather, Roy Belfast. His sentencing is scheduled for today.

He was born in Boston in 1977 to a former girlfriend of his father.

Human Rights Watch, a nonprofit international rights group, said Belfast led the elite Anti-Terrorist Unit (ATU) from 1997 through 2002 when it is accused of being involved in torture, violent kidnappings, assaults, rape, beatings and burning people to death.

"Today's first-ever charges for torture committed abroad are a crucial step by the U.S. government to ensure justice for this crime," said Elise Keppler, Human Rights Watch counsel.

Belfast, who legally changed his name to Roy Belfast Jr. in 1990, is being prosecuted under a never-used 12-year-old statute that criminalizes torture and provides U.S. courts jurisdiction to hear cases involving acts of torture committed outside the United States if the offender is a U.S. national or is present in the United States, regardless of nationality.

If convicted, he faces life in prison.

Mr. Taylor, the former president, faces trial next year at The Hague on charges of war crimes and crimes against humanity in the murder, rape and mutilation of thousands of people during Sierra Leone's bloody 10-year civil war. He has pleaded not guilty.

Son Of Liberia's Ex-Leader Charged In Miami Under Anti-Torture Law (NYT)

By David Johnston

The New York Times, December 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 6 — The son of Charles G. Taylor, Liberia's former president, was charged Wednesday with two counts of torture and one count of using a firearm in a violent crime during interrogation of an opposition figure in Monrovia, the Liberian capital, according to a federal indictment brought in Miami.

The case is the first in which federal authorities invoked the anti-torture law, which bans extreme interrogation methods. The law gives American courts jurisdiction over reported abuse overseas by American citizens.

Mr. Taylor's son, Charles McArthur Emmanuel, was born in the United States. Mr. Emmanuel, 29, has pleaded guilty to passport fraud and is in federal custody awaiting sentencing, scheduled for Thursday, on that charge.

Mr. Taylor, the former president, is awaiting trial in The Hague on war crimes charges.

According to the indictment, Mr. Emmanuel, also known as Charles Taylor Jr., engaged in torture in July 2002 while he was an official of his father's government. Human rights groups have said he led an antiterrorist unit that engaged in widespread brutality against civilians.

If convicted of all the charges against him, he faces a maximum term of life in prison, officials said.

The three-count indictment said the victim, who is not named, was a political opponent of the Taylor government. The victim was taken from his home to several locations, including the president's residence, and later to the home of a co-conspirator in the Liberian security service.

There the man was repeatedly burned with a hot iron and scalding water, the indictment said. He was given electric shocks and salt was rubbed into his wounds. The interrogation was carried out at gunpoint, the indictment said.

The United States attorney in Miami, R. Alexander Acosta, said these acts violated federal law. "Such conduct is criminal and constitutes torture, and must be prosecuted," he said.

Julie L. Myers, assistant secretary of homeland security, said the case showed that the United States "will not be a safe haven for human rights violators."

Human rights groups praised the indictment, saying the use of the law set an important precedent in an effort to stop abuses around the world.

But groups in the United States and elsewhere have criticized the Bush administration for its failure to use the anti-torture law in cases in which terrorism suspects held overseas have been abused or killed while in American custody.

“Enforcement of federal laws on torture committed abroad is long overdue,” Elise Keppler, a lawyer at Human Rights Watch, said in a statement.

Son Of Ex-Liberian President May Face U.S. Torture Charges (AP)

By Curt Anderson

AP, December 7, 2006

MIAMI - The son of former Liberian President Charles Taylor was indicted Wednesday on U.S. charges of committing torture as chief of a violent paramilitary unit during his father's regime, marking the first time a 12-year-old federal anti-torture law has ever been used, U.S. officials said.

Charles McArthur Emmanuel, also known as Charles "Chuckie" Taylor Jr. and Roy M. Belfast Jr., was charged in a three-count federal indictment with committing torture overseas as a U.S. citizen as well as conspiracy. He was born in Boston in 1977 to a former girlfriend of Taylor, who was a college student there at the time.

Because Emmanuel, 29, was born in the United States, prosecutors charged him under a 1994 law making it a crime for a U.S. citizen to commit torture or war crimes abroad. Emmanuel is already in custody in Miami awaiting sentencing for falsifying his father's name to get a passport he used to enter the U.S. from Trinidad in March.

Alice Fisher, assistant U.S. attorney general for the Justice Department's criminal division, said the indictment was the first time charges under the torture laws had been brought. Emmanuel faces a potential life prison sentence.

"Crimes such as these will not go unanswered," Fisher said at a news conference in Washington with Miami U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta and Julie L. Myers, head of U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

"This is a clear message that the United States will not be a safe haven for human rights violators," Myers said.

Emmanuel headed the Anti-Terrorist Unit in Liberia after his father became president in 1997. The indictment says that on July 24, 2002, the unit and National Police abducted an unnamed man from his home, and Emmanuel was seen interrogating him at Taylor's presidential residence, known as Whiteflower.

Later, according to the indictment, the man was taken to another residence where Emmanuel and others allegedly burned him with a hot iron, forced him at gunpoint to hold scalding water, used electric shocks on his genitalia and other body parts and rubbed salt into this wounds.

Emmanuel's court-appointed lawyer, Miguel Caridad, declined comment on the new charges.

Human Rights Watch, a nonprofit international rights group, and Liberian witnesses have said the unit was involved in many murders, kidnappings, torture, abuse of civilians, recruitment of child soldiers and looting.

"Given Chuckie Taylor's links to serious human rights abuses in Liberia, this indictment is especially significant for victims there," said Elise Keppler, counsel for Human Rights Watch's International Justice Program. "After years of civil war, the Liberian justice system is in no shape to pursue this."

Emmanuel's father, meanwhile, faces trial next spring in The Hague, Netherlands, on charges of war crimes and crimes against humanity for allegedly overseeing the murder, rape and mutilation of thousands of people during Sierra Leone's bloody 10-year civil war, many hacked to death with machetes. Taylor has pleaded not guilty.

Emmanuel pleaded guilty in September to lying on his passport application by listing his father as "Steven Daniel Smith" rather than Taylor or his stepfather, Roy Belfast. Emmanuel legally changed his name to Roy Belfast Jr. in 1990 and had a long criminal record as a child in the Orlando area under that name, according to court documents.

Sentencing was scheduled for Thursday in the passport case, with prosecutors seeking a nearly two-year prison term.

In a written statement to the judge in passport case, Emmanuel said he falsified the name to get around a United Nations travel ban imposed on both him and his father. But Emmanuel said he was the victim of a "smear campaign" regarding the alleged Liberian atrocities, mentioning the 2005 Hollywood film "Lord of War" as an example.

"I am alongside my father depicted as a gold gun toting made man who lusts for girls with cowboy hats along with diamonds and money," Emmanuel wrote. "I wish not for these allegations, perceptions, and hypothefications to exist; clearly they are above the realm of reality."

DOJ_NMG_0103322

Emmanuel joined his father in Liberia in 1997, three years after fleeing prosecution in Orlando on attempted robbery, aggravated assault and other charges, court documents show. Taylor had taken office that year after leading a rebel group against former President Samuel Doe during a seven-year civil war that claimed some 250,000 lives.

Taylor fled Liberia in 2003 after his indictment by the special Sierra Leone court. He was arrested in Africa one day before his son was apprehended March 30 at Miami International Airport.

US Charges Son Of Ex-Liberian President Taylor With Torture (AFP)

AFP, December 7, 2006

US justice authorities charged Charles "Chuckie" Taylor, 29, a US citizen and the son of former Liberian president Charles Taylor, with torture for acts carried out in Liberia.

"This marks the first time the Justice Department has charged a defendant with the crime of torture," Assistant Attorney General Alice Fischer said in announcing the indictment.

Taylor, who is in custody in the United states in connection with a charge of having a false passport, to which he pleaded guilty in September, was head of Liberia's anti-terrorism forces under his father's regime 1997-2003.

He is being prosecuted under a federal law that gives US courts jurisdiction to hear cases involving acts of torture committed outside the United States if the offender is a US national or is present in the United States.

The maximum penalty for torture is life imprisonment.

Taylor on Wednesday was charged with one count of torture, one count of conspiracy to torture and one count of using a firearm during the commission of a violent crime, the Justice Department said in a statement.

Specifically, he is charged with participating in the torture of a person in July 2002 who had been abducted from his home and taken to the residence of a member of the Liberian Special Security Service.

"The allegations in this case include acts of torture, such as burning flesh with a hot iron, burning flesh with scalding water, and applying electric shocks," US Attorney Acosta said in the statement.

"This is a clear message that the United States will not be a safe haven for human rights violators," said Assistant Secretary for Immigration and Customs Enforcement Julie Myers.

Warlord-turned-president Charles Taylor was forced to step down from power in August 2003 in a bid to end 14 years of successive civil wars, and a transitional government was put in place to run the resource-rich but impoverished west African country.

Man Sentenced In Tenn. Corruption Probe (AP)

AP, December 7, 2006

MEMPHIS, Tenn. (AP) — A county official whose family has a long history in the civil rights movement was sentenced Wednesday to slightly more than two years in prison for bribery.

Michael Hooks Sr., the former chairman of the Shelby County Commission, is one of 11 people, including five current or former state lawmakers, charged in an undercover FBI investigation code-named Tennessee Waltz.

Judge J. Daniel Breen noted Hooks' guilty plea and statements of remorse in sentencing him to 26 months, less than the federal guidelines. Breen also ordered two years' supervised release after the prison term, which does not allow for parole.

"We thought there was a chance of getting a little less, but I've done much more to myself than the judge could ever do," Hooks said.

Hooks, 56, pleaded guilty to taking $24,200 from FBI agents posing as representatives of E-Cycle Management, a fake company that sought favors from government officials.

Hooks grew up in the home of his uncle, Benjamin Hooks, 81, the former national director of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. The elder Hooks said he had advised his nephew to admit his wrongdoing.

"Having raised Michael, loving him like a son, I hate to see this happen," Benjamin Hooks said outside the courthouse. "He made a mistake. Many of us do, and he has to pay the price of the mistake."

Hooks Sr. Gets 2 Years, 2 Months In Waltz (MCA)

Memphis Commercial Appeal, December 7, 2006

December 7, 2006 Vowing to spend the time doing "an exhaustive moral inventory of myself," a contrite Michael Hooks Sr. was sentenced Wednesday to two years and two months in federal prison for accepting more than $24,000 in bribes as a county commissioner.

Hooks, 56, who also is a former city councilman and county assessor, told U.S. Dist. Court Judge J. Daniel Breen he had made "a career-ending, life-altering mistake" and asked the judge for leniency.

"Elected office was very dear to me," said Hooks, whose political career began nearly 30 years ago. "I've ruined the legacy of this family. I've got to find a way to make that right."

Dr. Benjamin Hooks, the famed civil rights leader who raised him, said his nephew must pay the price for his mistake, but that he expects him to grow stronger because of it.

"I talked to Michael when this first happened, and my advice was very simple: If you're guilty, admit it and get rid of it," said Hooks, 81, who also was FCC chairman and national leader of the NAACP. "At some point, no matter whose son or daughter you are, if you make a mistake you pay for it, but it should not tarnish you forever."

Hooks technically faced up to 10 years in prison, but federal guidelines suggested a punishment range of 33 to 41 months for Hooks.

Breen said that, among other factors, he considered Hooks' years of public service and also his violation of public trust.

Breen and federal prosecutors were clearly impressed by Hooks' admission of guilt and his refrain from criticizing the FBI's Tennessee Waltz investigation that recorded his downfall.

"He has accepted responsibility about as sincerely and publicly as he can," Asst. U.S. Atty. Tim DiScenza told the judge.

By comparison, former state senator Roscoe Dixon's defense in his bribery trial included allegations of entrapment and racism.

Dixon, who was convicted of accepting $9,500 in bribes, was sentenced by another judge to five years and three months in prison.

Hooks, who was represented by attorney Steve Farese, pleaded guilty in August to accepting $24,200 in bribes from informants or FBI agents posing as crooked businessmen for helping a fictitious company, E-Cycle Management, secure business deals with Shelby County Government.

Between Sept. 7, 2004, and March 10, 2005, he received five payments -- ranging from $3,500 to $6,000 -- in locations that included E-Cycle offices, Hooks' home and the bathroom of a Downtown restaurant.

The transactions were captured on hidden audio or video devices.

So far, seven elected officials or aides have been convicted or pleaded guilty in the Tennessee Waltz investigation.

Five others are awaiting trial, including the County Commission's former top administrative officer, Calvin Williams, whose bribery trial is scheduled to begin Monday.

Another defendant is Michael Hooks Jr., who is accused of conspiring to defraud the Juvenile Court clerk's office of more than $60,000 in 2001.

His father said his guilty plea should have no bearing on his son's case.

"I would hope that my acceptance would show him that even when you're wrong, you can stand strong," said the elder Hooks. "We know he's innocent, and we hope he can stand strong."

Hooks Sr. will remain free until the U.S. Bureau of Prisons notifies him in several months when and where to report.

Hooks asked Breen to recommend that he be incarcerated at the federal prison camp on the Maxwell Air Force Base in Montgomery, Ala., which he said has medical facilities for the knee replacements he needs and for treatment of his high blood pressure and diabetes.

"I don't want to be close to Memphis because I don't want my family to feel like they'll be obligated to come and see me," Hooks told reporters outside of the federal building.

"I need time to do an exhaustive moral inventory of myself. I've broken down and I just need to reconstruct myself and start a new life. No more public office. I have only one race to run and that's for salvation and redemption."

Cloud Of Public Corruption Looms Over Shelby County (WMC)

WMC-TV, December 7, 2006

A cloud of public corruption is looming over Shelby County; troubled elected officials bear a common thread which is impossible to ignore.

Rhodes Professor Charles McKinney doesn't hold the answer to the riddle of race in Shelby County.

He says citizens must be able to trust their elected officials as well as the government agencies monitoring them. Specifically, McKinney says, the FBI.

McKinney adds,"What does it mean that the vast majority are Democratic or, perhaps more importantly, are African-American.

"If somebody is targeting Democrats, the vast majority of them, that's going to mean one of two things: one, they're targeting Democrats, and two, they're targeting African-American Democrats. If that is, in fact, the case," says McKinney.

McKinney says that this case is another unfortunate example of the peeling and stripping away of public trust.

He says that nobody wins when that happens.

McKinney adds that critical inquiry of the public process is not only crucial, it's a citizen's civic responsibility.

Former Official Pleads Guilty To Accepting Bribes (AP)

AP, December 7, 2006

CENTRAL ISLIP, N.Y. — A former director of contracting for the Army pleaded guilty in federal court to accepting more than $350,000 in cash, as well as airline tickets and hotel rooms, as bribes in exchange for awarding contracts at an Army recreational facility in Germany, prosecutors said Wednesday.

Steven Potoski, 46, of Shriesheim, Germany, a former civilian Army employee, pleaded guilty to one count of bribery and three counts of filing false tax returns, Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher for the Criminal Division said in a statement released from Washington.

Potoski faces up to 15 years in prison and a $250,000 fine on the bribery count and a maximum of three years in prison and $100,000 fine for each count of filing false tax returns.

Prosecutors said that between August 1998 and July 2005, Potoski served as director of contracting for the Edelweiss Lodge and Resort, Armed Forces Recreation Center (AFRC Europe), in Garmisch, Germany. During that time, Potoski accepted bribes from contractors and subcontractors in exchange for contracts to work at the AFRC Europe.

In all, Potoski accepted over $350,000 in bribes from 15 contractors or subcontractors, two American contractors, 12 German contractors, and one British contractor, Fisher said. Bribes also came in the form of home renovations, automobile maintenance, airline tickets, hotel rooms and furniture, among other things.

No sentencing date was announced.

It was not immediately clear why the case was brought in U.S. District Court in Central Islip.

Fumo Calls Grand-jury Judge Biased (PHI)

By John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, December 7, 2006

State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo says the federal judge supervising a grand jury investigation of him should step aside, citing a long history of "political animosity" between the judge and senator.

U.S. District Judge Legrome D. Davis has declined to recuse himself, saying he bears no animosity to Fumo, who strongly opposed the judge's nominations to the Philadelphia Court of Common Pleas and the federal bench.

In a sealed order issued in July, Davis called Fumo's prior opposition nothing more than "political gamesmanship."

A federal appeals court agreed with Davis, and now Fumo has appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court.

DOJ_NMG_0103325

In the new appeal, Fumo's lawyers say the senator has "made repeated personal attacks on Judge Davis' character, honor, independence, integrity, honesty, judicial temperament and suitability for office."

It's not unreasonable to think the judge might subscribe to the adage "Revenge is a dish best served cold," wrote lawyers Richard A. Sprague and Geoffrey R. Johnson.

Davis, a Democrat appointed to the bench by President Bush in 2002, is now the randomly assigned judge presiding over a federal grand jury investigating Fumo. That investigation, now three years old, is nearing its conclusion.

Davis declined to be interviewed yesterday. His ruling was issued in July, under seal. It became public when Fumo's lawyers attached it to their Supreme Court brief.

Davis wrote that he has does not have "any degree of personal animosity or prejudice" toward Fumo.

Assistant U.S. Attorney John Pease said that he could not comment on the matter because Davis has not made his ruling public.

"It's still under seal," Pease said, adding that Fumo's lawyers "had no authority" to release it. Johnson declined to comment.

Fumo's brief also discloses that Fumo had accused prosecutors of illegally leaking grand jury material to the media, an allegation Davis rejected.

The FBI and IRS are trying to determine whether Fumo used a South Philadelphia charity, Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods, for personal or political advantage.

The probe is focused on multimillion-dollar donations to the nonprofit by Peco Energy Co., along with the charity's real estate deals and its alleged payments for political polls.

Prosecutors, who have charged two former Fumo computer technicians with obstruction of justice for allegedly deleting e-mail, had said they expected to make a decision by Christmas on whether Fumo will be charged.

However, that timetable had been based on an expected January trial date for technicians Leonard Luchko and Mark Eister.

Now that the trial date has been moved to May, prosecutors may delay their decision on Fumo until the end of the grand jury term, in early February.

As the presiding grand jury judge in this case, Davis has issued 16 orders, almost all of them sealed. In one case, Davis ordered a defense lawyer to testify before the grand jury against the wishes of a Fumo ally. An appeals court upheld the ruling.

If Fumo is charged, the odds are that the trial will be assigned to another judge. Luchko and Eister, for example, are to be tried by Judge William H. Yohn.

Fumo's history of conflict with Davis goes back to the 1980s. In 1987, following a scandal over judges taking cash from the Roofers' union, Gov. Robert P. Casey nominated Davis to become a city judge.

As Fumo notes in his filing, he opposed Davis' nomination because Davis did not have the support of the city Democratic organization.

In 1998, when President Bill Clinton nominated Davis to the federal bench, Fumo used his influence to scuttle the confirmation before the U.S. Senate, despite a personal entreaty from Clinton himself. In 2002, President Bush nominated Davis and, after Davis and Fumo met privately, Fumo relented and Davis was confirmed.

In his ruling, Davis said the law did not require him to recuse himself and noted that he would not necessarily recuse himself from a case involving someone who supported him.

The documents filed in the Supreme Court disclose for the first time a 2002 private meeting between Fumo and the judge. After that meeting, Fumo dropped his opposition to Davis becoming a federal judge.

Now, the two men have different recollections about what happened.

Fumo's lawyers said Davis had come "hat in hand" for the senator's support.

But by Davis' account, the meeting was far more cordial. In his opinion, the judge said, he and the senator "reconciled all political differences" and "ended any tension between the two of us."

Tight Christmas (PHILCP)

Philadelphia City Paper, December 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0103326

Rumors of looming indictments dampen the mob's holiday spirit. But is it a ruse?

Many mobsters in the Philadelphia Cosa Nostra are dreaming of a jail-free holiday season, but they're worried that all they'll get for Christmas are chunks of coal taking the form of federal racketeering indictments.

Fueling concerns is the fact that undercover feds have been seen closely monitoring alleged mob meeting places in South Philly, Northeast Philly, Cherry Hill and Margate. It seems as if purported boss Joseph "Uncle Joe" Ligambi is the focus of attention.

"The FBI is following Ligambi around the clock," a mob associate tells City Paper. "A lot of people think something big is coming down the pike."

Despite the concerns, one local defense attorney who has represented mobsters says he thinks the feds are merely floating indictment rumors because they've wiretapped the local mob.

"It's called 'tickling the wire,'" the attorney explains. "The police tell the press. The press tells everyone else and when the gangsters hear about it, they start blabbing to each other over the telephone. The FBI hopes that someone will panic and say something incriminating."

The paranoia isn't exactly a new. Mobsters have been worried about Steven Carnivale, a Bucks County drug dealer and mob associate who has been talking to, and testifying for, the feds for the past two years.

Last year, his testimony helped convict mob associate Anthony "Tony Gags" Gagliardi on cocaine-trafficking charges. Carnivale claims he helped the Philly mob shake down Bucks bookies, and says Gagliardi was part of a crew that supposedly reported to reputed capo Gaeton Lucibello.

Then, last month, the feds busted two reputed mob associates: Damion Canalichio on drug-dealing charges, and Vincent Filipelli on gambling and extortion charges.

Canalichio, a onetime driver for imprisoned mob underboss Stevie Mazzone, allegedly set up three cocaine deals in South Philly. Law enforcement sources also claim he ran an illegal gambling operation in Philly and South Jersey. Filipelli, a onetime bodyguard and driver for jailed boss John Stanfa, allegedly ran an illegal sports-betting operation. The former Mr. Universe and Mr. America contestant is charged with racketeering and possession of anabolic steroids and drug paraphernalia.

Despite the charges, Filipelli's underworld status has been the subject of a much-heated debate lately. One mobster who pledges allegiance to Ligambi claims Filipelli has never been a fully initiated member, while law enforcement sources insist otherwise.

"A lot of the made guys around today were with [Joey] Merlino and [Ralph] Natale during the mob war against Stanfa," an organized crime investigator explains. "They don't know everyone that Stanfa initiated into the mob, but we know that Filipelli is a made guy."

As for any looming arrests?

"We're always building a case," says an organized crime investigator, "but it takes a long time. The feds are putting something together, but they have a long way to go."

"Sloppy and Greedy" Local mobsters are also talking about the recent indictment of William "Big Billy" D'Elia, the reputed boss of the Scranton-Wilkes-Barre mafia who has long been a good friend of the Philly mob.

Six weeks ago, D'Elia was indicted by the feds for soliciting murder, money laundering and witness tampering, among other charges. At the time, he was out on bail for a money-laundering charge from May. D'Elia allegedly asked a U.S. Customs Agency informant to murder two witnesses in the original money-laundering case. In return, D'Elia allegedly offered to kidnap and kill a smuggler who had stolen more than $400,000 from the informant, who was posing as a Dominican drug dealer.

D'Elia has pleaded not guilty to all the charges and, in recent years, has been spotted visiting Ligambi here while making frequent trips to the Big Apple to meet with leaders of New York's five families.

"Big Billy got sloppy and greedy," one local mobster says. He explains that a boss normally orders a "family" member to arrange or carry out a hit, but the Wilkes-Barre mob, once the most powerful crime family in the state, has lost a significant number of members. They didn't backfill the positions so they wouldn't have to share with newcomers.

"If convicted, he will spend the rest of his life behind bars," an investigator says. "If he decides to flip, he can bring down mob bosses from New York to Miami."

DOJ_NMG_0103327

That scenario is what has some local mobsters hyperventilating, but one Philadelphia member of the Cosa Nostra who has known D'Elia for two decades says being a government informant is just not in his nature.

"He's a man's man," the mobster says. "He will never talk to the feds. Never."

FBI Says U.S. Criminal Gangs Are Using Military To Spread Their Reach (S&S)

By Seth Robson, Stars and Stripes

Stars and Stripes, December 7, 2006

GRAFENWÖHR, Germany — U.S. criminal gangs have gained a foothold in the U.S. military and are using overseas deployments to spread tentacles around the globe, according to the FBI.

FBI gang investigator Jennifer Simon said in an e-mail to Stars and Stripes this week that gang members have been documented on or near U.S. military bases in Germany, Italy, Japan, South Korea and Iraq.

"It's no secret that gang members are prevalent in the armed forces, including internationally," Simon said, adding that the FBI is preparing to release a report on gangs in the military.

Among the cases:

¶ In Iraq, armored vehicles, concrete barricades and bathroom walls have served as canvasses for spray-painted gang art. At Camp Cedar II, about 185 miles southeast of Baghdad, a guard shack was recently defaced with "GDN" for Gangster Disciple Nation, along with the gang's six-pointed star and the word "Chitown," according to the Chicago Sun-Times.

¶ In Germany, a soldier is being prosecuted this week for the murder of Sgt. Juwan Johnson, beaten to death on July 4, 2005, allegedly during a Gangster Disciple initiation in Kaiserslautern.

¶ In September, Department of Defense Dependents Schools in Europe warned teachers and parents to watch out for signs of gang activity, including the deadly MS-13 gang. At the time, DODDS-Europe public affairs officer David Ruderman said there had been two incidents in the past 18 months that involved students fighting, wearing gang colors or claiming to be members of gangs. In one of the incidents, a student's family member may have been a gang member, he said.

¶ Earlier this year, Kadena Air Base on Okinawa established a joint service task force to investigate gang-related activity involving high school teens linked through the Web site MySpace.com.

Last year, the U.S. Army conducted 11 felony investigations into gang activity, one of those being the death of Johnson, said Christopher Grey, a spokesman for the Army Criminal Investigation Command (CID) in Virginia. Three of the incidents, including the Johnson case, took place in Europe, Grey said.

"We investigate all credible reports of gang activity," Grey said, adding that CID has programs to combat gang activity in the Army.

Soldiers are reluctant to talk openly about gang problems. However, Spc. Bautista Kylock, 21, of the 2nd Cavalry (Stryker) Regiment in Vilseck, Germany, said last week that there are gang members within his unit.

Kylock blamed recent violence around Vilseck on soldiers affiliated with the Crips and Bloods street gangs.

Scott Barfield, a former Defense Department gang detective at 2nd Cav's last duty station, Fort Lewis, Wash., told the Sun-Times earlier this year that he had identified more than 300 soldiers at the base as gang members.

"I think that's the tip of the iceberg," he said.

However, Vilseck Provost Marshal Maj. Robert Ray said there is not a big gang problem in Vilseck and he has no information on gang members within 2nd Cav.

"The military comes from all walks of lives, from rich to poor, and with that comes the 'society,'" Ray said. "Are there members of the military that belong to gangs? No doubt about it. But the military is not rampant with gang members.

"The military chain of commands do not tolerate things like that and do their best to weed out problems," he said.

There are no official statistics on gang membership in the military, but some experts have estimated that 1 percent to 2 percent of the U.S. military are gang members, Simon said. That compares with just 0.02 percent of the U.S. population believed to be gang members, she wrote.

"Gang membership in the U.S. armed forces is disproportional to the U.S. population," she added.

DOJ_NMG_0103328

Jim Kouri, vice president of the National Association of Chiefs of Police, wrote recently that, in addition to the Gangster Disciples, other Chicago gangs such as the Latin Kings and Vice Lords have infiltrated the military along with neo-Nazi groups.

Although there are no numbers to back it up, Simon believes gang member presence in the U.S. military is increasing.

"The U.S. Army has reported an increase in gang-related activity in the military, although their numbers are low," she said.

Gang-related activity in the military is highly underreported, and the Army is the only branch of the military that collects gang-related statistics, she wrote.

"It's often in the military's best interest to keep these incidents quiet, given low recruitment numbers and recent negative publicity. The relaxation of recruiting standards, recruiter misconduct and the military's lack of enforcement (gang membership is not prohibited in the Army) have compounded the problem and allowed gang member presence in the military to proliferate," Simon said.

State Directed To Test Recruiting Doctors For Executions (FINDLAW/AP)

By Brian Witte, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 7, 2006

(AP) - BALTIMORE-A federal judge considering challenges to Maryland's practice of execution by lethal injection wants the state to explore whether general surgeons, anesthesiologists and other more highly trained medical personnel would be willing to take part in executions.

Lawyers for death row inmate and convicted murderer Vernon Evans Jr. argue the people who currently carry out lethal injections are not qualified to know if an inmate is properly anesthetized before being put to death.

They have argued Evans' veins are so damaged from intravenous drug use that current execution protocol would subject him to "an unnecessary risk of unconstitutional pain and suffering."

They have asked U.S. District Judge Benson Legg to require the state to add a general surgeon and either an anesthesiologist or a certified nurse anesthetist to the lethal injection team.

Attorneys representing the state have argued such specialists are not needed because an execution is not a medical procedure.

The state also has argued that finding such specialists would be difficult. The American Medical Association, the American Society of Anesthesiologists and the American Nurses Association strongly discourage members from having anything to do with lethal injections.

But Evans' lawyers have argued there are medical specialists willing to take part. They have cited a study in the Annals of Internal Medicine that found 19 percent of surveyed physicians expressed a willingness to inject the drugs. The 2001 study also found 41 percent of the doctors surveyed would do at least one of the AMA-prohibited actions.

Death row prisoners nationwide have mounted challenges to lethal injection - the preferred method of execution in 37 states.

Doctors have participated in executions in other states, but attorneys representing Maryland have pointed out some of those doctors have faced repercussions from their involvement.

In California, an execution was indefinitely postponed in February after two anesthesiologists backed out because of ethical concerns they might have to advise the executioner if the inmate woke up or appeared to suffer pain.

Legg, writing in an order signed Friday, said he must balance the potential harm to the plaintiff - if the relief is withheld - against the burden to the defendant, if the relief is granted.

"To do this, the court must assess how difficult it would be for the state to recruit the medical specialists Evans advocates," Legg wrote.

During closing arguments in the case, Legg told attorneys it would be in the state's best interest to make sure executions run as smoothly as possible in order to avoid future lawsuits.

A. Stephen Hut Jr., who is representing Evans, did not immediately return a call seeking comment.

Bail Set For 2 In Alleged Prostitution Ring (AP)

No Bail For 3rd Suspect

(AP) DENVER A federal magistrate set bail at $20,000 each for two people accused of running a prostitution ring but ordered a third suspect held without bail.

Wai Chong Kong, 38, and his wife, Kit Chi Ho, 43, were ordered Monday to wear monitoring bracelets on their ankles if released on bail.

Magistrate Judge O. Edward Schlatter denied bail for Kah Poh Cheah, 28, who prosecutors said is in the United States illegally on an expired visa.

The three were arrested last month on suspicion of operating brothels out of four Denver-area apartments. Authorities said some of the prostitutes were working to pay off debts of up to $18,000 for fake visas that got them into the United States illegally from Asia.

Kong, Ho and Cheah each face one count of conspiracy and seven counts of transporting an individual for prostitution. Kong also faces with two counts of money laundering, and Ho and Cheah each face two counts of using interstate facilities to promote prostitution.

The maximum sentence for conspiracy is five years in prison and a $250,000 fine; for transporting for prostitution, 10 years and $250,000; for using an interstate facility, five years and $250,000; for money laundering, 20 years and $500,000.

Kong and Ho live in Highlands Ranch; Cheah lives in Thornton.

Ho wept as she asked to be released so she could rejoin her two children, ages 8 and 10. She said the children are staying with relatives in Minneapolis.

Ho's attorney, Marc Milavitz, said she is a legal U.S. resident who came to the country more than 17 years ago.

No information was immediately available on Kong and Cheah.

Sex-ring Suspect Weeps In Court (RMN)

Rocky Mountain News, December 5, 2006

Woman pleads to go home to her two young children

One of the women charged with flying prostitutes to Colorado to participate in a sex ring wept as she asked a federal judge Monday to let her go home to her two young children.

"Every day they are asking, 'How come we cannot see our mom?' " Kit Chi Ho, 43, of Highlands Ranch, told U.S. District Court Magistrate Judge O. Edward Schlatter through a court-appointed translator.

Schlatter set bail for Ho and her husband, 38-year-old Wai Chong Kong, at $20,000 each - an amount defense attorneys said the couple could post using equity in their home.

The two also will be required to wear ankle bracelets so they may be monitored electronically, Schlatter said.

Schlatter denied bail for Kah Poh Cheah, 28, of Thornton, who prosecutors said is in the United States illegally after overstaying a visitor visa.

The three were arrested last month on suspicion of operating brothels out of four Denver-area apartments.

On Monday, a federal grand jury returned an 18-count indictment, accusing each defendant of conspiracy and seven counts of transport of an individual for prostitution.

Kong also is charged with two counts of money laundering, and Ho and Cheah each are charged with two counts of using interstate facilities to promote prostitution.

Authorities said an eight-month investigation showed some of the prostitutes were working to pay off debts to brokers who helped them come to the United States illegally from Asia.

The women paid $8,000 to $18,000 for fake visas, and some of the women also worked in brothels in California, investigators allege.

The ring advertised in Westword and generally charged $140 for 30 minutes of sex, according to court documents.

Of that fee, the prostitutes would keep $90.

Ho's attorney, Marc Milavitz, described Ho as "an exemplary person in the community until this crime occurred."

DOJ_NMG_0103330

A native of China, Ho came to the United States more than 17 years ago. She is a legal U.S. resident with no criminal history, Milavitz said.

She and her husband have children ages 10 and 8 who are staying with an aunt in Minneapolis.

Until last year, Ho owned Ocean City restaurant on Federal Boulevard in Denver, Milavitz said. She was working at two other restaurants at the time of her arrest.

All three defendants are scheduled to appear in court for an arraignment Wednesday morning.

Richmond Man Faces Up To 120 Years For Fraud Scheme (DPHR/AP)

By The Associated Press

Daily Press, December 7, 2006

RICHMOND, Va. -- A 22-year-old Richmond man accused of cheating more than 350 investors out of about $8.3 million pleaded guilty Wednesday to mail fraud and money laundering.

James E. Brown Jr. faces a maximum of 120 years in prison and fines of up to $16 million on each count when he is sentenced March 14 by U.S. District Judge Richard Williams, according to federal prosecutors.

Brown was arrested in September after an investigation by the FBI, the U.S. Postal Inspection Service and the Internal Revenue Service. Authorities charged that Brown, owner and president of Brown Investment Services, promised investors he could double their money every 30 business days through trading on the Foreign Currency Exchange Market.

The investment program, which Brown promoted at classes and seminars, was bogus. Little of the money was invested, and Brown paid early investors with cash coming in from subsequent investors to lull them into believing the investments were paying off as promised.

Brown used the money to finance a lavish lifestyle, including a $2.9 million fleet of luxury automobiles for himself and his employees.

According to prosecutors, of the $8.3 million Brown obtained from investors, he only invested $484,000 in the foreign currency market, losing about $61,000. Only about $700,000 remained in the company's bank account when Brown was arrested.

Ex-soldier Pleads Guilty To Child Porn Charges (ELPT)

El Paso Times, December 7, 2006

A 27-year-old former Fort Bliss soldier pleaded guilty Wednesday in U.S District Court to charges of producing and possessing child pornography, the office of U.S. Attorney Johnny Sutton announced.

Gary Alan Hernandez Jr., a former first lieutenant in the 204th Military Intelligence Battalion, pleaded guilty to one count of production and one count of possession of material involving the sexual exploitation of children. He now faces 15 to 30 years in prison and could also be fined up to $250,000 for each count. He is scheduled to be sentenced March 5.

As part of his guilty plea, he admitted that on April 16, 2005, he enticed a minor female to engage in sexually explicit conduct that would be photographed and distributed on the Internet. He was arrested Aug. 3, 2005, by FBI agents.

Many Charges Dropped In Girls Gone Wild Video Series Case (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, December 7, 2006

(AP) - PANAMA CITY, Florida-All but eight of the dozens of felony charges once faced by producers of the Girls Gone Wild video series about young women baring their breasts and acting in other sexual situations have been dropped by prosecutors due to a lack of evidence in the case that is set for trial next year.

Assistant State Attorney Mark Graham said he can support only second-degree felony charges of using children in sexual performances in his case against producer Joseph Francis, Francis' companies and employees.

The remaining charges could be dropped at a Jan. 3 hearing when a judge considers a defense motion to dismiss all charges in the 2003 case.

DOJ_NMG_0103331

Graham filed the motion to reduce the charges on Monday in response to the request from Francis' attorney Aaron Dyer for all charges to be dropped because of police misconduct. A judge in July threw out evidence investigators gathered while searching Francis' condominiums and private jet because of problems with the search warrants.

The second-degree felonies are punishable by up to 15 years in prison. Phone calls placed by The Associated Press Wednesday to Dyer's office were not immediately returned.

Francis was arrested in April 2003 and charged with more than 40 criminal offenses, including racketeering. He is accused of participating in the filming of two 17-year-old girls in sexual situations at a Panama City Beach motel.

In Monday's motion, Graham also addressed a defense argument that the Girls Gone Wild producers did not know the girls were underage. The defense has maintained the girls lied about their ages and signed a release saying they were 18 years old.

"Knowledge of the victim's age is not an element of the offense of use of a child in a sexual performance," he wrote. "Whether the minor girls lied about their ages is irrelevant to the criminal charge."

A federal civil lawsuit against Francis filed by the two women filmed is pending.

Pastor Fatally Shot In Prince George's (WP)

By Joshua Partlow And Hamil R. Harris

The Washington Post, December 7, 2006

A well-known Prince George's County minister who runs a transitional home for poor families died yesterday after being gunned down on the steps of his church in the morning.

The Rev. Milton L. Moore was outside the entrance of the Warriors for Christ Ministries in Suitland about 7 a.m. when he was struck in the upper body and bullets shattered a glass door, police and relatives said. He died at 4:25 p.m.

The shooting happened outside the three-story beige brick ministry building at 2420 Brooks Dr., which shares a parking lot with Drew-Freeman Middle School. Vernell Simon, 66, who lives across Brooks Drive from the ministry building, said he heard five or six shots, followed minutes later by sirens.

People inside the ministry building told police that they heard arguing outside before the shots.

Moore, 50, was shot once in the upper body, police said.

"We don't know at this point what the motive is," said Cpl. Diane Richardson, a police spokeswoman. No arrests had been made last night.

Detectives interviewed residents of the building and people who were running on the school track next to the ministry at the time of the shooting.

The ministry, which includes a private transitional home, opened in the late 1990s. The home has a capacity of up to 20 families. Ministry officials kept the shelter open yesterday while they awaited news about Moore's condition.

Several advocates for the homeless in Prince George's said Moore's ministry plays an important role in the county's social safety net and helps people get off the streets until they can find more permanent shelter.

"We had a very close working relationship. He was friendly with everybody," said the Rev. Imogene Stewart, who operates shelters in Prince George's and the District.

The ministry Web site says Moore was "called by God from the womb to minister to the broken hearted, downhearted, dejected, sick, oppressed people -- in other words, to pull them out of the very pits of hell."

He was raised in Albany, Ga., and met his future wife, Eva D. Jackson, when they attended a Baptist church, relatives said.

After high school, he joined the U.S. Merchant Marine, his mother said. Later, he began to "bring forth the word of God in Bible studies, out of which Warriors For Christ Ministries was formed," the Web site says. "He is now training up a body of bold 'Warriors' to go forth, storming the gates of hell, setting the captives free."

Moore's mother, Doris Moore, expressed despondence in a telephone interview from her home in Georgia.

"It's just the times we living in," she said of the shooting.

Moore, a father of four, lived with his family on Bar Geese Court in Upper Marlboro.

No one answered the door of the house yesterday afternoon.

DOJ_NMG_0103332

His wife's sister, Patricia Jackson, said Moore was "always a pretty quiet person, but when he was around family, he was very lively."

He enjoyed attending church functions, and "he did a lot in the community. . . . He was always giving back," she said.

"This is an atrocity," said Linda Collins, director of transitional housing for Community Ministry of Prince George's. "There is so much violence in that area."

Link Seen In Deaths Of Aged Women (WP)

By Tom Jackman, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, December 7, 2006

Police View 2 Springfield Slayings as 'Crime of Opportunity' Committed by Same Person

Two elderly women slain three months apart in Springfield may have been killed by the same person -- someone with ties to their community who happened to come along, saw them alone and pounced on the opportunity to attack them, Fairfax County police said yesterday.

"I'm not going to say it's a serial killer," Capt. Michael Spradlin, head of Fairfax's criminal investigations bureau, said at a news conference. But he said investigators decided that the cases were linked after looking at the common elements. "It's obvious, to me."

Police urged residents, particularly seniors, to keep their doors locked and be aware of their surroundings. They also revealed that a diamond ring worn by the second victim, Marion J. Newman, 74, was stolen from her, most likely by her killer. Police distributed photos of the ring and asked the public for help in locating it as a possible clue toward finding the killer.

Spradlin said he believed that the slayings were "a crime of opportunity," in which an attacker happens upon a victim without planning or preparation. In the slaying of Marion B. Marshall, 72, Spradlin believes the killer "was just walking the street, he happened to see her, found no one home and he attacked her."

There was no indication that the women knew each other, Spradlin said. Newman's ring is the only item known to have been taken from either home. There was no sign of forced entry into either home or any indication of sexual assault, police said.

"We also feel the offender in this case has ties to the community," Spradlin said, meaning he may work or live or visit someone in either Edsall Park or Crestwood.

Marshall was found in her home in the 6600 block of Bostwick Drive, in the Edsall Park neighborhood just off Braddock Road, on Aug. 14. Police have not disclosed how she was slain.

Newman was found in her residence, in the 7100 block of Reservoir Drive, in the Crestwood neighborhood near Backlick Road, on Nov. 21. The cause of her death has also been withheld so that only the killer will know that information. Both women died of "unspecified trauma to the upper body," police said.

The houses, where the women lived alone for many years, are about two miles apart.

Investigators do not have physical evidence connecting the two cases. "The link is basically we have two female, elderly citizens of Fairfax County," Spradlin said, "that have been brutally murdered. They lived close to each other, their neighborhoods are similar, the women are similar."

A reward of $26,000 has been offered by the families of the two women for information leading to a conviction in the case.

Police have been discussing the cases with analysts from the FBI's Behavioral Sciences Unit, but Spradlin said he did not want to release any possible profile of the killer, for fear of limiting tips on potential suspects.

The ring stolen from Newman was specially made for her, welded together from three rings, and has three bands made of white gold, with diamonds inlaid and one diamond mounted, and a leaf design in the main band. Anyone with information about the ring or the homicides is asked to call 703-691-2131.

Spradlin declined to speculate on a motive. "As soon as I find the killer," he said, "I'll let you know."

Investigators from across the Fairfax department have been drafted to work on the cases, knocking on doors, handing out fliers, tracking down leads. Patrols in the two neighborhoods have been increased, and residents are more cautious, police spokeswoman Mary Ann Jennings said. One resident called police when a plainclothes detective tried to talk to her, Jennings said.

Police have urged residents to report suspicious activity, no matter how small, and the tips have increased exponentially, said the Franconia district commander, Capt. Maggie DeBoard. Officers have also conducted safety checks on dozens of residences at homeowners' request, Jennings said.

CIVIL LAW:

Family Sues U.S. Mint Over Rare Coins (FINDLAW/AP)

By Joann Loviglio, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 7, 2006

(AP) - PHILADELPHIA-A family is suing the U.S. Mint, saying it illegally seized 10 gold coins that are among the rarest and most valuable in the world that the family found among a dead relative's possessions.

The lawsuit, filed Tuesday in U.S. District Court in Philadelphia, accuses the Mint of violating the Constitution and breaking federal forfeiture laws by refusing to return the 1933 "double eagle" coins to the family after it handed the coins over to have their authenticity confirmed.

Plaintiffs Joan S. Langbord and her sons, Roy and David, are seeking the immediate return of the coins, said their attorney, Barry H. Berke.

Defendants named in the suit include the Mint, the Treasury Department, and officials in those agencies.

A Mint spokesman declined to comment, saying that the Mint had not yet been officially served.

Double eagles were first struck in 1850. They are so named because they had a face value of $20, twice the amount of gold coins known as eagles.

The coins, which Mint officials have said are so rare that their value could not be calculated, feature a flying eagle on one side and a figure representing liberty on the other. There were 445,500 minted in 1933, but they were melted down before being released into circulation when President Franklin D. Roosevelt took the country off the gold standard.

A handful escaped, however. Two were deliberately set aside and are at the Smithsonian Institution. The Mint has said any others in existence were obtained illegally, but agreed after a lengthy court battle to allow one of the coins to be sold at auction in 2002 for $7.59 million - the highest price ever paid for a coin - after its owner agreed to split the proceeds with the Mint.

Langbord, who discovered the coins in 2003 in a safe deposit box belonging to her deceased father, longtime Philadelphia jeweler Israel Switt, was aware of that case and contacted the Mint to disclose the coins' existence and "attempt to reach an amicable resolution of any issues that might be raised," the lawsuit states.

She handed the coins over to the Mint to be authenticated, but the Mint refused to give them back, saying they must have been stolen from the Philadelphia Mint in the early 1930s because they had never been in circulation, according to the lawsuit.

Switt, who died in 1990, told Secret Service agents in 1944 that he had possessed and sold nine 1933 double eagles, according to the Mint. All were tracked down by the government and destroyed between 1944 and 1952.

"The Mint's lawless position is that by merely claiming the coins were somehow removed from the Mint unlawfully in the 1930s, they can take the Langbords' property without proving it in a court of law," Berke said.

The coins at the center of the lawsuit were briefly displayed this summer for an American Numismatic Association's convention in Denver. They have been secured at the U.S. Bullion Depository in Fort Knox, Ky.

Bankruptcy Law's 1-Year Report Card (AP)

By Dan Caterinicchia, Ap Business Writer

Filings Down, but Too Soon to Call Year-Old Bankruptcy Act a Success

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Bankruptcy filings have dropped dramatically in the year since a law went into effect aimed at curbing abuse of the system. But it's too soon to gauge the act's effectiveness, the legislation's most ardent supporters said Wednesday at a hearing held to study the law's impact.

About 750,000 personal bankruptcy cases were filed in the month before the law went into effect Oct. 17, 2005, compared to fewer than 500,000 cases in the past 12 months.

Many consumers rushed to file ahead of the new law, which requires a "means test" that determines whether filers qualify to have their debt erased under Chapter 7 or must file for a type of bankruptcy that requires repayment of a percentage of their debt over time.

"Means testing is a workable system," says Clifford J. White III, director of the Justice Department's Executive Office for U.S. Trustees, which has responsibility for the bankruptcy system. But White added that the test's long-term effectiveness is unknown since the number of filings has been so low.

White, who testified before the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on Administrative Oversight and the Courts, also urged the mandating of "smart forms" that would automate most court procedures involved in bankruptcy filings. That could help keep the bankruptcy system efficient if the number of filings increase in the future as trends indicate they will, he said.

Subcommittee Chairman Sen. Jeff Sessions, R-Ala., agreed that it was too early to draw conclusions about the law's success. But he said the drop in overall filings coupled with an increase in the percentage of people seeking Chapter 13 protection, in which a debtor can use future earnings to pay back creditors, appears to show the system works.

From January to September, the personal and business bankruptcies dropped to 443,750 from 1.41 million in the year-ago period, according to data released Tuesday by the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts. Personal filings fell to 429,522 from 1.38 million, while business bankruptcies declined to 14,228 from 26,275 in the same period.

But the subcommittee's incoming chairman, Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., said the bill may not go far enough in distinguishing between people who were financially ruined for legitimate reasons like job loss or the death of a spouse, and those who are "reckless high rollers."

The act should be "targeted at the nation's cheats and not its cheated," he added.

Also under the new law, people seeking bankruptcy protection are required to pay for credit counseling courses, although the courts can waive the fees for low-income debtors.

Bankruptcy lawyers have said their caseloads plummeted after the law went into effect, requiring many to raise their fees, and deride the act for adding unnecessary obstacles for people who legitimately need the protection.

"The law is not squeezing out the supposed legions of abusive filers because they were never there in the first place," Henry Sommer, president of the National Association of Consumer Bankruptcy Attorneys, said in a release. "All these ill-considered law changes are doing is erecting pointless additional hurdles and costs in the way of desperate families who legitimately need the fresh start of bankruptcy."

St. Petersburg (FL) Times, December 7, 2006

ST. PETERSBURG - Federal prosecutors have determined that a Pinellas sheriff's deputy did not violate the civil rights of a St. Petersburg man who was shot and killed in April 2005 during a drug raid.

Jarrell S. Walker, 19, was shot to death by Deputy Christopher Taylor after a SWAT team burst into Walker's home as part of a drug investigation April 12, 2005.

Deputies found drugs and guns in the home. Walker, who was unarmed, was shot twice in the back.

The FBI said in May 2005 that it would investigate whether Walker's civil rights were violated.

DOJ_NMG_0103335

"After careful consideration, we concluded that the evidence does not establish a prosecutable violation of the federal criminal civil rights statutes," said Mark J. Kappelhoff, section chief of the criminal section of the U.S. Department of Justice's Civil Rights Division, in a letter to the Sheriff's Office.

The shooting prompted controversy and criticism from some community leaders, especially in St. Petersburg's African-American community. Walker was black; Taylor is white.

The Pinellas-Pasco State Attorney's Office ruled the shooting justifiable homicide because, it said, Walker was reaching for something under a couch and refused repeated orders to show his hands. A loaded handgun was found nearby.

However, Pinellas-Pasco State Attorney Bernie McCabe noted in a report: "I cannot help but note that this is another relatively young black male who has met his death at the hands of law enforcement in Pinellas County." He urged the Sheriff's Office to review its policy on deadly force.

Sheriff Jim Coats did just that, changing policy to make it more clear when deadly force should be used.

The federal civil rights review came at the request of the St. Petersburg NAACP, whose leadership disagreed with McCabe's decision to clear Taylor of wrongdoing.

"There are many in the community who are not satisfied with what has been done so far," Darryl Rouson, then-president of the NAACP, wrote in a letter to the FBI.

The recent decision, which came without an explanation, doesn't bring closure to the situation, current NAACP president Trenia Cox said.

"I don't have sufficient evidence to support the decision one way or another," Cox said. The shooting "remains an issue that demands more attention."

Cox said her organization will request that the Justice Department explain how it arrived at its conclusion.

Federal civil rights reviews of such incidents are common, though prosecutions are rare. In 2003, there were 1,546 reviews but only 62 prosecutions.

Protesters Decry Police Shootings March Blocks Memorial Drive Near DeKalb Jail (AJC)

By David Simpson, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, December 7, 2006

Vowing to go to jail for their cause, about 50 protestors blocked traffic on Memorial Drive Wednesday in the latest march to draw attention to police shootings in DeKalb County.

Marchers who made the short trek from the county jail complex to nearby I-285, included former DeKalb NAACP president John Evans and state Rep. "Able" Mable Thomas (D-Atlanta).

Some of the marchers said they were willing to be arrested for the cause. No police were on the scene shortly after 11 a.m.

The march is the third of its kind in recent weeks. This year, DeKalb police have been involved in 12 deadly shootings. One officer has been killed.

Some community activists have called for the U.S. Justice Department to investigate. The DeKalb County District Attorneys office has agreed to review all of the shootings.

The marchers walked across the overpass at I-285 and then returned in the westbound lanes of Memorial to the county jail. No arrests were made, and there was no police presence until the marchers continued beyond the jail to the Bobby Burgess Public Safety Building, which until last week housed the police headquarters.

The protest ended shortly after noon.

Waiting For Answers (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, December 7, 2006

I don't know whether the undercover cops who shot and killed Sean Bell and wounded his two friends should be criminally indicted. I wasn't there and not enough information has emerged publicly to make a determination.

What I do know is that the investigation of this shooting in Jamaica, Queens, in which the victims were unarmed and seemed to have no intention of threatening the police, is not being conducted in a timely or effective fashion.

While the local community is seething with anger over the shooting, there are investigators scrambling like mad to find dirt to throw on the victims and locate any evidence that might, however remotely, tend to justify the shooting. But the authorities have not even asked the cops, who fired 50 bullets at the car with the three men inside, what happened. That is insane.

The office of the Queens district attorney, Richard Brown, is leading the investigation into the shooting. For procedural reasons that have to do with concerns about inadvertently conferring some degree of immunity on the officers, the D.A. has asked the Police Department not to interview the officers who shot at the car.

But the D.A.'s office has been moving in super-slow motion on the case, and no one from that office has interviewed the cops, either. Mr. Brown told me yesterday that he has a tremendous amount of additional information to gather before his office attempts to speak to the cops. "I've got no business talking to these cops," he said, "until I know, or am reasonably satisfied, as to what the facts are."

He said he hopes to speak to the officers next week, but he does not know when the matter might be presented to a grand jury. "You never go before a grand jury with a case," said Mr. Brown, "unless you've got all the T's crossed and the I's dotted."

A veteran investigator told me yesterday that there have been several meetings in the D.A.'s office about the Sean Bell case but that Mr. Brown and his top aides are not yet sure how to proceed.

The truth is that neither the Police Department nor the district attorneys in New York are equipped to properly investigate controversial police shootings. The prosecutors and the cops have a special, co-dependent relationship that exists around-the-clock, year-in and year-out. They work together all the time on criminal cases and other matters. They view one another as members of a close-knit criminal justice family. They watch each other's backs.

When cops are involved in shootings that may not seem justified, there is an instinctive institutional response from other cops and prosecutors to close ranks around the accused officers. The instinct is to protect them, not to indict them.

(Tugging against those instincts in this case, as in the Amadou Diallo killing in 1999, is the sensational nature of the shooting and the tremendous public outcry and press coverage it has generated.)

The interests of the larger community can be served only when problematic police shootings are thoroughly and fairly investigated by objective, impartial and independent investigators. The police have shown over many years that they are not up to this important task, and neither are the district attorneys. This is why so few cops have been brought to justice over the years in cases of blatant police misconduct and brutality.

There is an inherent and apparently insurmountable conflict of interest at work when district attorneys investigate cases of alleged police brutality. It's time for New York to face up to this. It's time to establish a truly independent office — perhaps a special state prosecutor, or a permanent, fully staffed independent office at the district attorney's level — to investigate this type of police misconduct.

The victims of unjustifiable police killings are most often (but not always) black, and in most cases they are black men. It's time to recognize that racial stereotyping and race prejudice are still big problems in New York, and that the police often behave differently when confronting people who are black.

A special investigative office, which could look at these incidents and encounters only after the fact, is not enough. There is also a need for Mayor Bloomberg and Police Commissioner Ray Kelly to become proactive, to acknowledge that racism is still an issue in the Police Department and to overhaul police training and address poisonous police attitudes in an effort to prevent these senseless tragedies.

Suit: Anti-Terror Unit Filled With Hate (FINDLAW/AP)

By Larry Neumeister, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 7, 2006

(AP) - NEW YORK-A celebrated police anti-terrorism cyber unit became a beehive of anti-Muslim rhetoric after a city consultant unleashed hundreds of hateful e-mails saying Muslims and Arabs were all potential terrorists, a unit member said in a lawsuit filed Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0103337

The Department of Correction lieutenant, listed as John Doe Anti-Terrorism Officer on the lawsuit in U.S. District Court in Manhattan, said he was subjected to a hostile work environment, great emotional anguish, public humiliation and illegal retaliation.

The Egyptian-born man asked for unspecified damages, saying he had suffered severe emotional distress, mental anguish, depression, physical injuries, illness, loss of pay and benefits and loss of advancement opportunities as a member of the elite anti-terror unit.

The man, described in the lawsuit as "a proud Arab-American, a practicing Muslim and a patriot," blamed the city for failing to respond to his repeated complaints about the contractor, who was alleged to have sent e-mails saying "Burning the hate-filled Koran should be viewed as a public service at the least" and "Without Islam, there wouldn't be any Islamic terror."

He said the hateful rhetoric, unchecked by supervisors, infected the workplace, where other employees felt comfortable making anti-Muslim comments and jokes and where a high-ranking police official thought it was OK to say, "All Arabs are animals."

A city law office spokeswoman, Connie Pankratz, said city attorneys were aware of the case and were reviewing the papers Tuesday.

The police department said it immediately blocked an e-mail account when it became aware of a complaint about the content of e-mail "sent by an individual not employed by the department."

"We took immediate action to block his e-mails, followed by a cease and desist letter to the individual and his employer, a consulting firm," the police department's chief spokesman, Paul Browne, said in a statement.

The lawsuit said the lieutenant was awarded a certificate of outstanding duty in October 2001 for his "heroic efforts following the World Trade Center disaster" and that he played a primary role in launching the cyber unit of the New York Police Department's intelligence division, where he is assigned a top-level security clearance and works undercover to protect his safety.

According to the lawsuit, the lieutenant believed he was living the American dream as he identified terrorist threats to the city two decades after arriving in the United States and more than a decade after gaining citizenship in 1990.

Federal Judge Will Decide Merits Of Osceola Vote Plan (ORS)

By Mark Pino, Sentinel Staff Writer

The Orlando Sentinel, December 7, 2006

A 17-month-long battle over how Osceola elects county commissioners could come to a close in federal court today.

The remaining issue before U.S. District Judge Gregory A. Presnell is whether the county's proposal to create a system of at-large and single-member seats by increasing the size of the board to seven commissioners will pass legal muster.

Presnell issued an injunction halting commission elections in June and ruled in October that the "racially polarized" county's at-large voting system penalizes Hispanics in violation of the Voting Rights Act.

On Wednesday, commissioners voted 4-0 to accept a redistricting plan drafted by the U.S. Department of Justice, rather than a plan drawn up by county experts, after Presnell this week rejected a key part of the county's proposal. Commissioner Paul Owen was absent.

In drawing proposed new district lines, Osceola had used 2005 U.S. Census population estimates and a county database of certificates of occupancy to distribute the approximately 59,000 people who have moved to the county since 2000. Presnell said he was "unconvinced" by the data and ordered the county to submit a plan using 2000 Census figures by Wednesday.

"I'm going to support the resolution" to adopt the Justice Department's plan, Commissioner Tom Franklin said. "But I think we should express our concern that the court did not allow us enough time to seek public input."

The plan adopted Wednesday has district lines that do not require two commissioners to face each other in an upcoming election. As a result, Assistant County Attorney George Nickerson said, the Justice Department will accept staggered elections. In its initial proposal, the agency has wanted all five commission seats on the ballot at the same time.

Nickerson said the map addresses some issues raised at a public hearing last month, when residents complained about putting Poinciana in a district with much of rural Osceola, including Yeehaw Junction and Kenansville. Poinciana will now be in a more geographically compact district.

A new Hispanic majority district centered around Buenaventura Lakes would be an open seat and up for election. Ken Smith, whose term has expired, also would be up for re-election in a newly drawn District 4. Commission Chairman Ken Shipley would represent District 2, including Poinciana, but would not be up for election until 2008.

The judge could impose new districts immediately, mull over what he hears in court or order the parties to craft a new proposal. Either side could appeal, further delaying elections that had been scheduled to fill two commission seats Nov. 7.

Nickerson said the timing of Presnell's latest ruling left commissioners little choice but to pick one of the plans submitted by the Justice Department, which sued last year saying that at-large elections dilute Hispanic voting strength.

However, commissioners told the attorney to argue for a hybrid plan of five single-member districts and two that would be elected countywide.

The county says that allowing residents to vote for three commissioners is better than having them vote for only the one representing their district.

"This solution was tailored for the County by its elected representatives, who understand the existing political system and are in the best position to evaluate the results of the proposed changes," said the county's filing.

Man Indicted In Texas In Federal Phone Fund Fraud Case (AP)

AP, December 7, 2006

A contractor was indicted in Texas on Wednesday and charged with defrauding a federal program that provides computers and Internet access to economically disadvantaged schools and libraries.

A federal grand jury in McAllen, Texas, returned a nine-count indictment alleging that the former president and owner of ATE Tel Solutions Inc. — Rafael G. Adame — committed wire fraud, according to the Justice Department.

The E-Rate program is funded by telephone customers through a special fee included in their bills. The indictment alleges Adame submitted fraudulent charges on behalf of his company to the program's administrator, collecting $141,273 in payments.

The Justice Department said that including Wednesday's filing, 14 individuals and 12 companies have been charged as part of an ongoing investigation into the program. Thus far, defendants have agreed to pay fines and restitution totaling more than $40 million.

The indictment alleges Adame, by making false representations on invoices filed with the E-Rate administrator, received payments in excess of what was authorized and for work that was not performed.

U.S. Criminal Probe Rattles $2 Trillion Municipal Bond Market (BLOOM)

By William Selway And Martin Z. Braun

Bloomberg, December 7, 2006

Dec. 7 (Bloomberg) -- The first-ever antitrust probe of the municipal bond market is roiling an industry that states and cities depend on to finance everything from garbage trucks to schools.

U.S. Justice Department prosecutors subpoenaed more than a dozen banks and insurers three weeks ago, seizing documents from three brokers in a search for evidence of bid rigging. Lawyers say it's the biggest criminal investigation of the almost 200- year-old market, where municipalities have more than $2 trillion of debt outstanding.

``You don't want to have something like this going on," said Robert Doty, a Sacramento, California-based adviser with American Governmental Financial Services Co., who is the vice chairman of the National Association of Independent Public Finance Advisors. ``It's just bad for the reputation of the market."

JPMorgan Chase & Co., the third-largest bank in the U.S., American International Group Inc., the world's largest insurance company, and Financial Security Assurance Holdings Ltd., a unit of Brussels-based financial services company Dexia SA, are among the companies that received subpoenas. JPMorgan declined to comment. AIG and Financial Security spokespeople said the companies are cooperating with the probe.

The investigation stems from an Internal Revenue Service review that found scores of municipal bond deals robbed federal taxpayers of more than $100 million. Banks and other financial firms arranged to sell guaranteed investment contracts in a way that increased their fees at the expense of the U.S. government, said Charlie Anderson, manager of field operations for the IRS's tax-exempt bond division.

Courtesy Bids

The IRS in 2005 told Atlanta officials that the city may have overpaid for a $453 million guaranteed investment contract from Bank of America Corp. The IRS asked whether banks arranged to submit ``courtesy losing bids'' at an auction held to win the city's investment business, according to a Feb. 5, 2005 letter obtained by Bloomberg News. The contract was for money raised by a 1999 water and sewer bond.

Bank of America spokeswoman Shirley Norton declined to comment.

Amelia Bond, who ended her one-year term in October as chairman of the Municipal Securities Rulemaking Board, a self-regulatory body based in Alexandria, Virginia, said in a speech to the Bond Market Association in May that the IRS probe has left the industry ``vulnerable.''

``Any time the IRS is involved you worry about the integrity of the marketplace,'' Bond said. ``It sounds like they're finding something.'' The Justice Department opened its criminal investigation six months later. The Securities and Exchange Commission also joined the probe.

Unprecedented

C. Willis Ritter, a Washington-based bond attorney for Ungaretti & Harris who has worked in the industry for 35 years, said in a Nov. 16 interview that the probe marked ``the first time I have ever seen the antitrust division of the DOJ get involved in public finance.''

State and local governments in 2005 sold a record $408 billion of long-term debt in more than 13,000 separate offerings, according to Thomson Financial. The bonds raise money for roads, hospitals and sewage plants, attracting investors by providing income exempt from taxes.

Prosecutors are trying to determine whether banks and brokers conspired to fix prices on so-called GICs, which municipalities buy with bond proceeds that aren't spent immediately.

Back to 1992

The Justice Department asked for information from as far back as 1992, including files on guaranteed investment contracts and other financial products, such as derivatives. A derivative is a financial contract whose value is derived from tradable securities or linked to events such as interest-rate changes.

Investigators also subpoenaed three firms that advise local governments on derivatives and evaluate bids for guaranteed investment contracts: Beverly Hills, California-based CDR Financial Products Inc., Pottstown, Pennsylvania-based Investment Management Advisory Group Inc. and Sound Capital Management of Eden Prairie, Minnesota.

All three said in statements that they are cooperating with the investigation and defended their work.

The municipal finance industry was rocked by scandals in the 1990s, including a probe of influence peddling concerning so- called pay to play, in which banks gave public officials campaign contributions to win no-bid contracts. There was also the controversy over yield burning, in which banks and brokers overcharged local governments for Treasury bond investments.

Out of View

Local governments are required to solicit bids for guaranteed investment contracts. They rely on brokers such as CDR, which deal with the banks and provide documents certifying that the bidding is fair. States and cities only use competitive bidding for bond sales 20 percent of the time, down from 74 percent three decades ago.

``The way that these folks have operated, largely by telephone and largely out of public view, are not as transparent as they might be,'' said Patrick Born, chief financial officer of Minneapolis and the head of the debt committee of the Chicago- based Government Finance Officers Association. ``And it's certainly possible that when you don't have transparency you can have abuses."

Anderson of the IRS says regulators ``think we have evidence of bid rigging." Local governments are required to pay as taxes any profits they get by borrowing at low tax-exempt rates and investing in higher-yielding securities.

`Sweetheart Deal'

The IRS probe shows that investment contracts were sold at below market rates, Anderson said. That meant lower returns for municipalities and less tax revenue for the IRS, he said.

``People were winning GICs at below fair market values and there were obviously deliberate losing bids by the losing bidders, thereby allowing the winner to win a sweetheart deal," said the IRS's Anderson.

The IRS is concerned that unfair bidding deprived the Treasury of money, much like the so-called yield burning scandals of the 1990s, when Wall Street banks raised the price on Treasury bonds sold to local governments, driving down the yield, to get around restrictions on how much they could earn. Wall Street banks paid more than $170 million to end the Securities and Exchange Commission's investigation of that practice.

More Scrutiny

Carol Lew, the president of the National Association of Bond Lawyers in Chicago, said the investigation of GICs will place the firms that work on those transactions under heightened scrutiny by their government clients, who may choose to avoid the contracts.

``The allegations may cause issuers to examine and question whether a guaranteed investment contract is the best investment for them," Lew said.

Roger Davis, a partner in the San Francisco office of Orrick, Herrington & Sutcliffe's public finance office, said the probe may end wrongdoing. He said his firm represents more than one client in the investigation, declining to provide names.

``I think this could be good for the industry," Davis said. ``It's pretty clear the IRS has found some questionable behavior. Sometimes you have to flush it out, get rid of it and move on."

Muni Probe: It's Deja Vu Again (WSJ)

By MICHAEL HUDSON And KAREN RICHARDSON

Wall Street Journal, December 7, 2006

U.S. Inquiry Suggests Return Of '90s Excesses in the Market; 'A Lot of Bad Deals out There'

Federal regulators tried to clean up corruption in the municipal-bond market in the 1990s.

But with the muni market caught in a new, wide-ranging investigation, it looks like little has changed.

In recent weeks, the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission have issued subpoenas to Wall Street firms seeking information on an array of muni-market investment products, according to people close to the banks. In November, the Federal Bureau of Investigation raided offices of some firms that act as go-betweens for municipalities and the banks. The Justice Department acknowledged it was investigating "anticompetitive practices" in the industry. And the Internal Revenue Service is examining whether consultants and underwriters have used financial sleight of hand to evade federal taxes.

"There's a lot of bad deals out there -- and the industry is very blasé," said Charles Anderson, field manager of the IRS's municipal-bond unit, in an interview.

In the 1990s, authorities uncovered cases of bribery, kickbacks and bid-rigging. In one memorable 1993 case, a former "first husband" of Kentucky, Bill Collins, went to prison for gifts received from firms that did bond business with the state while his wife was governor. Among the sweeteners: a $35,000 grand piano he presented to his wife.

Arthur Levitt vowed to clean up "backroom deals" after becoming SEC chairman that year. Regulators passed rules discouraging Wall Street firms from using political contributions to win bond underwriting business, a practice known in the industry as "pay to play."

The IRS's Mr. Anderson said that many muni deals are "plain vanilla" and aboveboard. But Mr. Anderson, who is retiring next month, said the use of derivatives and other complex financial products makes it harder for regulators to catch questionable behavior.

Tax-exempt municipal bonds bankroll everything from sewer projects to school expansions to sports stadiums. Last year, cities, states and other public entities issued $406 billion in muni bonds, according to Thomson Financial.

At this point, it seems unlikely that Wall Street's run of profits will be touched by the probes. Municipal-bond underwriting is not a big contributor to the bottom line of most big financial firms.

In the '90s, the SEC and IRS also cracked down on a tactic known as yield burning, which involved sidestepping federal taxes by hiding returns that municipalities earn when they reinvest bond proceeds. In 2000, 17 Wall Street firms -- including Salomon Smith Barney Inc., PaineWebber Inc. and Goldman, Sachs & Co. -- agreed to pay nearly $140 million to resolve government allegations that they perpetuated the practice.

Some of the same issues are coming up again.

The Justice Department has issued subpoenas to most of the big investment banks on Wall Street, according to several people close to the banks. The top underwriters of municipal bonds over the past 15 years include Bank of America Corp., Bear Stearns Cos., Citigroup Inc., Goldman Sachs Group Inc., J.P. Morgan Chase & Co., Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc., Merrill Lynch & Co., Morgan Stanley and UBS AG. All declined to comment officially, but several people close to the banks said that most or all of the firms had received subpoenas in recent weeks.

"The whole system needs to be revamped," said Mark Schwartz, a former investment banker who is now a critic of the muni business.

Some people familiar with the probes cautioned that hard details about the nature of the latest investigations are hard to come by. One person close to a big Wall Street bank said the probes "could take several years."

"If regulators see a need to investigate, they should do so, and they should do so thoroughly," said Micah Green, co-chief executive of the Securities Industry and Financial Markets Association, which represents bond firms and other Wall Street companies.

Investigators are believed to be looking at whether some consulting firms handled bids on bond-deal contracts improperly. Authorities also are trying to determine whether underwriting and consulting firms used interest-rate swaps and other complex financial structures to veil excess returns.

The latest probes are partly an outgrowth of IRS inquiries. Mr. Anderson estimates that in the past six years, muni-bond issuers have had to refund or redeem $30 billion in bonds -- either buying them back from investors or swapping them for new ones -- amid IRS audits.

The IRS is concerned about the way consultants and underwriters invest bond-issue proceeds. There's often a lag between the time cash comes in from a bond and the time a project is launched. Municipalities may invest the cash during the lag. They aren't allowed to seek big returns from those investments, because they have a financial advantage, thanks to the bonds' tax-exempt status. When they earn more than the interest they're paying to investors on the bonds themselves, they generally have to turn the excess over to the IRS.

In Fargo, N.D., the IRS focused on whether a derivative product used in a water-bond deal helped hide taxable gains. In November, the city settled and agreed to redeem $28 million in bonds outstanding.

The IRS stiffened rules in the '90s to combat muni tax chiseling. The Municipal Securities Rulemaking Board, or MSRB, an industry regulatory body overseen by the SEC, passed rules aimed at attacking other muni-industry concerns. But the MSRB's overhauls were only partial. It doesn't oversee how municipalities reinvest money after it's raised. And it doesn't police the use of derivatives, such as interest-rate swaps, which allow parties to trade exposure between fixed and floating interest rates.

"You have a regulated area side by side with an essentially unregulated area," said Christopher Taylor, the MSRB's longtime executive director. "When you regulate one place and not the other, funny things usually evolve."

Criminal prosecutors in Philadelphia and Illinois have pursued corruption cases recently against public officials and bankers. Last year, two former J.P. Morgan Chase bankers pleaded guilty to trying to boost their firm's bond business by directing payoffs to a fund-raiser for Philadelphia Mayor John Street. A former city treasurer also pleaded guilty in the case. The fund-raiser was charged with fraud and other crimes, but died soon after. Mr. Street hasn't been accused of wrongdoing.

Also in 2005, a federal grand jury in Chicago indicted a former Bear Stearns executive on charges he used fraud and extortion in an effort to secure financing work for Bear Stearns on a hospital expansion.

DOJ_NMG_0103342

Bear Stearns has disclosed in securities filings that the SEC, Justice Department and Illinois authorities have sought information about the company's Chicago muni business. It says it is cooperating and remains confident in the integrity of its business.

Delta's Pilots Chief Opposes Merger, Says Deal Would Mean Job Cuts (USAT)

By Marilyn Adams, Usa Today

USA Today, December 7, 2006

On a day of escalating rhetoric from two airlines, the chief of Delta Air Lines' (DALRQ) pilots union warned Wednesday that a merger with US Airways (LCC) would leave "thousands" of Delta employees jobless.

The remarks by Lee Moak, chairman of Delta's Air Line Pilots Association, came as US Airways CEO Douglas Parker pressed for access to Delta's books to move ahead on his company's bid to acquire Delta out of Chapter 11 bankruptcy.

US Airways has made a hostile takeover offer of $8.5 billion in cash and stock for Delta, the USA's third-biggest airline, which is in Chapter 11. US Airways says a merger would make both airlines stronger and more competitive in the USA and abroad. It would be the world's biggest airline.

Executives at Delta have rebuffed the offer, saying that it's too risky and that Delta is better off alone.

Moak's warning of job losses contrasts with US Airways' public promises not to lay off any employees or halt air service to any cities if the two airlines merge. Because both US Airways and Delta operate a shuttle service serving Washington, New York and Boston, Parker has said one of the shuttles would have to be sold to avoid federal antitrust violations.

In an interview, Moak said the union's analysis of US Airways' offer finds "at least 1,000 Delta pilots and several thousand other Delta employees would be terminated" as a result.

Only Delta's pilots are unionized. That union is one of Delta's largest unsecured creditors and is represented on the creditors' committee. Other Delta workers, such as flight attendants, mechanics and reservations agents, are not unionized and have no contract protections.

Although Delta has not filed its own post-bankruptcy business plan that creditors can compare with the merger offer, Moak said he supports Delta's intention to stay independent.

Delta plans to unveil its business plan late this month.

"I know for a fact that our stand-alone plan will not result in furloughs or terminations of employees," he said.

Parker released his own statement Wednesday, pressing Delta to open its books to US Airways. Parker said in the release that Delta's directors and creditors must begin due diligence "to satisfy their respective fiduciary obligations" to fully review US Airways' proposal.

"Only then can they be in a position to truly assess this opportunity," Parker said.

"We are absolutely determined to take necessary steps to move the process forward."

In an interview published Wednesday in The Washington Post, Delta CEO Gerald Grinstein, who adamantly opposes the deal, said the merger would hurt consumers by reducing competition, raising fares and diminishing service to small cities.

US Airways Firm About Delta Offer CEO Clarifies Remarks (AJC)

By Dave Hirschman, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, December 7, 2006

US Airways called for Delta Air Lines' directors and creditors to "fully and fairly" evaluate its $8.6 billion takeover bid and reiterated Wednesday its commitment to pursue the controversial deal.

Some airline analysts had concluded the acquisition was falling apart when US Airways CEO Doug Parker was quoted in USA Today on Wednesday morning saying his carrier would abandon the hostile takeover if Delta wasn't convinced of its benefits. Parker's comments were made during a Tuesday meeting with the newspaper's editors and reporters.

"We have to get to a point where all are working together on this or it's not going to happen," Parker said in USA Today. "This is all about convincing Delta's management that this plan makes sense."

DOJ_NMG_0103343

On Wednesday afternoon, however, Parker issued a written statement proclaiming US Airways is "fully committed" to purchasing Delta and calling for the Atlanta-based airline's board and creditors to move to a detailed study of a combined operation.

Parker didn't deny telling USA Today that US Airways would only pursue a consensual deal. But a US Airways spokeswoman said Parker's written statement was meant to clear up "misperceptions the article may have caused."

Also Wednesday, Delta pilot union leaders met outside US Airways' vacant former headquarters in Arlington, Va., to emphasize the job losses they say would hit Atlanta if Delta is sold. US Airways abandoned the office building when it was purchased by American West, which adopted the US Airways brand.

"I want them to understand exactly what a hostile takeover means — and they get it," said Capt. Lee Moak, head of the Air Line Pilots Association at Delta. "It's bad for employees, communities and customers. It's only good for corporate raiders — and they're not going to succeed here."

US Airways estimates merging with Delta will save $1.65 billion a year and cut overlapping routes. But Moak disputed that figure and said Justice Department regulators are almost sure to reject any Delta/US Airways merger.

"[US Airways] glossed over the Delta pilot contract which prohibits many of the synergies they think they'll get," Moak said. "Our contract alone will kill this merger. This merger will not succeed."

Moak said pilots met late Wednesday with lawmakers in Washington to drum up opposition to a Delta sale.

Robert Mann, an airline analyst, said Parker's published comments about winning Delta approval were probably meant to ease fears among Delta employees.

"It makes it a lot easier to put employee groups together if a deal is consensual," Mann said. "He feels like he's got the best plan, and in Chapter 11 the best economic plan wins at the end of the day."

Adam Pilarski, airline analyst at Avitas, said he first interpreted Parker's comments as a sign he was abandoning a takeover attempt.

"I couldn't figure it out," Pilarski said. "It sounded like an admission of defeat, that he was giving up. Maybe he was extending the olive branch to labor, but the whole thing was very strange."

Parker's statement Wednesday afternoon was meant to dispel such notions.

"We believe that the next steps, in order for Delta's board of directors and creditors committee to satisfy their respective fiduciary obligations to fully and fairly evaluate the potential benefits of our proposal, is to begin the due diligence process," Parker said. "We are absolutely determined to take the necessary steps to move the process forward."

Chronicle, MediaNews Plan Ad Sales, Distribution Sharing Deal

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) -- MediaNews Group Inc. and the San Francisco Chronicle plan to consolidate some of the business operations of their Bay Area newspapers, but will refrain from doing so pending the outcome of a federal antitrust trial challenging the deal, both companies said Wednesday.

Last week, U.S. District Judge Susan Illston tentatively blocked MediaNews and the Chronicle's owner, Hearst Corp., from merging local distribution and national ad sales. Illston said such a deal could pave the way for "price manipulation" and make it harder for new competitors to enter the market.

New York-based Hearst Corp. has invested $300 million in a complex deal that gives MediaNews three more Bay Area newspapers -- on top of the seven it already owns, including the Oakland Tribune. Hearst's investment helped Denver-based MediaNews finance the purchase of Hearst rivals Contra Costa Times, the San Jose Mercury News and Monterey County Herald earlier this year.

In issuing the temporary restraining order against the alliance, Illston said she had been under the impression that Hearst's investment was solely an equity stake, but an April 26 memo had surfaced suggesting it actually was a bid to merge operations.

Illston's comments bolstered San Francisco businessman Clint Reilly's federal antitrust claims against the publishers.

In court briefs and in interviews Wednesday, the publishers said they planned to move forward with the consolidation by winning the right to do so at trial by proving the plan is not anticompetitive. Executives have said the two companies had not engaged in any discussions to merge operations since the letter was written.

"Riley's allegations are hyperbole and don't have any substance," Hearst attorney Daniel Wall said in an interview. "We do intend to prove, at trial, that nothing we contemplated would be unlawful."

Joseph Alioto Jr., Riley's attorney, said the publishers "have no chance" of pulling that off.

"It's a price-fixing agreement. They're gonna fix the prices of advertising," he said. "This is first-year law school stuff."

The publishers said in the court briefs that advertisers and even readers have other venues besides newspapers.

"A newspaper-only market with a Bay Area-wide scope is not a realistic market here," they said. "No significant group of advertisers faces that market, and in the day of the Internet, it is plain that readers do not either."

MediaNews and Hearst are combining efforts in other ways, which Illston has not blocked. Two weeks ago, they joined forces with more than 150 dailies in 38 states in a bid to generate more online advertising revenue by working with Yahoo Inc., the Internet's most trafficked site.

Sacramento-based McClatchy Co. got the papers targeted in Reilly's suit as part of its $4 billion acquisition of San Jose-based Knight Ridder Inc., a takeover that included $2 billion in debt assumption. McClatchy then struck deals to sell 12 of Knight Ridder's former 32 daily papers, including some to MediaNews.

The case is Reilly v. MediaNews Group, 06-4332.

Mexico's Newest TV Drama Is A Bid To Block A Third Broadcaster (NYT)

By Elisabeth Malkin

The New York Times, December 7, 2006

MEXICO CITY, Dec. 5 — Night after night for almost two weeks, Mexican television news has shown exposés on how poor people suffer from the high cost of medicines.

The images of the ill and dying have been heart-wrenching. Legislators lament the lack of regulation. Corner pharmacies barely fend off failure. The new health minister concedes that high prices are a problem.

It may be merely a coincidence that Mexico's two competing television companies, Televisa and TV Azteca, have each chosen to focus on this particular social problem at the same time.

Their separate reporting comes to exactly the same conclusion. The culprits who drive the prices so high are two pharmaceutical distributors who together control 70 percent of the market. And both news teams single out the same one for particular opprobrium: Grupo Casa Saba, a $2 billion company controlled by the reclusive octogenarian billionaire Isaac Saba Raffoul.

What neither Televisa nor TV Azteca mentions is that Mr. Saba has his eye on another business: television.

Mr. Saba is the Mexican partner of Telemundo, the NBC Universal unit that is the No. 2 Spanish-language television broadcaster in the United States. In September, Telemundo and another company Mr. Saba owns, Grupo Xtra, formally requested a license for a broadcast television network.

Both Televisa and TV Azteca say that their coverage is driven only by news judgment. "The high cost of medicines in a poor country with great health needs is a real issue, and it is not related to Saba and his other businesses," said Manuel Compean, a spokesman for Televisa.

Jorge Sanchez, a spokesman for Casa Saba, denied any accusations of price-gouging and pointed to profit margins of less than 10 percent on the company's balance sheet.

Within weeks, the license request set off a nasty dispute between Telemundo and TV Azteca, leading to lawsuits and countersuits. Last week, Telemundo asked the Federal Communications Commission in the United States to deny the renewal of the broadcasting license to KAZA, the Los Angeles affiliate of Azteca's growing network based in the United States. The dispute comes just as Felipe Calderón takes office as president. Mr. Calderón, who campaigned on a promise to increase competition, has said that Mexico should have a third broadcast company.

The decision over whether to authorize a new network, which would be awarded by public auction, could prove to be the new government's first big test when it comes to taking on powerful business interests.

Many parts of Mexico's economy are controlled by just one or a few companies that have succeeded in keeping out competition.

Televisa and TV Azteca control almost the entire broadcast television industry in Mexico, although Televisa is much larger, with about 75 percent of the advertising market. Last April, they won passage of a law that critics say gives them free space on the broadcast spectrum.

That law created a public uproar that has heightened pressure for more competition. "There has to be at least one more open television channel," said Mexico's top antitrust regulator, Eduardo Pérez Motta, in an interview. Last week, he called on the government to auction off more spectrum quickly.

But both Televisa and TV Azteca declare that they are ready and willing to compete. "Televisa has competed historically and competes every day in all of its businesses," Mr. Compean of Televisa said.

For Telemundo, the effort to gain a distribution platform for its programming is simply a question of equality. Televisa, the world's largest Spanish-language media company, distributes its popular telenovelas and reality shows through a licensing agreement with Univision, the top Spanish-language network in the United States.

TV Azteca is creating its own American network through agreements with stations in cities with large Spanish-speaking populations.

"The point is pretty basic," said Donald Browne, Telemundo's president. "We want to do the same thing in Mexico that Televisa and TV Azteca do in the United States. They are able to distribute in the United States, and we would like to have an opportunity to distribute our own product."

He added, "We're looking for just a reasonable playing field — not even even — just to be able to show our product in Mexico."

The bad blood between Telemundo and TV Azteca particularly goes back more than a dozen years, when NBC first tried to enter the Mexican market. A deal with TV Azteca that would have allowed NBC to take a small stake in the company fell through after TV Azteca backed out, arguing that NBC did not hold up its side of the deal to provide programming and technical assistance.

A dozen years later, the dispute is even more bitter. After Telemundo hired a well-known producer, Alan Tacher, for its talent show "Quinceañera," in which 14- and 15-year-old girls live together as they study with voice and dance coaches, TV Azteca argued that it had an exclusive contract with him.

Azteca won an injunction from a Mexican judge to stop production, and Azteca lawyers accompanied the police on a raid on the studio where Telemundo was filming one of the final episodes. The production was eventually moved to Miami.

The raid is one of the main arguments in NBC's filing last week with the F.C.C. It accuses TV Azteca of strong-arm tactics against Telemundo's operations in Mexico to prevent it from "competing lawfully against TV Azteca in its own country."

The filing also raises the long-running fraud case against TV Azteca's controlling shareholder, Ricardo Salinas Pliego, filed by the Securities and Exchange Commission in January 2005. Mr. Salinas Pliego first delisted TV Azteca's shares from the New York Stock Exchange and settled with the S.E.C. last September, paying a fine of $7.5 million.

Rick Cotton, NBC Universal's general counsel, said, "If participation in the Mexican marketplace is foreclosed by the actions of TV Azteca in particular, then participation by TV Azteca in the U.S. marketplace needs to be re-examined by U.S. regulatory authorities."

TV Azteca saw the NBC filing as a direct attack. "We are outraged," Azteca America's chairman, Luis J. Echarte, said in an e-mail message. "The filing has no legal fundamentals and is clearly a media ploy that attempts to damage the reputation of TV Azteca and its subsidiaries in the U.S., and put pressure on the Mexican government into auctioning new television licenses."

The networks, meanwhile, can point to one accomplishment with their series on drug prices. Mexico's antitrust commission plans to begin an investigation into the market for distributing pharmaceuticals.

Mr. Perez-Motta, the antitrust official, said: "There's nothing strange about responding to media pressure." <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

Japan Tobacco In Talks With Gallaher (FT)

By Lina Saigol And Jenny Wiggins In London

Financial Times, December 7, 2006

Japan Tobacco, the world's third-biggest tobacco company, has made a takeover approach for Gallaher, the UK group that owns the Benson & Hedges and Silk Cut brands.

The approach is expected to trigger a counterbid for Gallaher, which has a market value of £6.4bn ($12.6bn).

Philip Morris is the most likely suitor. BAT and Imperial Tobacco might also be interested but they would face heavy competition issues.

People familiar with the situation said on Wednesday night the talks were at a preliminary stage. The two companies have had one discussion.

Gallaher has been the subject of persistent takeover speculation in recent weeks. The UK company's shares have risen strongly over the past two months, gaining 13 per cent to close on Wednesday at 979p.

On Thursday, shares of Japan Tobacco surged 5.5 per cent to Y533,000 in midday trading in Tokyo.

Gallaher said on Wednesday night it had received an approach but declined to name the company involved. It said there was no certainty an offer would be made.

Japan Tobacco, which also owns food and pharmaceutical businesses, controls about 70 per cent of the Japanese tobacco market. A former state-owned monopoly, it sells the Camel and Winston brands outside the US. Japan Tobacco's international tobacco business is stronger than its domestic operations.

International sales rose 12.2 per cent in the six months to the end of September, helped by the growth of Camel in Italy and France, and Winston in Russia, Italy and Spain. Domestic sales fell 8.3 per cent, partly due to higher retail prices.

Gallaher, by comparison, has been struggling with a long-term decline in cigarette volumes in western Europe. Its four core markets of the UK, the Republic of Ireland, Sweden and Austria account for about 70 per cent of group profits.

It has also been suffering from price wars, especially in Spain, as well as from higher taxes and from smoking bans in several countries. Gallaher has estimated that a UK smoking ban in pubs would lead to a 4-5 per cent decline in smoking volumes.

Sales have been stronger in the Commonwealth of Independent States, which includes Russia and Ukraine, but these markets are relatively small for Gallaher.

In September, Gallaher reported a 15 per cent increase in pre-tax profits for the six months to June 30 of £259m, helped by a £23m drop in restructuring costs year-on-year.

News Corp. Is Poised To Regain Liberty's Stake (WSJ)

By Julia Angwin

The Wall Street Journal, December 7, 2006

A two-year standoff between News Corp. and its second-biggest shareholder, Liberty Media Corp., is nearing an end in a deal that will return Liberty to a powerful position in the media sector and solidify News Corp. Chairman Rupert Murdoch's control of his company, say people close to the situation.

Under an agreement, which could be finalized in the next few weeks, News Corp. will buy Liberty's $11 billion stake in the media giant in exchange for News Corp's 38.6% stake in satellite-TV firm DirecTV Group Inc., some cash and some smaller News Corp. assets.

While the two sides have been discussing a deal along these lines for several months, significant progress has been made this week, according to people close to the situation.

The biggest bone of contention has been the soaring stock price of DirecTV, which has risen more than 20% to above $23 since news of the talks broke in mid-September. That values News Corp.'s stake in DirecTV at $10.9 billion -- roughly the same value as Liberty's stake in News Corp. Shares of DirecTV rose 38 cents, or 1.6%, to $23.53 in 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange. News Corp. shares fell 23 cents, or 1.1%, to $21.74, also on the NYSE.

But while the two shareholdings are now roughly equal in price, Liberty executives believe the DirecTV stock was inflated by deal speculation, a point Liberty Chief Executive Greg Maffei made to investors at a media conference yesterday. By adding some cash and other assets to the swap, News Corp. will reduce the effective price it is getting for its DirecTV shares.

The main reason to add the assets, however, is to ensure the deal is tax-free for Liberty. Mr. Maffei estimated Liberty would save billions of dollars in taxes on the cash-and-asset swap.

Relations between Mr. Murdoch and Liberty Media Chairman John Malone, once allies, have been tense since Liberty accumulated a 19% voting interest in News Corp. two years ago. The move appeared to threaten Mr. Murdoch's control of the media conglomerate, which he exercised through a roughly 30% voting stake held by his family. At the time, News Corp. adopted a poison-pill takeover-defense plan to stop Liberty buying any additional stock.

Until this incident, Mr. Malone, 65 years old, and Mr. Murdoch, 75, enjoyed a close relationship going back decades, working together on several business ventures. Liberty originally accumulated some of its stake through transactions with News Corp. But those shares were nonvoting. Mr. Malone didn't alert Mr. Murdoch before he did the deals that gave Liberty a big voting stake.Buying Liberty's stake will effectively eliminate the voting power of its shares, raising the voting stake of remaining shareholders. The Murdoch family's voting interest will rise to closer to 40% after the deal, says a person familiar with the matter.

Liberty would get effective control of DirecTV, making Mr. Malone a formidable player in media for the first time since he sold cable-TV giant Tele-Communications Inc. in 1999. Liberty's Mr. Maffei said yesterday that Liberty could use DirecTV to protect its content assets, which include interests in cable channels such as QVC and Discovery.

"Since the sale of TCI, we tried to protect those assets as much as possible. DirecTV could help in that process. Those are reasons we would at least think about DirecTV as a useful exchange," Mr. Maffei said.

Selling the DirecTV stake would be a turnabout for Mr. Murdoch, who spent years pursuing control of the satellite-TV firm. But in the past year or so, DirecTV's subscriber growth has slowed markedly, as competition from cable operators has intensified. Cable companies are benefiting from their ability to offer a bundle of telephone, high-speed Internet and video. Satellite can't easily offer high-speed Internet.

Despite concerns about prospects for the satellite industry, Mr. Maffei said satellite "has unparalleled video assets," including the "unique capability to be a national asset." Satellite firms broadcast nationally whereas cable TV operators and phone companies -- beginning to offer TV service -- operate along regional lines.

Mr. Maffei noted that 39% wouldn't give Liberty "hard control" of the company but it would have a "voice" and "several board seats." And he noted that Liberty has "a lot of respect" for DirecTV's management team, which is led by Chase Carey, a former News Corp. executive.

There's Nothing Wrong With Sharing (WSJ)

By Josh Lerner

The Wall Street Journal, December 7, 2006

Some 53 years ago, Judge Harold Medina dismissed charges brought by the Justice Department against 17 leading investment banks. A case built up over a decade of investigations and almost three years of trial collapsed when the government was unable to show that the industry's collaborative practices constituted an anti-competitive conspiracy. The judge observed that activities that the government depicted as nefarious were "nothing more nor less than a gradual, natural and normal growth or evolution by which an ancient form has been adapted to the needs of those engaged in raising capital."

Now the trust-busters have again launched an inquiry into collusion in financial services, this time focusing on private equity firms such as Kohlberg, Kravis & Roberts. Nor is this just an American phenomenon: Citing many of the same concerns, Britain's Financial Services Authority last month announced that it was increasing its scrutiny of private equity firms. The concern this time involves teaming up to bid in auctions of firms going private rather than jointly underwriting public corporate offerings. But it is hard not to feel that history is repeating itself. For not only is this investigation sure to fatten the profit pools of dozens of securities law firms, but the fundamental errors that Judge Medina flagged half a century ago seem destined to be repeated.

DOJ_NMG_0103348

Far from being a static industry with ossified giants, private equity features brutal competition and enormous dynamism. Groups that were dominant just a few years ago, such as Hicks, Muse, Tate & Furst and Forstmann, Little & Co., have dramatically downsized or announced their intention to cease operations after experiencing investment missteps and succession problems. Meanwhile, new organizations have amassed enormous sums of capital in short periods. For instance, one of the Justice Department's targets, Silver Lake Partners, was only established in 1999. Since then, it has raised $6 billion in equity, and in light of its great success, is now raising a larger fund. Even a quick glance at the annual market shares of private equity groups reveals wild fluctuations. As Judge Medina stated when reviewing the changing rankings of underwriters, "the only pattern is no pattern."

Thus, the reality of the market seems dramatically different from the typical setting where "trust-busters" are mandated to work. Moreover, the behavior in the Justice Department's cross-hairs -- deal sharing -- is an important aspect of this competition that benefits all of us.

To understand the benefits of deal sharing, it is helpful to look at private equity's older sibling, venture capital. Syndication has been the norm here for many decades. The impact of syndication in venture capital has been extensively studied; from these works, several clear conclusions emerge.

First, deal sharing helps investors make better investment decisions. Potential investors in young or restructuring firms face frequently a mass of confusing, even contradictory, information. Syndication allows venture investors to get a valuable "second opinion" about potential additions to their portfolio. Second, it helps managements. Venture and buyout investors work closely with the managers of the companies in which they invest. Syndication frequently results in representatives of two or more venture funds serving on boards. Frequently, these individuals have complementary skills, such as knowledge of the underlying technology and the market. Finally, deal sharing helps limit risk. Private placement memoranda limit the amount of capital that funds can put into any one deal. Syndication allows venture groups to undertake transactions that otherwise they would need to pass on, due to concerns about lack of diversification.

There are undoubtedly costs of syndication. When venture groups team up, it "softens the competition." In many technologies and regions, there are only a handful of leading groups. When two work together, the valuation at which the company will be financed may fall. But on the basis of the extensive evidence, the benefits to society from widespread venture syndication appear to substantially outweigh the costs.

The venture capital experience suggests that "clubbing" will have many benefits to the private equity groups themselves and to society as a whole, and that to proscribe it based on fears of anticompetitive consequences would be a substantial mistake. Of course, if firms have been engaging in rank price fixing or market division, then the Justice Department has every reason to swat the private equity firms just like any businesses that seek to evade true competition. The worry, though, is that the antitrust enforcers will again mistake competition for collusion because they don't understand the complexities and nuances of this business.

Unfortunately, the history of antitrust enforcement is littered with examples of government actions that, however well-intentioned, blocked firms for many years from taking actions that would have benefited both them and society as a whole. For instance, U.S. high-tech companies shied away from pooling the patents needed to promote new standards until late 1990s, out of fear that they would run afoul of the "nine no-nos" a deputy assistant attorney general had promulgated in 1970.

Even if the antitrust threat dissipates, there is a broader lesson here. When one considers private equity's substantial successes in this decade, it is clear that the industry thrives on its extraordinary flexibility and ability to take risks. The recent actions of private equity groups that are likely to have the broadest societal impact were initially fraught with challenges. Many private equity groups had failed in earlier efforts to internationalize, but funds have recently enjoyed great success in Europe and Asia. Similarly, buyouts of high-technology firms were supposed to be too risky, yet recent transactions in the disk drive, storage and semiconductor industries have proved the received wisdom false.

Private equity is a dynamic industry, at whose heart is taking calculated risks based on limited information. Washington must understand that the many benefits private equity provides by facilitating economic growth are unlikely to be sustained if the heavy hand of government intrudes, whether through litigation or regulation.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Jeffco Told To Continue Greenways Program (BN)

By Katherine Bouma, News Staff Writer

The Birmingham News (AL), December 7, 2006

Justice rejects plans to transfer responsibility

The U.S. Justice Department has rejected Jefferson County's plans to close its greenways program, leading to an 11th-hour scramble to write a new arrangement that all sides agree is legal.

The county cannot meet its obligations under a federal agreement by assigning the ultimate financial and legal responsibility to the nonprofit Freshwater Land Trust, as the County Commission voted in November.

Jefferson County agreed in 1996, in a federal case, to spend 10 years buying land in the Black Warrior and Cahaba rivers watersheds as penance for polluting the waterways for decades with broken sewers.

All sides agree that the county met its obligation to finish buying land in the $30 million program by the Saturday due date. And lawyers agree the nonprofit Freshwater Land Trust should oversee the land, as the county has planned.

But the 1996 court settlement requires the county to keep financial responsibility for major problems and the legal responsibility of ensuring that the land is preserved.

Bill Weinischke, senior attorney for the Justice Department, said he could not say what would happen if the county missed the deadline by a few days but completed it in time for the county commission to vote on it during its Tuesday meeting.

Fines are allowed under the 1996 consent decree, but the Justice Department has not threatened any.

County officials did not respond to calls Wednesday, but other attorneys involved in the case said they were talking with the county and were optimistic all sides could agree on a new plan.

Bart Slawson, attorney for two of the plaintiffs in the case, said the county still is trying to dodge its responsibilities 10 years after it agreed it was guilty of polluting rivers and streams with sewage.

"There's no excuse for the county attorneys not to understand the consent decree at this point, but that's what they're pretending," Slawson said.

County attorney Charlie Wagner did not respond to a request for comment Wednesday. Efforts to reach County Commission Chairwoman Bettye Fine Collins were unsuccessful.

Bob Tate, who represented the Cahaba River Society in the 1996 sewer settlement, said he has told lawyers from the Justice Department and the land trust that he was concerned not only that the county was trying to rid itself of financial responsibility for the land. He said the Cahaba River Society also wants clear rules guaranteeing the future preservation of the land.

The land trust, which was established by the county to administer the greenways program, has for several years asked the county to grant conservation easements on all its land, ensuring the land's preservation in the future.

Wagner said in a recent interview that the county wanted to wait until the end of the program to complete the conservation easements.

Uneven track record:

The county has a spotty history with the land purchase program.

In 2001, the Justice Department threatened the county with $340,000 in fines for failing to begin buying land on schedule. At the time, Department of Justice attorney Weinischke also criticized the county's choice of US Infrastructure Inc. to handle the program.

Weinischke said the company didn't have the necessary experience to run a greenways program and had taken more in fees than it had spent on land. That company is now on trial for conspiracy and bribery in Jefferson County's sewer program.

After that rebuke, the county allowed the land trust board to hire an executive director who has since purchased about 4,500 acres in the Cahaba and Black Warrior watersheds. The county commission approved her land purchases but delayed responding to her requests for conservation easements on the land.

Most recently county commissioners have argued about the interest on the $30 million, which under the consent decree must be used to maintain the land. Commissioners voted to keep half of the $4.6 million, a move the Justice Department has rejected.

Weinischke said Wednesday that he, the land trust's attorney and others are working on an agreement that would allow the land trust, like a subcontractor, to work for the county without taking ultimate responsibility.

"They've got some good people working on it," he said. "I think we're moving the ball forward."

Report Says Oil Royalties Go Unpaid (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

New York Times, December 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 6 — An eight-month investigation by the Interior Department's chief watchdog has found pervasive problems in the government's program for ensuring that companies pay the royalties they owe on billions of dollars of oil and gas pumped on federal land and in coastal waters.

In a scathing report to Congress, the Interior Department's inspector general says the agency's data are often inaccurate, that its officials rely too heavily on statements by oil companies rather than actual records and that only about 9 percent of all oil and gas leases are being reviewed.

The report undermines claims by top Interior officials that the department is aggressively pursuing underpayments and outright cheating by companies that drill on property owned by the American public.

And though investigators did not attempt to estimate the amount of money that the government might be losing, they cited a host of weaknesses that make the government vulnerable to being short-changed.

Interior officials defended the program on Wednesday, but announced that they would develop "an action plan" to address the inspector general's recommendations.

The report comes as lawmakers in both parties have been attacking the Interior Department for failing to correct blunders that department officials now concede could cost the government as much as $10 billion over the next five years.

It also reinforces complaints by critics, from auditors within the agency to lawmakers in both parties, who have said that enforcement has become superficial, prone to errors and overly deferential to oil companies.

These are among the inspector general's findings:

¶ Since 2000, the number of audits has declined by 22 percent and the number of auditors has been reduced by 15 percent, even though soaring energy prices have doubled the total amount of money at stake, to about $10 billion a year.

¶ Though the Interior Department says it has "reviewed" about 72 percent of all revenues from federal leases, it actually examined only 9 percent of all properties and 20 percent of all companies.

¶ The department's "compliance review" system, a computerized form of fact-checking that has increasingly replaced audits, essentially relies on the word of the oil companies being monitored. Officials conducting such reviews do not ask companies for their actual records.

¶ Government data are incomplete and often inaccurate, making it almost impossible for enforcement officials to develop strategies for selecting companies for special scrutiny.

The report said the agency's follow-up efforts were often sketchy, because officials who identified underpayments by companies did not have a procedure for verifying that the agency actually billed the companies or collected the money.

It also said the agency's statistics about recovering money were incomplete, inaccurate and sometimes misleading. The investigators said they could not even determine how many audits the government completed each year or whether the government recovered as much it had identified in underpayments.

In response to the report, the Interior Department said it was preparing a "comprehensive plan" to act on many of the recommendations. In a written statement, the department's Minerals Management Service, which oversees the royalty collection program, said it would deliver the plan to the inspector general within 30 days.

DOJ_NMG_0103351

"We appreciate the work of the Inspector General's office," Johnnie M. Burton, director of the department's Minerals Management Service, said in a written statement.

Last month, the Interior Department said that it had created an independent advisory panel to review complaints about the royalty program. But at the time, officials said they did not believe there were serious problems.

"While I think there's a lot of room for improvement, I've not been able to find anything that's drastically wrong," C. Stephen Allred, assistant secretary of the Interior for Land and Minerals Management, said in an interview last month.

The new panel will be led by a man with close ties to the oil industry, David T. Deal, a former assistant general counsel for the American Petroleum Institute.

Democratic lawmakers said the new report amounted to a broad indictment of the Interior Department's unwillingness to scrutinize oil companies and protect the interests of taxpayers.

"This report is a blistering, scalding indictment of the Minerals Management Service," said Representative Edward J. Markey, Democrat of Massachusetts and a longtime critic of the Interior Department's handling of the royalty program. "It says that, rather than being a cop on the beat, they were turning a blind eye to obvious flaws in the auditing system."

Representative Carolyn Maloney, Democrat of New York and a member of the House Government Reform Committee, said the report would lead to broader investigations of the oil and gas leasing program when Democrats take control of the House and Senate in January.

"That gushing sound you hear is our government leaking royalties owed to American taxpayers from the oil and gas companies," Ms. Maloney said Wednesday. "They are going to have some explaining to do next year when there's new leadership in Congress."

Since President Bush took office, the Interior Department has shifted as much enforcement effort as possible from traditional audits of oil companies to the computerized "compliance review" system.

The new report is the result of an investigation that began in March, in response to questions posed by the Senate Energy Committee after The New York Times reported that royalties for natural gas had climbed far more slowly than market prices and that both federal and state auditors were complaining that the new system was inadequate.

Earl E. Devaney, the Interior Department's inspector general, has sharply criticized the department on numerous occasions. In 2004, his office described the royalty auditing program as frequently unprofessional, with auditors who were often unqualified and supervisors who were often ineffective.

In September, Mr. Devaney told the House Government Reform Committee that the Interior Department had tolerated cronyism, ethical breaches and cover-ups of major management blunders.

The new report does not condemn the department's growing use of "compliance review," noting that the Internal Revenue Service has long used computerized systems to spot signs of cheating.

"Compliance reviews are a legitimate tool for evaluating the reasonableness of company-reported royalties," the report said.

But the investigators warned that the reviews "do not provide the same level of assurance as an audit, and should only be used in conjunction with audits."

When asked by the Senate Energy Committee whether the agency was spending enough money to do its job properly, the investigators said they could not answer because the agency "lacked reliable information to allow us to conduct such an analysis."

Oil-Lease Agency Found Inadequate (WP)

By Steven Mufson

Washington Post, December 7, 2006

The agency that collects royalties from oil and gas producers lacks the data, coordination and manpower to keep track of companies operating on federal land and in federal waters, a report by the Interior Department's inspector general said.

The report criticized the Minerals Management Service for relying on "compliance reviews," which depend on information provided by the companies, rather than detailed audits, independent information or site visits.

The report said record-keeping was so shoddy that a random selection of five supposedly completed audits found that one had never begun and two were unfinished. "MMS could not accurately count the number of audits and compliance reviews that were completed each fiscal year," the report said.

The agency, which collected $12.8 billion in royalties this year, has been criticized by members of Congress for writing leases in 1998 and 1999 that allowed major oil companies drilling in the Gulf of Mexico to avoid billions of dollars of royalty payments. The MMS is negotiating with companies in an effort to correct that and collect some of the money.

The inspector general's report, written for the Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, also said the MMS had audited only 9 percent of federal properties and 20 percent of companies in the past three years. It said that many of the same high-dollar properties are reviewed "year after year" while many other properties were never reviewed.

The report also noted that the agency had reduced the number of auditor positions by 45, or 15.7 percent, since 2000. During that time, the number of audits fell to 461 in 2004-05, from 595 in 2000-01. The report said that wasn't enough to monitor the 2,600 companies that paid royalties on about 27,800 leases in 2005.

"The biggest problem is that there's a culture at MMS that is careless, undocumented and fails to consider its fiduciary duty to the American people," said Rep. Darrell Issa (R-Calif.), chairman of the House Government Reform Committee's subcommittee on energy and resources.

"The Interior inspector general's report underscores how poorly the Bush administration's Minerals Management Service has been overseeing oil and gas drilling activities on public land," said Rep. Edward J. Markey (D-Mass.).

Report: Oil Royalty Program Ineffective (AP)

By Ian Talley Dow Jones Newswires

AP, December 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Minerals Management Service oil and gas royalty payments compliance program is ineffective and needs to be fundamentally reformed, the Interior Department's Inspector General said in a report leaked Wednesday.

With "inaccurate and incomplete" data and compliance reviews that "do not adequately evaluate company-reported volume and allowance data," the Inspector General said there was a high risk "the MMS may not detect underpaid royalties."

As a result, the MMS cannot determine the true cost and benefits of the royalty program, and has no complete picture just how much oil companies owe the government.

Industry watchdogs, lawmakers and ex-MMS auditors have accused the MMS of being too cozy with the oil and gas industry, and not collecting hundreds of millions of dollars worth of royalty payments.

The MMS's handling of royalties has come under repeated fire in the past year.

In September, Interior Inspector General Earl Devaney told a House committee that the agency suffers from a culture that "sustains managerial irresponsibility and lack of accountability," following his probe into how the royalty thresholds were omitted from offshore oil and gas leases in 1998-1999. The omission could cost the government several billion dollars. "Short of a crime, anything goes at the highest levels of the DOI," he said.

Also, ex-MMS auditors have filed lawsuits for unpaid royalties and accuse top level officials _ including its director _ of trying suppress compliance claims.

The Government Accountability Office also recently said it will conduct a probe into the Minerals Management Service's collection of oil and gas royalties.

House Government Reform Committee Chairman Tom Davis, R-Va., and House Energy and Resources Subcommittee Chairman Darrell Issa, R-Calif., said they wanted the GAO to examine the accuracy and effectiveness of the MMS's royalty collection system following "numerous ... alleged deficiencies in MMS management."

MMS Director Johnnie Burton, in a response letter to the Inspector General, said that she agreed that more could be done to raise compliance levels.

In a press release, the MMS said it would act quickly to implement new measures recommended by the Inspector General, including, "strengthened procedures, improved administrative controls and enhanced tracking systems."

DOJ_NMG_0103353

"We appreciate the work of the Inspector General's Office," Burton said in the release, "and are now developing a comprehensive plan to address the recommendations made by the OIG."

Critics have noted how federal royalties have dropped in the past few years despite higher commodity prices.

Beth Daley at the Project on Government Oversight said collections from public lands have fallen to an average of $48 million annually in 2002 to 2005, half the average of $115 million collected annually in the 20 years prior.

In the past five years, the number of audits initiated by the MMS has fallen by more than 20 percent.

Report Finds Flaws In Verification Of Petroleum Royalties (HC)

By David Ivanovich

Houston Chronicle, December 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — Federal regulators responsible for ensuring oil and gas producers pay the government their fair share of royalties often can't verify the information companies are providing, the Interior Department's inspector general says.

Earl Devaney, in a report made available today, took aim at the U.S. Minerals Management Service's frequent reliance on "compliance reviews" rather than full-blown audits to gauge whether producers operating in federal waters or on government land are cheating Uncle Sam.

When conducting a compliance review, agency regulators compare a company's production data against its reported royalties to try to sniff out any possible discrepancies.

But "this procedure does not provide an independent verification of volumes," Devaney's report argued. "Without additional analytical steps, MMS has no assurance that the reported production amounts are reasonable."

And Devaney fears that means the Minerals Management Service is not detecting underpaid royalties.

The inspector general recommended agency officials insist companies turn over actual source documents — such as tank gauge reports — for at least one test month.

"This would allow a more precise expected volume amount to be established," the report said.

When deciding which companies to review, the Minerals Management Service focuses on the high-dollar properties.

Over the last three years, the agency has reviewed only 20 percent of affected companies and 9 percent of producing properties.

"Many of the same companies and high-dollar properties have been reviewed year after year," the report said.

Agency Director Johnnie Burton, in a prepared statement, noted that compliance reviews are only one tool the Minerals Management Service uses to ensure royalties are accurately paid.

If a discrepancy is identified, Burton said, the company is ordered to explain the situation. Otherwise a more-formal audit may be launched.

Burton said agency officials plan to present Devaney a plan to implement his suggestions within 30 days.

Responding to the report today, Rep. Darrell Issa, R-Calf., chairman of a House subcommittee that has been examining the Minerals Management Service, said agency officials"don't seem to have any concept of independent collection or independent analysis."

In his report, Devaney identified a number of other problems regarding record collection, coordination and follow-up bill collecting.

Agency officials, for instance, could not say exactly how many audits and compliance reviews were completed each year, the report said.

And after reviewing 20 compliance reviews, Devaney's office identified one in which $12,400 in underpayments had yet to be collected eight months after the review had been completed.

The Minerals Management Service collected $9.9 billion in royalties in fiscal year 2005 from 2,600 companies, the report said.

Issa complains that although agency officials can say how much they have collected in royalties, they miss a key question: "How much should they have collected? They don't know."

The Minerals Management Service has been under intense scrutiny since revelations the agency signed flawed royalty agreements in 1998 and 1999 with producers operating in the deep waters of the Gulf of Mexico and then covered up the gaffe for at least six years.

Already, the agency's failure to include those price triggers have cost federal coffers more than $1 billion in lost royalty payments.

Rep. Edward Markey, D-Mass., a frequent critic of the White House's energy policies, said the Devaney report "underscores how poorly the Bush Administration's Minerals Management Service has been overseeing oil and gas drilling activities on public land."

Officials at the American Petroleum Institute declined to comment on the Devaney report, noting that they had not yet seen it.

Roadless Areas Get Protection - For Now (CSM)

By Brad Knickerbocker, Staff Writer Of The Christian Science Monitor

The Christian Science Monitor, December 7, 2006

A federal judge has blocked the Bush administration from allowing development on 50 million acres of backcountry.

ASHLAND, ORE.

Six years after the Bush administration came to office seeking to reverse Bill Clinton's order for protecting roadless areas on federal lands, the issue continues to smolder.

A federal judge has blocked the administration from lifting protections on nearly 50 million acres of backcountry. Several governors are suing Uncle Sam over the issue. And other governors are pushing ahead with their own plans to balance environmental protection with mining, logging, oil and gas development, and other commercial uses.

At stake are vast areas of federal land, most of it forested tracts across the Ameri-can West where the sound of road-building bulldozers has never been heard. Environmentalists say such areas are valuable for wildlife habitat, preserving water and air quality, and providing a wildernesslike experience. Many hunters and fishermen want them kept pristine as well.

But many areas also are potential sources of timber, minerals, gas, and oil. Developing such natural resources can be done in a way that protects the environment, administration and industry officials assert.

Like many environmental issues, sorting out this one has involved lengthy lawsuits.

In September, US Magistrate Elizabeth Laporte in San Francisco ruled that the Bush administration's repeal of the 2001 Roadless Area Conservation Rule, as the Clinton order is called, violates both the Endangered Species Act and the National Environmental Policy Act.

In another opinion last week, Judge Laporte blocked plans to extract natural resources in roadless areas, including some 300 controversial oil and gas leases in seven western states the US Forest Service issued in recent years.

Administration officials made "a clear error of judgment" in attempting to open up roadless areas without the proper environmental assessments, Laporte ruled.

The administration had sought to require governors to petition Washington if they wanted to protect federal roadless land in their states. Laporte ruled that illegal as well. But not before governors in Virginia, North and South Carolina, New Mexico, and California had petitioned the federal government for full protection of roadless areas in their states.

Meanwhile, governors in other states - Idaho, Colorado, and Utah among them - want to lift or ease some of the restrictions imposed by the Clinton rule.

The lawsuit, which resulted in the recent ruling, was brought by the attorneys general of Oregon, Washington, California, and New Mexico, plus 20 conservation groups.

For its part, the administration argues that the recent court ruling should not be made retroactive. "Neither the [US Forest Service] nor the forest resource users, who have relied on decisions made by the agency for the past six years should be faulted for acting under the law and regulations in place at the time they acted," US Justice Department lawyers said in their court filing.

Administration officials have not said whether they will appeal the ruling.

DOJ_NMG_0103355

Critics say former President Clinton rushed the roadless rule into effect just before he left office in 2001. But supporters of the rule point out that it was adopted only after three years of official study, 600 public hearings, and some 2.5 million public comments in favor of the rule.

"I realize that no rule can perfectly satisfy everyone, but the Clinton roadless rule struck a chord with Americans," says Sen. Jeff Bingaman (D) of New Mexico, incoming chairman of the Energy and Natural Resources Committee. In Oregon, more than 90 percent of the 79,000 people who submitted comments favored leaving areas roadless.

The need now, says Oregon Gov. Ted Kulongoski (D) is to "focus on more critical forest priorities - like addressing declining forest health, catastrophic wildfires, and creating sustainable and predictable harvest levels."

The legal and political debate preceding the recent court ruling did not prevent some development in roadless areas from taking place. In August, loggers began cutting down trees in the Siskiyou National Forest's Kalmiopsis Roadless Area in southern Oregon.

While such commercial development of natural resources can benefit local economies, government and private studies have shown that logging in national forests often costs the federal treasury more than it earns. Subsidized road-building in national forests is one of the main reasons.

The original roadless protection rule covered some 59 million acres around the country, nearly a third of all national forestland, most of it from the Rocky Mountains westward. Laporte's order covers all but about 9 million acres in Alaska's Tongass National Forest.

Revolt Over New Federal Mercury Law (CSM)

By Mark Clayton

Christian Science Monitor, December 7, 2006

Facing a mandate to slash toxic mercury emissions from coal-fired power plants, 23 states are thumbing their noses at a federal cleanup plan and are instead developing their own far tougher plans to deal with mercury.

But doing so has caused many of them to miss a federal Nov. 17 deadline to submit their plans to the Environmental Protection Agency. Now, the EPA is ratcheting up the pressure. This week, the agency is expected to publish names of more than 20 states that could have the federal plan imposed on them if they don't submit tougher plans by next spring.

What it all adds up to is a major state-led rebellion over mercury emissions that dwarfs, for example, an 11-state push to create regional greenhouse-gas reduction programs without federal support. If successful, the revolt could weaken a key element of the federal mercury rules: an emissions-trading system popular with the utility industry and already in place for air pollutants like nitrogen oxides.

"What we're seeing is a critical mass of states restricting trading in such a way that it really imposes a significant impact on EPA's national trading program," says S. William Becker, executive director of the National Association of Clean Air Agencies, a Washington trade group representing state and local air-quality agencies. "States are sending a strong message that mercury emissions trading is not, and should not be, a centerpiece of any federal mercury-control program."

EPA officials say they're not worried.

"Based on everything we know, we are confident there will be a robust and workable cap-and-trade system, given the number of states we believe are going to participate," says William Wehrum, acting assistant administrator of the EPA's Office of Air and Radiation.

The state plans include one or more fixes in three key areas. At least 20 states are proposing far larger cuts in mercury emissions than the EPA's new Clean Air Mercury Rule (CAMR) requires, according to a survey by the National Association of Clean Air Agencies. At the same time, 17 states are planning to require mercury reductions more rapidly than the federal government requires. At least 16 plan to opt out of, or severely restrict, emissions trading.

"We just felt that we could and should do more than EPA was asking on mercury," says Dean Van Orden, chief of the air information division of Pennsylvania's air-quality bureau. "We think it's significant so many other states are doing the same thing, including coal-producing states."

Pennsylvania's plan would cut mercury emissions 80 percent by 2010 in a first phase and 90 percent by 2015. By contrast, CAMR cuts 21 percent of mercury nationwide by 2010 and 70 percent by 2018. With costs of mercury-control technology falling sharply, tougher regulations were the right thing to do, some state officials say.

Pennsylvania and others are also not participating in emissions trading. While "cap and trade" systems worked for sulfur dioxide and other pollutants, many states argue that mercury is different because it is a toxin rather than a mere pollutant. Already, more than 3,200 health advisories warning of mercury contamination in fish from streams and lakes have been issued in 48 states.

And because mercury particles can begin dropping out of the air just a few miles from where they're emitted, state officials worry the trading system might create new mercury "hot spots" within their borders.

Illinois is another state taking a pass on CAMR, even though it's a major coal-producing state. "We are not doing CAMR or mercury trading - no trading," says Jim Ross, manager of the Illinois EPA's division of air-pollution control. "We have proposed our own mercury rule that requires greater reduction and is much faster than the federal rule."

US EPA officials say that states opting out of CAMR is no surprise.

"We always knew many states would want to do something different and that's fine," says Mr. Wehrum. "We also knew many would choose CAMR as a smart way to regulate that's economically efficient and easy to administrate."

Under the federal Clean Air Act, states can adopt clean-air plans that are stricter than a federal plan. But EPA has resisted state plans that try to limit mercury trading, going so far as threatening legal action in at least one instance, state officials say.

Montana and Michigan are among states still working on their own mercury plans. Both have felt EPA pressure to participate in trading mercury, even though they preferred restrictions on it.

"We did want some participation in CAMR trading, but not unlimited," says Charles Homer, supervisor of technical support for the Air Resources Management Bureau of the Montana Department of Environmental Quality. "But EPA told us any tampering with their trading system was not acceptable. We were either in, or out."

In the end, Montana ended up adopting EPA's trading program because coal development might have been compromised otherwise. But Mr. Homer isn't happy about it. "We were forced to participate," he says. Montana still plans deeper mercury emissions cuts than CAMR requires.

Michigan wants to trade mercury among utilities in the state, but not with utilities in the rest of the country.

"We have been in touch with the EPA and they've indicated verbally that if we prohibit interstate trading or do not submit a rule they find approvable they may take legal action," says Vinson Hellwig, chief of the air-quality division of the state's Department of Environmental Quality. "It was not a very friendly position."

Wehrum doesn't deny EPA has tried to be persuasive. But "I haven't threatened to sue anybody," he says. "That's silly."

At least 24 states - including West Virginia, Alabama, and Wyoming - are likely to embrace part or all of CAMR and its trading system. But Texas and others will do so because their state laws require it.

"The EPA could have made this a much better, tougher rule to begin with, making it less of a patchwork quilt for industry," Mr. Becker says. "They just thought states would blindly follow - and underestimated how many states would take action on their own to fill the gaps."

Last Minute Move Would Delay EPA Rule (AP)

By John Heilprin

AP, December 7, 2006

Farmers would be off the hook for costly air pollution cleanups under an obscure provision slipped into a tax bill that may be the last act of this Congress.

Buried in the fine print of the bill filed Wednesday, the measure by Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, would forbid the Environmental Protection Agency from applying the Clean Air Act to dust and soot from farms until 2012.

Environmentalists complain the moratorium would grant farmers a five-year holiday from the EPA's health standards for fine particles and soot, which protect people living downwind.

DOJ_NMG_0103357

An EPA rule last year set new standards for regulating soot, dust and other coarse air pollution particles aimed at industrial and urban sources, but it did not exempt farmers.

Enter Grassley's provision, which would apply to any "particulate matter deposited in the ambient air as a result of the conduct of an agricultural activity (as that term is defined by the Secretary of Agriculture)," the budget provision says.

Groups that have lobbied for the provision include the American Soybean Association, the National Pork Producers Council, the National Association of Wheat Growers, the National Turkey Federation and the National Cattlemen's Beef Association.

Taking up their cause, Grassley has said that farmers should not have to face tougher regulations that could impose major burdens and costs — and the possibility of neighbors' lawsuits — on big and small-scale farms and livestock operations.

To press his point, he toured an Iowa farm in October with Stephen Johnson, administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency. Johnson watched the harvesting of a soybean field to see how it stirred up dust, though rain dampened the demonstration.

Johnson insisted during the visit, however, that there is not enough scientific evidence to rule out the possibility of people getting sick from farm dust.

EPA officials maintained that position Wednesday, setting up a confrontation should Grassley's provision become law.

"We simply don't know enough to be able to create a standard that distinguishes between the particles that pose a greater hazard to public health and those that pose little or no danger," said Bill Wehrum, head of the EPA's Office of Air and Radiation.

"It's not just the size of the particle that causes the hazard to public health," he told the AP. "What we now believe is that what the particles are made of has a significant impact."

Two Indian Police Officers Shot In Northern Nevada (AP)

AP, December 7, 2006

SCHURZ, Nev. (AP) - A tribal police chief, another officer and two residents of a home on the Walker River Paiute Reservation were wounded in a shootout Wednesday as the officers tried to serve an arrest warrant at the house, authorities said.

The four men were flown by emergency services helicopters to a hospital in Reno, about 100 miles to the north, FBI spokesman David Staretz said.

A spokeswoman for Renown Health in Reno confirmed that Joe McMinn, the tribal police chief, was at the hospital but she didn't know his condition. Staretz said both officers were wearing body armor and their injuries weren't considered life-threatening.

Staretz also said he was told the other men, a father and son, didn't sustain serious injuries, although a spokesman for the Regional Emergency Medical Services Authority in Reno said one of the men was in critical condition.

Names of the other tribal officer and the father and son weren't immediately available.

The father started shooting as the tribal officers, accompanied by federal Bureau of Indian Affairs and Drug Enforcement Administration agents, tried to serve the warrant, Staretz said. He added that the man barricaded himself in the home but surrendered after he and his son were injured by gunfire. A dog owned by the residents was shot and killed.

The nature of the arrest warrant wasn't immediately known, although Staretz said it may have been drug-related since DEA personnel were at the scene. A neighbor described the house as a known hangout for drug users.

A section of U.S. 95, a busy north-south highway that runs past the reservation and near the two-story house, was shut down for several hours as FBI agents investigated the site and tried to determine whether anyone else was inside.

Gina Williams, the tribal chairwoman, said she had heard about the shooting but didn't have details. "I'm just waiting like everybody else," she added.

NHP Trooper Chuck Allen said officers from his agency, as well as the FBI, the BIA and the Mineral County and Washoe County sheriff's departments responded. He noted the FBI had primary jurisdiction.

GOP Drops Late-hour Effort To Push Indian Casino Bill (HILL)

By Jim Snyder

The Hill, December 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0103358

House Republican leaders have apparently dropped a late attempt to pass a bill that limits off-reservation Indian gaming, after several tribes raised objections.

House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), who opposes one tribe's effort to build a casino in his district, supported the last-ditch effort to push the bill, which had previously been introduced by Rep. Richard Pombo (R-Calif.), outgoing House Resources Committee chairman, gaming lobbyists said.

But the measure proved too controversial to fit into a short lame-duck session.

Tribal officials and their lobbyists have urged Congress to wait instead for the Department of the Interior's own effort to update its rules governing Indian gaming.

A public-comment period on the proposed rule closes next Friday, with a final rule expected sometime late next spring.

"We felt like there was a regulation out there and that we ought to let the regulation go forward," one gaming lobbyist said.

But Brian Kennedy, a spokesman for the House Resources Committee, said that the Pombo measure provided stronger protection against the spread of casinos than is contemplated by Interior.

"Regulations, by their nature, dance within the confines of the existing law," Kennedy said.

In September, a majority of House members voted to approve the Pombo bill, but the measure failed because it did not receive the two-thirds support it needed to pass on the suspension calendar.

An Interior staff member startled a gathering of tribal officials and Indian lobbyists yesterday morning when he announced that both Hastert and Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) planned to try to push the bill through.

The event was sponsored by the National Indian Gaming Association and took place in the Dirksen Senate Office Building.

"The room was packed with D.C. lobbyists there on behalf of their tribal clients," one lobbyist in attendance wrote in an e-mail to The Hill. "Most are in strong opposition to the bill."

Hastert, who will yield the Speaker's gavel next year to Democrat Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), opposes an effort by the Kansas-based tribe to build a casino in his Illinois district.

Generally, federal law limits the construction of Indian gaming casinos to land acquired before 1988. But there are exceptions, in part to allow tribes that had wrongly been denied federal recognition in the past to develop casinos.

Controversy lies in how and how often these exceptions are applied.

Pombo's bill seeks greater assurances that local officials have a say in the development of a casino in their area, for example. His measure requires tribes to negotiate with local governments as part of efforts to build a casino off-reservation.

Opponents argued that the provision threatened Indian sovereignty by forcing tribes to negotiate with county and other local governments that are not classified by federal law as sovereign.

"Never before has a federal law equated sovereign tribes with counties," Rep. Dale Kildee (D-Mich.) said during the floor debate.

Critics also object to the blanket provision in the Pombo bill that does not allow a tribe to build a casino "on lands outside the state in which the Indian tribe is primarily residing," according to a congressional summary. Opponents argue that a tribe's historical connections to a land should be considered in some cases.

The two sides also disagreed on how many "off-res" casinos there are. Indian gaming officials say that there are only three off-reservation gaming facilities.

But Pombo and others say the actual number is much higher than that, and that as many as 50 additional efforts are being made to build casinos outside the usual confines of a reservation.

"Virtually any land in the country could be targeted for gaming," Pombo warned on the House floor.

Critics say there are already enough protections in place to avoid overdevelopment of casinos. Tribes must negotiate with both the state and the Interior officials to develop a casino, for example.

Gaming issues are always a hot topic on Capitol Hill, in part because of the enormous amount of money often at stake in the debates.

The National Indian Gaming Association states there are 354 tribally operated casinos that employ 400,000 people. Collectively the Indian gaming industry's annual revenue exceeds $14 billion.

Seminole Tribe Buys Hard Rock Chain (WSJ)

By Peter Sanders And Dennis K. Berman

The Wall Street Journal, December 7, 2006

British gambling-and-leisure company Rank Group PLC said Thursday it will sell the Hard Rock Cafe restaurant-and-casino chain to the Seminole Tribe of Florida for $965 million.

The Hard Rock business includes 124 Hard Rock Cafes, four Hard Rock Hotels, two Hard Rock Casino Hotels, two Hard Rock Live! concert venues, and stakes in three unbranded hotels. Rank said it would keep the Hard Rock Casino in London but under the Rank Gaming brand.

"We have maximized the value of Hard Rock through this disposal following a thorough strategic review and competitive auction," said Chief Executive Ian Burke said.

The sale, which is subject to shareholder approval, is scheduled to be completed in March.

The deal shows the long-term maturation of U.S. Indian tribes that have made hundreds of millions of dollars in the gambling business. From roots as operators of small bingo-hall outposts on their reservations, some have become potent entrepreneurs on a wider stage.

The deal for Hard Rock -- a 35-year-old chain based around rock-music memorabilia -- is high-visibility proof of that evolution. Hard Rock posted $70 million in operating profit on $500 million in revenue last year.

The Hard Rock name was a sterling draw for tourists visiting major cities during the 1980s and 1990s. The luster has long since worn off the restaurant business, but the cafes still do a high volume of trade. Most attractive to investors, however, is the casino brand and operations, which have carved out a solid business amid a world-wide surge in gambling profits. The businesses weren't vibrant enough for Rank, which earlier this year hired Merrill Lynch & Co. to sell off Hard Rock.

The Seminole Tribe operates Hard Rock-brand hotels and casinos in Tampa and Hollywood, Fla., which have been successful, according to gambling analysts.

The deal wouldn't include the Hard Rock hotel and casino in Las Vegas, which in May was sold to boutique-lodging operator Morgans Hotel Group Co., of New York, for $770 million in cash. That deal has yet to close. Nor would the proposed Seminole deal include any Hard Rock cafes that chain co-founder Peter Morton controls.

The Seminole Tribe has in the past two years become the dominant gambling force in Florida. While the two Florida Hard Rock hotel-casinos are extremely lucrative -- the tribe has in the past estimated annual revenue at both casinos could top $700 million -- the tribe's involvement in the development and operation of the casinos hasn't been without controversy.

The Seminoles have had contentious relations with Florida officials over attempts by the tribe to install full Las Vegas-style casino gambling at their casinos. They have been embroiled in lawsuits with Donald Trump and another casino-development partner, Cordish Co., of Baltimore. The continuing litigation with a Cordish subsidiary, Power Plant Entertainment LLC, centers on a contract dispute over long-term income fees generated by the casinos.

The Seminoles have been a target of the Internal Revenue Service, which in the past few years has stepped up its examination of tax-free bonds used by the Seminoles and tribes in California to build casinos. The tribe issued $415 million of tax-free bonds to build the Tampa and Hollywood casinos, which the IRS deemed illegal. In October 2005, the tribe said it would issue $730 million in bonds to pay off the original tax-free bonds and consolidate debt.

Caribbean Native Pleads Guilty To Drug Conspiracy (RD&C)

By Gary Craig, Staff writer

Rochester (NY) Democrat & Chronicle, December 7, 2006

Popular St. Kitts resident appears in U.S. court here

DOJ_NMG_0103360

A Caribbean native whom Justice Department officials had been trying to extradite to the United States for a decade — before finally succeeding last year — pleaded guilty Wednesday to a drug conspiracy that involved a 1992 shipment of 28 pounds of cocaine seized en route to Rochester.

Noel "Zambo" Heath, who became somewhat of a folk hero to some residents in the twin-island nation of St. Kitts and Nevis during his fight against extradition, admitted in federal court here to a role in the drug trafficking conspiracy.

Heath, who was once identified by the White House as an international drug kingpin, could be sentenced to between 70 and 87 months under the terms of the plea agreement. He is scheduled to be sentenced by U.S. District Judge David Larimer in April.

"We were hopeful to get him back to his family as soon as possible," said his attorney, Jeffrey Lichtman.In 1992 federal authorities heard Heath on a wiretap, apparently from his St. Kitts home, plotting the shipment of cocaine to Rochester. Using information gleaned from the wiretap, police pulled over a tractor-trailer on the New York Thruway near Victor and discovered the 28 pounds of cocaine, which had a street value then of about $1 million.

Federal authorities eventually identified Heath as a key player in the drug trafficking, and a federal grand jury in Rochester indicted him in 1995. Justice Department officials then initiated extradition proceedings for Heath to face criminal charges in Rochester, but he successfully staved off extradition. Sometimes Heath was aided by sympathetic political powers in St. Kitts.

As Heath continued to live his life at home, his popularity grew. He was known for helping out the country's poor families by providing them with produce from his farm.

Last year St. Kitts authorities cooperated with the Justice Department, finally extraditing Heath, 56, in March. He has been jailed here since.

Federal authorities could not be reached Wednesday, but in a statement they said Heath admitted that he arranged in 1992 for the cocaine to be shipped to New York City.

Heath admitted that he knew that Rochester was the destination for the cocaine.

Man Loses Case, Wins Sympathy (SP)

By Jamal Thalji

St. Petersburg Times, December 7, 2006

He's been on 60 Minutes. A New York Times columnist has championed his cause. Even those who prosecuted and convicted Richard Paey sympathize with the wheelchair-bound man serving 25 years for drug trafficking - for obtaining the drugs he needs for his debilitating pain.

Count among those sympathizers the 2nd District Court of Appeal.

The problem, a majority of the court ruled Wednesday, is that they can't help Paey.

They upheld his conviction and sentence by a 2-1 vote, but passed on this advice: Get the governor to commute the sentence.

"Mr. Paey's argument about his sentences does not fall on deaf ears," Judge Douglas Wallace wrote, "but it falls on the wrong ears."

Such advice from an appellate court is rare indeed, said University of Florida law professor Michael Seigel.

"The court looks at a situation that it thinks is unfair," he said. "It's powerless to do anything about it. So the only thing it can do is to make an appeal to the governor, who does have the power to do something about it."

Appeals to the Florida Supreme Court and the U.S. Supreme Court are possible. In the meantime, Paey's attorney, John Flannery II of Virginia, said he took the court's advice right away, filing a petition with the governor's office Wednesday.

It is unlikely Gov. Jeb Bush will be able to act before his term expires at the end of the year, but Flannery wants to start the process for Gov.-elect Charlie Crist.

Flannery did find solace in Associate Judge James Seals' blistering dissent that the mandatory minimum sentence Paey received was "cruel and unusual."

The Hudson man was arrested by the Pasco County Sheriff's Office and the federal Drug Enforcement Administration in 1997 after buying more than 1,200 painkillers with fake prescriptions.

DOJ_NMG_0103361

The 48-year-old has multiple sclerosis and chronic pain since a 1985 car accident and failed surgeries.

But Paey possessed more than an ounce of the drugs. Regardless of whether he tried to sell them, under Florida law he is a drug trafficker. Before his 2004 conviction, he rejected a plea deal - on principle - that would have meant just house arrest.

Paey's wife, Linda, lives in Pasco with their three children. He is in the Tomoka Correctional Institution in Daytona Beach. Both took the news hard, Flannery said.

"He feels especially bad," the lawyer said, "because his wife and children were hoping to see him for Christmas."

Judge Rejects Counties' Challenge To California Marijuana Law (AP)

By Allison Hoffman

AP, December 6, 2006

SAN DIEGO - A state judge on Wednesday upheld California's law permitting the use of medical marijuana for medical purposes, rejecting a lawsuit by three counties challenging the decade-old statute.

The counties, led by San Diego, argued that local governments shouldn't be bound to uphold state laws that are weaker than the federal blanket ban on marijuana.

San Diego County sued California and its health services director in February over a state requirement that counties issue identification cards for medical marijuana users and maintain a registry of people who apply for the cards. San Bernardino and Merced counties joined the suit.

State attorneys responded that California was entitled to pass its own laws suspending state prosecution for medical marijuana use, and to legislate programs enabling qualified users to access the drug.

Marijuana users in California can still be prosecuted under federal drug laws.

Superior Court Judge William R. Nevitt, Jr., wrote in his ruling counties would not be breaking federal law by giving out state identification cards.

"Requiring the counties to issue identification cards for the purpose of identifying those whom California chooses not to arrest and prosecute for certain activities involving marijuana use does not create a 'positive conflict,'" Nevitt wrote.

The ruling affirmed a tentative judgment Nevitt issued in November.

The judge emphasized that he was not weighing in on the question of whether marijuana has medical benefits.

Since 55 percent of California voters approved the law in a 1996 vote, 10 other states have adopted measures protecting qualified patients from prosecution. They are Alaska, Colorado, Hawaii, Maine, Montana, Nevada, Oregon, Rhode Island, Vermont and Washington.

Thomas Bunton, a county attorney who argued the case, said no decision had been made whether to seek an appeal.

Nevitt's ruling stopped short of forcing the counties to begin issuing the cards. Fewer than half of California's 58 counties have so far complied with the state program.

Judge Upholds State's Medical Marijuana Laws (SDUT)

By Jeff Mcdonald, Union-tribune Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, December 7, 2006

SAN DIEGO – A Superior Court judge has refused to overturn California's medical marijuana laws, issuing a final ruling Monday that upholds a decision last month rejecting a lawsuit San Diego County filed against the state.

Judge William R. Nevitt Jr. ruled that state law enforcement officials are not obligated to arrest and prosecute people who violate federal laws.

“The state convincingly rebuts County of San Diego's argument that (medical marijuana laws) are pre-empted because they 'authorize' conduct that the federal government prohibits,” the judge wrote.

The county Board of Supervisors voted to sue California rather than implement the state law permiting chronically ill patients to grow and smoke marijuana. The law was adopted in 1996 after 56 percent of California voters approved an initiative.

After San Diego County filed the lawsuit, Merced and San Bernardino counties joined the case. It was unclear whether county officials would appeal the ruling, although lawyers for Merced County told the court they would appeal if they lost.

Nevitt issued a preliminary ruling in November in favor of the state and a handful of “intervenors” – patients and advocacy groups that claim medical benefits from marijuana, which is illegal under federal laws.

The ruling was welcome news to lawyers and patient advocates.

“The victory here saves state medical marijuana laws from an ill-founded and unsupported attack,” said Adam Wolf, a staff attorney with the ACLU, which co-defended the case. “The law is clear: The fed government cannot force the state of California to arrest and prosecute medical-marijuana patients.”

Judge Tosses County's Medical Marijuana Challenge (NCT)

By Gig Conaughton, Staff Writer

North County (CA) Times, December 7, 2006

SAN DIEGO -- Medical marijuana advocates declared victory and San Diego County officials mentioned the word "appeal" Wednesday when a Superior Court judge rejected -- for the second time -- the county's controversial challenge to overturn California's "Compassionate Use" act.

Superior Court Judge William R. Nevitt, reaffirming the tentative ruling he issued Nov. 16, rejected the county's argument that California's voter-approved Compassionate Use act should be pre-empted by federal law.

Federal law says marijuana has no medicinal value and its use is illegal in all situations.

San Diego County supervisors, in a move that angered local medical marijuana patients and national advocacy groups, voted to try to overturn the law in December 2005. Supervisors said the Compassionate Use act was "bad law" and would promote drug abuse.

But Judge Nevitt, in his final ruling Wednesday, said the county failed to prove that the state law was in legal conflict with the federal law. He also ruled the state law did not "require" people to break the federal law, as the county's pre-emption argument claimed.

Nevitt said the county's pre-emption argument failed because a corollary to the U.S. Constitution's "Supremacy Clause" -- which says federal law should be "supreme" over state laws -- says state laws could take precedence over federal laws in some cases.

John Sansone, the county's top lawyer, said Wednesday afternoon that supervisors would meet in closed session Tuesday to decide whether they want to appeal Nevitt's ruling.

Bill Horn, the county board's chairman, did not return calls Wednesday.

Sansone, meanwhile, said he would advise the supervisors that he believed an appeal could be successful.

Medical marijuana advocacy groups, however, said Nevitt's ruling was clear. They called on the county to immediately obey California's law by issuing identification cards to valid medical marijuana users.

Meanwhile, one local medical marijuana patient, Vista resident Craig McClain, was clearly ecstatic when he received the news of Nevitt's ruling.

"Wow, man, that's good news," said McClain, a spinal cord injury victim. "I can't believe it. I'm just so pleased to hear that, God. I'm ecstatic. It just goes to show you, you gotta hang tough."

McClain, whose spine was crushed several years ago in a construction-related accident, said he has used marijuana for several years to ease the severe, chronic spasms the injury has left him with.

McClain and other medical marijuana patients have said they have found it increasingly difficult to get marijuana this summer, after the county and local law enforcement worked with federal drug agents to essentially close down medical marijuana dispensaries.

Adam Wolf, a lawyer for the American Civil Liberties Union -- which successfully sued to intervene in the county case to defend the patients -- said he now expected the counties of San Diego, San Bernardino and Merced to begin issuing medical marijuana identification cards to patients. San Bernardino and Merced counties joined San Diego's lawsuit challenge last year.

"We hope that San Diego sees the wisdom of the court's ruling and agrees to abide by the law," he said, "to stop its ill-founded, unconstitutional challenge, and begin issuing ID cards."

DOJ_NMG_0103363

The Compassionate Use act that voters approved in 1996 did not require counties to issue the medical marijuana ID cards, but the state Legislature did by passing Senate Bill 420 in 2003.

San Diego County's challenge to overturn the Compassionate Use act began in November 2005 with a split vote by supervisors to defy SB 420 -- which legislators said would help state police officers tell who legitimate medical marijuana patients are.

The county's lawsuit, filed against California Department of Health Services Director Sandra Shewry and the San Diego chapter of the National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws, sought to overturn both SB 420 and the Compassionate Use act.

Teresa Shilling, a spokeswoman for state Attorney General Bill Lockyer, said Wednesday that it was not the attorney general's position to compel counties to comply with the law. Shilling said that historically, when laws need "to be tested," lawsuits force the courts to compel governments to comply.

Sansone, meanwhile, said he believed that Nevitt did a thorough job analyzing the lawsuit's "complicated" legal arguments. However, Sansone said he believed that Nevitt's ruling left "very strong room" for a successful appeal.

"I think we anticipated all along that this was going to be decided at a higher level," Sansone said. "Where we go? It's up to the board."

William Dolphin, spokesman for Americans for Safe Access, a medical marijuana advocacy group that also sued to intervene in the county lawsuit, said the group was very happy with Nevitt's ruling.

But Dolphin said he was disappointed to hear that San Diego County could decide to appeal.

"I hope not," Dolphin said. "The legal argument cannot be clearer or stronger."

Meanwhile, McClain said he also hoped that county supervisors would drop their challenge and give him -- and other medical marijuana patients -- their ID cards.

"I've been waiting to get that," he said. "To me, that's protection. I've already got a doctor's prescription. I just want something I can hold in my hand. That's what we voted for.

"It may seem silly to some people," McClain said. "But that's like having a driver's license, or your Social Security number. It means I'm doing things the right way."

Drug Addiction On Rise With Afghan Kids (NYT/AP)

The New York Times/AP, December 6, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan (AP) -- Farida's son inherited her drug addiction in the womb, and drank her opium-laced breast milk. And when he cried and fussed, she calmed him with specks of opium diluted in tea.

This is the hidden face of addiction in Afghanistan -- parents spreading drug use in the confines of their homes. All four of Farida's children got high from her husband's secondhand heroin smoke and from the opium she fed them.

She blames a neighbor at the refugee camp where they lived in Pakistan for introducing her husband to drugs. Her husband later advised her to take opium for her cough and aches.

"My husband was on the wrong path, and I followed him because he is my companion," the 28-year-old woman said, nursing her skinny youngest son, 2-year-old Amir Shah. "I didn't know it was bad."

Afghanistan is the world's leading producer of opium and heroin, exporting drugs to Asia, the Middle East, Europe and the United States. But the scale of domestic drug abuse has only recently become apparent.

The first nationwide survey on drug use, conducted last year by the Ministry of Counter Narcotics and U.N. Office on Drugs and Crime, found nearly 1 million addicts in this nation of about 30 million people, including 60,000 children under age 15.

Drugs of choice range from hashish, opium and heroin to pharmaceutical medicines. An estimated 5,000 children are addicted to opiates, and the remainder take cough syrup and other drugs, the survey found. The actual numbers are probably much higher, especially for children and women, the report said.

"When one person starts using drugs, the whole family is addicted," says Dr. Tariq Suliman, director of the Nejat drug rehabilitation center where Farida received treatment.

DOJ_NMG_0103364

The Ministry of Counter Narcotics has opened clinics and drug centers, but addiction is on the rise in the impoverished war-ravaged country as drug production has spiraled, making narcotics of increasing purity more available.

Opium production rose 49 percent this year to 6,700 tons -- enough to make about 670 tons of heroin. That's more than 90 percent of the world's supply and more than the world's addicts consume in a year.

"When the poppy cultivation increases, the number of addicts also increases," said Gen. Khodaidad, deputy minister for policy and coordination in the Ministry of Counter Narcotics. "The addicts -- the 920,000 people -- this number is increasing day by day."

Along the snowy footpath to Farida's one-room house in Kabul, a social worker pointed out several women -- opium addicts treated since the Nejat center opened in 2002 after the ouster of the Taliban regime.

Because there has been little drug education in Afghanistan, many people appear ignorant of the risks of addicting children and the social problems it brings.

Farida, who like many Afghans has only one name, recounted how she and her husband sold their belongings to pay for drugs. One day, her uncle had to fend off a rich man who came to her house to buy her sons.

"He said, 'I have six daughters, but I have no sons. Why do you need sons? You are a drug addict,'" recalled Farida. She spoke in her tiny home built of mud and straw, where her children huddled around a portable gas stove, warming their dusty feet and hands.

With help from the Nejat center, Farida said she and her children weaned themselves off opium in a month, using an over-the-counter analgesic for pain and vitamins to build strength. She said she and her children have not used drugs for about a year and a half.

Elsewhere in Kabul, Maraban Shah and his 6-year-old son, Said Amidullah, were at the newly opened Zendagi-e-Nawin -- or New Life -- rehabilitation home, recovering from opium addictions picked up in their remote village in Badakhshan province.

The boy was born addicted and was prone to crying, his father said.

"My wife would give him opium behind my back, and he would sleep... If he didn't get it, he would yell and throw a tantrum,'' Maraban Shah said, sitting with his son on their bed in the rehabilitation home. "One of our relatives taught her to do that -- they gave her bad advice."

The mother remains in Badakhshan, addicted to opium. The boy is now chubby and healthy, with rosy cheeks from the winter chill. He sat quietly listening to his father, only interrupting once to say: "Let's bring mommy here for treatment." <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

Tajikistan Turns Into Heroin Alley (AP)

By Mike Eckel

AP, December 7, 2006

DUSHANBE, Tajikistan -- Central Asia's poorest county is also one of the world's leading transit routes for heroin, opium and other drugs from Afghanistan. Sergei Makhkamov has been caught in the flood.

"I tried it, I liked it and it went from there," said the haggard, fidgety, out-of-work 24-year-old who got hooked on heroin in 2004. "If you have the money, you can find it anywhere, anytime."

In Tajikistan, the scars still remain from a traumatic civil war that ended nine years ago. Now, new wounds are being inflicted on this mountainous nation -- from the dramatic spike in the trafficking of drugs grown in neighboring Afghanistan, smuggled north through Tajikistan en route to Russia and Europe, and increasingly consumed by Tajiks.

Makhkamov is one of 7,600 officially registered addicts in Tajikistan; activists say the number is up to eight times greater. They warn that the scourge and its consequences -- crime, disease, draining limited social resources in an already desperately poor country -- threaten a society still fragile from war.

"We're on the verge of a generalized epidemic," said Murtazokul Khidirov, a health activist involved in the fight against illegal drugs, HIV and AIDS and related diseases.

Tajikistan shares close ties with Afghanistan as well as a porous, 1,340-kilometer border. Russian guards patrolled the border for many years as both Afghanistan and Tajikistan were wracked by war. Now, the Tajiks have taken over -- with United Nations help -- but doubts persist on whether they can stem the tide, especially since the United Nations says Afghanistan's opium cultivation has reached record levels.

DOJ_NMG_0103365

According to the Tajik Drug Control Agency, 7 to 8 tons of illegal drugs were seized last year; the UN ranked Tajikistan fifth worldwide in heroin and morphine seizures, and fourth for opium.

"There is a problem and we are looking for help from the world community, from the United States," said Lieutenant Colonel Avaz Uldashev, an agency spokesman.

Since the end of the 1992-1997 civil war, the average age of Tajik addicts has crept downward from between 30 and 35 to between 20 and 29 years. The percentage of female addicts, mainly prostitutes, has skyrocketed to around 30 percent of all users, increasing the likelihood that infectious disease cases like AIDS will jump in coming years, Khidirov said.

Health workers and nongovernmental organizations in Dushanbe, meanwhile, are allowed to distribute condoms and clean needles to help prevent the spread of AIDS, Khidirov says. But AIDS cases have climbed in the past five years and a record three dozen fatal overdoses were recorded last year. Efforts to treat addiction, like methadone replacement therapy, are largely ignored.

So are residential treatment centers like the Drop-In Center -- one of only two such centers for addicts nationwide. Nine addicts, including Makhkamov, live together in the small, nondescript house on Dushanbe's western outskirts.

On a recent evening, one woman slept on the floor in front of a blaring television and under a flickering light bulb, while two other addicts, including a 42-year-old former doctor, played pingpong in the main room.

Sergei Kozlov, the center's director, said the operation, which has been open for less than seven months, has received foreign funding of about $13,000 and nothing from the government.

In Dushanbe now, he said, it's almost as easy to buy drugs as it is to buy beer. "You have to fight the addiction. We have to do more, to fight it and to help [addicts]," he said. "If you leave them, they just become parasites on society."

Ford Seeking New Trial (RMN)

By Sara Burnett, Rocky Mountain News

Rocky Mountain News, December 6, 2006

A former Denver firefighter convicted of selling an illegal machine gun to an undercover federal agent is requesting a new trial, saying prosecutors failed to turn over evidence that could have led to his acquittal.

Stan Ford was scheduled to be sentenced Friday. But U.S. District Court Judge Robert E. Blackburn said the sentencing should be postponed until Ford's motion for a new trial is heard.

Ford, who was acquitted on three other weapons charges, says the government did not disclose emails from an informant's computer that he says show he was the target of entrapment. In one message, the informant asks Ford to get him a gun and says he is "desperate" for a weapon, Ford stated in court documents.

The U.S. Attorney's office says it did provide Ford's lawyers with copies of all communications. It also disputes that the messages at issue would have been enough to acquit Ford.

This is the second time Ford has sought a new trial. Blackburn denied his first motion in July.

More Judges Packing Pistols In Courtrooms (LAW)

By Amanda Bronstad, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, December 7, 2006

Despite increased security at courthouses following shootings in Chicago and Atlanta about one year ago, many judges are bringing their own guns into their courtrooms for protection.

Earlier this month, a Florida judge was ordered to accept mentoring after warning a defense attorney that he was "locked and loaded." In May, a judicial ethics committee of the New York State Unified Court System found that it was ethical for a judge to carry a pistol into his courtroom.

In Nevada, Oklahoma and Texas, incidences of violence in the past year have prompted new laws or solidified rules allowing judges to bring guns into courtrooms.

DOJ_NMG_0103366

"Judges in our courthouse have been carrying guns almost all the time," said Cynthia Stevens Kent, a Texas judge in the 114th District Court, where a man in a family law case killed his ex-wife and son last year on the steps of a Tyler courthouse.

"We feel strongly about providing adequate security, but it comes down to personal responsibility. And you've got to take responsibility for your own safety," Kent said.

Security concerns were raised last year after a rape suspect grabbed a deputy's gun and killed an Atlanta judge and others. One month earlier, a litigant had killed the husband and mother of a Chicago federal judge who ruled against him.

COVERING THE DOORWAY

Some states allow judges to arm themselves.

In June, a man shot the Nevada judge overseeing his divorce case through the window of his courtroom. Chuck Weller, a judge in the Nevada 2nd Judicial District Court in Reno, who survived the incident, said that judges in Nevada are allowed to carry weapons into the courtroom if they obtain permission from the chief judge.

He declined to say whether he keeps a gun in his courtroom, but noted, "I'm not opposed to it at all. The culture in the community I live accepts firearms."

The shooting prompted U.S. Senator Harry Reid, D-Nev., to introduce legislation to enhance security at both state and federal courthouses.

In another recent incident, Oklahoma District Judge P. Thomas Thornbrugh said he grabbed his gun from his chambers after he heard a loud slam against the wall and shouts for help. He said he knew deputies were taking a prisoner to a nearby bathroom.

"I thought the deputies were being overcome by this prisoner, and their service weapons would be taken," said Thornbrugh, recalling the Atlanta incident. "There were no other deputies around, so I got a pistol out of my desk and covered the doorway until the other deputies arrived."

The scuffle prompted the Oklahoma House of Representatives to pass a bill in March that would allow district judges to have guns in the courthouse. Current law is unclear.

The bill died before reaching the state Senate, but state Rep. Dan Sullivan, R-Tulsa, who introduced the bill, said he plans to try again next year.

In Texas, which permits state judges to carry concealed handguns into courtrooms, a new law became effective that expands that right to include federal judges and district attorneys. The law followed the Tyler shooting.

"We believe each judge should be able to make sure he has a system of self-defense," said Kent, who wears a shoulder harness and carries a gun at all times. "One of our biggest areas of target is when we're in the court making decisions."

FIGHTING GUN BANS

In May, New York's Advisory Committee on Judicial Ethics issued an opinion that found it ethical for a judge to carry a pistol while on the bench.

In Florida, where Bay County Judge Michael Hauversburk recently threatened a defense attorney with his handgun, state law permits concealed weapons. But a bill that died last year would have specifically allowed judges to bring concealed firearms into courtrooms. Similar bills were introduced and failed last year in North Carolina and Illinois.

On Jan. 1, Kansas plans to permit judges and whomever they designate to carry concealed firearms in the courtroom. Phillip Journey, the state senator who authored the bill and a practicing attorney, said he spent a decade seeking to overturn a blanket prohibition on firearms in the courthouse.

"If I had a judge's permission, I'd do it every day," he said of bringing a gun into the courtroom. "Guns are like lawyers: Better to have one and not need it than need one and not have it."

IMMIGRATION:

U.S.-Mexico Border Sees Drop In Illegal Immigrant Arrests (AP)

By Alicia A. Caldwell, Associated Press

AP, December 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0103367

EL PASO — The number of illegal immigrants being arrested at the U.S.-Mexico border has dropped sharply in the first two months of this fiscal year, with some Border Patrol sectors seeing a drop of up to 63 percent.

Arrests along the border in Texas, New Mexico, Arizona and California have dropped about 27 percent, or by nearly 43,000 illegal immigrants, since Oct. 1, compared to the same time last year, Border Patrol officials in Washington said.

Reports of the decrease come about a month after Border Patrol officials announced a nearly 9 percent drop in arrests from 2004 to 2005. If the downward trend continues it would mark the first sustained decrease in illegal immigrant arrests since shortly after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, said Assistant Chief Patrol Agent Xavier Rios.

It's nearly impossible to know whether the drop in arrests really means that fewer people are coming across the border.

T.J. Bonner, president of the union that represents the majority of agents, said agents on the ground estimate that they only catch 25 percent to 33 percent of illegal immigrants.

"This is not a game of laser tag where you simply point at someone and say, 'Tag, you're it, go home,'" said Bonner, who is also a Border Patrol agent. "It's very time consuming to round them up and arrest them. In the meantime, who's watching the store? No one."

Border Patrol officials acknowledge that they don't know how many people make it across the border every year. But they insist that the drop in arrests, which varied widely — the San Diego Sector marked a 3 percent drop while the Yuma, Ariz., and Del Rio, Texas, sectors each showed a 63 percent dip — is a sign that recently launched border security efforts are working.

"All of these numbers are good," Rios said. "We're better staffed than we have been since the inception of the Border Patrol. We're more effective at what we do."

Despite the significant drop in the Yuma Sector, which covers far southwestern Arizona and parts of Southern California, agents in Arizona remained the Border Patrol's busiest.

Agents nationwide also reported a 58 percent decrease in the arrests of "other than Mexican," or OTM, immigrants.

Border Patrol officials first noticed a drop in arrests last summer, shortly after National Guard troops were ordered to the border as part of President Bush's Operation Jump Start. Those troops staff cameras, help maintain Border Patrol equipment and watch for illegal crossers.

OTM arrests also started to slide last year after U.S. Department of Homeland Security chief Michael Chertoff ordered the end to a "catch and release" program that allowed those immigrants to be set free after they agreed to appear in court at a later date.

Doug Mosier, a Border Patrol spokesman in El Paso, said localized agency operations and state-driven efforts also likely have helped curbed arrests.

In the Del Rio Sector, for example, any adult illegal immigrant arrested is prosecuted and sent to jail before being kicked out of the country. Operation Streamline is a cooperative effort between the Border Patrol, federal prosecutors, the U.S. Marshals Service and other federal agencies.

A prosecutor in Maricopa County, Ariz., is using an anti-smuggling law to prosecute illegal immigrants who have been smuggled. Elsewhere, cities including Dallas suburb Farmers Branch have created laws aimed at keeping illegal immigrants from living and working in the community.

Federal officials also have formed a partnership with their Mexican counterparts to try to prosecute more human smugglers.

The Operation Against Smugglers Initiative for Safety and Security — OASISS — started in earnest in July and allows for smuggling suspects who are not prosecuted in the United States to be turned over to Mexican authorities for prosecution.

"That's the idea, to put more teeth into our prosecutorial ability," Mosier said.

Though Mosier said it is too early to know whether the trend will last, the recent reports are promising.

"I think it's too soon for anyone to declare success, but certainly it's encouraging for those of us on the border," Mosier said.

Altoona, With No Immigrant Problem, Decides To Solve It (NYT)

By Sean D. Hamill

The New York Times, December 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0103368

ALTOONA, Pa., Nov. 30 — By now the pattern is familiar. New businesses move to town, creating low-paying, low-skill jobs that are quickly filled by immigrants. Most are Hispanics who speak little English. Some may be in the country illegally. After a few years, local leaders fume that school enrollment has surged, social services are stretched and crime has increased, and they blame the illegal immigrants.

Since June, when Hazleton, Pa., some 130 miles east of here, began debating what to do about illegal immigrants, more than 60 local governments in 21 states have followed its lead and considered new ordinances to drive them away. At least 15 have approved the measures, typically intended to punish landlords who rent to illegal immigrants and business owners who employ them.

Altoona, an old railroad town nestled in an Appalachian Mountain valley about 100 miles east of Pittsburgh, is one of those 15. It approved its ordinance, which threatens to withdraw the business licenses of employers and rental licenses of landlords who hire or rent to illegal immigrants, in October. But it does not fit the same pattern.

"If you were to look for the area for the fewest immigrant settlements in the country, you would look to south central Pennsylvania," said Steven A. Camarota, director of research for the Center for Immigration Studies, a research organization in Washington that favors tougher immigration policies. "There just aren't many immigrants — legal or illegal — around Altoona because there aren't many jobs."

If Hazleton, where the immigrant population grew sharply in just a few years, started the current trend for dealing with a surge in illegal immigrants, Altoona may be the beginning of the next wave: trying to prevent a situation from developing in the first place.

"We don't have a problem here with immigrants," said Joe Rieker, 40, one of five members of the Altoona City Council who voted in favor of the new ordinance. "But we want to stay ahead of the curve." One member voted against.

When places like Altoona pass such laws, it is a sign of a growing frustration with the federal government's lack of immigration enforcement, said Ira Mehlman, spokesman for the Federation for American Immigration Reform. The group's legal arm, the Immigration Reform Law Institute, has aided several towns, including Altoona, in writing similar laws.

"We certainly hope we see more towns like Altoona" approving ordinances restricting illegal immigrants, Mr. Mehlman said. "And as the message gets out that there aren't a lot of communities that are welcoming, it will be a deterrent."

But the legal director for the American Civil Liberties Union in Pennsylvania, Vic Walczak, worries that a different message is being sent.

"When you have towns like Altoona enacting a solution in search of a problem, you worry if there's a nativist impulse there," Mr. Walczak said. "There's a fair bit of politics involved here, and illegal immigrants are an easy and effective scapegoat for a small town's problems."

Founded in 1849 by the Pennsylvania Railroad, Altoona grew as waves of German, Irish and Italian immigrants moved here. But immigrants have long since bypassed Altoona as the city's economic fortunes dwindled along with those of the railroad business. In the 2000 census, the city had just 295 foreign-born residents, about one-half of 1 percent of its 49,523 residents, and no one thinks that figure has changed much over the past six years.

"You see a car here with four Mexicans in it, I do feel bad about it, but they do stand out in an area that's mostly white and of European descent," said Mr. Rieker, whose wife, Vanessa, is a Peruvian immigrant going through the lengthy and complex process of becoming a United States citizen.

But Altoona does have at least one factor in common with Hazleton: both ordinances were passed after local killings that have been attributed to illegal immigrants.

In Hazleton, a local man was shot and killed in May. Two illegal immigrants from the Dominican Republic have been charged in his death.

In Altoona, Miguel Padilla, 27, was convicted in September in the killings of three men outside a nightclub on Aug. 28, 2005. Though he had moved to a nearby town as a boy and graduated from a high school there, Mr. Padilla was an illegal immigrant from Mexico. He had previously been arrested and his illegal status had been reported to the federal government.

Mayor Wayne Hippo and other members of the Council have said the Padilla case had nothing to do with the city's ordinance.

DOJ_NMG_0103369

But for local residents who support the ordinance, the murders were the biggest reason Altoona needed the ordinance.

"We just had three murders here," Sandy Serbello, 64, a lifelong resident said in explaining her support of the measure. "We look at everybody differently now."

Ms. Serbello said she avoided talking to anyone she suspected of being an illegal immigrant, "because we don't want to be one of their victims."

That is the kind of sentiment that worries the Rev. Luke Robertson, executive director of Catholic Charities in Altoona, which along with the local Roman Catholic diocese strongly opposed the ordinance.

"I don't think they thought through the unintended consequences," said Father Robertson, 49, a Franciscan priest. "It promotes bigotry."

Moreover, said Bishop Joseph V. Adamec of the diocese, the ordinance could discourage businesses from opening in or relocating to Altoona when Interstate 99, which runs through town, is completed, connecting Interstates 80 and 76.

"They're not going to build here if we aren't welcoming," said Bishop Adamec, who has overseen the diocese for 19 years.

He is not swayed by those who say that the three murders might have been prevented if the ordinance had been in effect in 2005.

"The one who did it, he came here when he was a boy and went to our schools," Bishop Adamec said. "He didn't come here already formed. He's one of us."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Gates Confirmed As Secretary Of Defense (AP)

By Anne Plummer Flaherty

AP, December 6, 2006

The Senate voted overwhelmingly Wednesday to confirm Robert Gates as defense secretary, with Democrats and Republicans portraying him as the man who will help overhaul President Bush's Iraq policies.

The 95-2 vote was a victory of sorts for Bush, who named Gates to replace Donald H. Rumsfeld at the Pentagon on Nov. 8, a day after voters gave Democrats control of Congress for next year.

Even so, much of Gates' support stemmed from his pledges to consider new options in Iraq. Overshadowing the vote was the release of an independent study lambasting Bush's approach to the war, increasing pressure on the White House to change course.

"I am confident that his leadership and capabilities will help our country meet its current military challenges and prepare for emerging threats of the 21st century," Bush said in a statement after the Senate vote.

He said Gates had shown during his confirmation hearing this week before the Senate Armed Services Committee that he is "an experienced, qualified, and thoughtful man who is well respected by members of both parties and is committed to winning the war on terror."

Overall, 52 Republicans, 42 Democrats and one independent voted for Gates. Three lawmakers — Sens. Joseph Biden, D-Del., Evan Bayh, D-Ind., and Elizabeth Dole, R-N.C. — did not vote.

Two Bush allies, Sens. Rick Santorum, R-Pa., and Jim Bunning, R-Ky., voted against Gates, citing his criticism of the war and his view that the U.S. should engage Iran as part of a solution.

"Mr. Gates has repeatedly criticized our efforts in Iraq and Afghanistan without providing any viable solutions to the problems our troops currently face," Bunning said. "We need a secretary of defense to think forward with solutions and not backward on history we cannot change."

Santorum, who lost his re-election bid last month, mocked the idea of engaging dictators and talked at length of the evils of "radical Islamic fascism." When it comes to reaching out to Iran to discuss the security of Iraq, Santorum said of Gates, "I think he is in error."

The White House said Gates would be sworn in Dec. 18. Explaining the delay, spokeswoman Dana Perino said Gates had commitments he had to fulfill at Texas A&M University, where he is the president. Bush called Gates with congratulations.

DOJ_NMG_0103370

Gates said at the Senate hearing he did not think the U.S. was winning the war and that all options for changing the administration's approach must remain on the table.

"It seems to me that the United States is going to have to have some kind of presence in Iraq for a long time ... but it could be with a dramatically smaller number of U.S. forces than are there today," Gates testified.

The committee voted 24-0 to support Gates to succeed Rumsfeld, who became a symbol of the unpopular war and often sparred with Democrats.

Committee Democrats said they decided to endorse Gates because of his frank assessment of the Iraq war and his openness to change. Many of them said they saw the Iraq Study Group's report and the change in leadership at the Defense Department as the necessary impetus for a different approach to Iraq.

Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., said he thought Gates "recognized the high price that our troops are paying for the current policy."

GOP Senate leaders also hailed the confirmation.

"The position of secretary of defense is more important than ever, and I believe the President has made an outstanding choice," said Senate Majority Whip Mitch McConnell, R-Ky.

Gates' swift approval contrasted with his experience 15 years ago when he was picked to head the CIA.

In 1991, 31 Democrats voted against confirming Gates, citing charges he had pressured intelligence analysts to develop conclusions that fit President Reagan's policies and turned a blind eye to the Iran-Contra scandal — when arms were sold to the Iranians and the cash used to supply the Nicaraguan Contra rebels.

Twelve of the senators who rejected Gates 15 years ago remain in the Senate today, including Biden, Carl Levin, D-Mich., and Jay Rockefeller, D-W.Va.

Despite Gates' popularity with lawmakers during this confirmation process, he has not said what should be done in Iraq, promising to consult first with military commanders.

Gates won political points with Democrats when he said he did not think the U.S. was winning in Iraq. That response appeared to contradict Bush, who said at an Oct. 25 news conference, "Absolutely, we're winning."

Gates later said he believes the U.S. is neither winning nor losing "at this point."

Levin said Wednesday he was pleased that Gates agreed with Democrats that "only a political settlement by the Iraqis can end the violence in Iraq and that the military force that we have there cannot do that for the Iraqis."

Bunning, Santorum Vote Against Gates (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, December 7, 2006

The Senate confirmed Robert Gates as Secretary of Defense yesterday, voting 95-2 to replace departing Donald Rumsfeld with the former Iraq Study Group member.

Two GOP senators, Jim Bunning (Ky.) and Rick Santorum (Pa.), voted against Gates. Santorum, who lost his reelection bid to Bob Casey Jr. (D-Pa.), said in a floor speech that he found fault with Gates's support for diplomatic engagement with Iran as part of a regional solution to the crisis in Iraq.

The rationale for Bunning's vote was unclear as of press time, but he has voted against high-profile Bush nominees in recent months, including Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke.

Senate Confirms Gates As Secretary Of Defense (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, December 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 6 — The Senate voted overwhelmingly on Wednesday to confirm Robert M. Gates as defense secretary in a 95-to-2 vote.

The decision came after a confirmation hearing and floor debate that unfolded in less than 48 hours, reflecting the bipartisan sentiment that a course change in Iraq is vital as well as a strong desire to quickly replace Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who announced his intention to resign last month.

DOJ_NMG_0103371

Dana Perino, a White House spokeswoman, said Mr. Gates would be sworn in and formally begin work on Dec. 18, more than a week after his confirmation, because he wanted to participate in fall commencement at Texas A&M University before resigning as the school's president.

With the White House expected to be discussing strategy changes in Iraq over the next week, Ms. Perino said that Mr. Gates would be involved in meetings and conference calls until his formal swearing-in, "so he can hit the ground running."

Mr. Gates, a former director of the Central Intelligence Agency, said during his confirmation hearing Tuesday that one of his first acts would be to travel to Iraq to consult with American ground commanders.

A Texas A&M spokesman, Lane Stephenson, said he could not confirm Mr. Gates's plans regarding the university's commencement ceremonies, but he said the event was scheduled for Dec. 15 and 16 and it was customary for the university president to preside.

The nomination was approved hours after the public release of a report by the Iraq Study Group, a bipartisan panel headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and a retired congressman, Lee H. Hamilton, which urged direct negotiations with Syria and Iran as well as a clear declaration that the United States would reduce its support to Iraq unless that government made "substantial progress" on security in coming months.

Mr. Gates has not endorsed any specific strategy shift in Iraq, and several senators warned against overestimating his ability or desire to make sweeping and rapid changes in Iraq.

"We see the possibilities of a new chapter," said Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania, but he added, "It is up to the commander in chief to structure a change in policy."

The two senators who voted against Mr. Gates were both Republicans, Jim Bunning of Kentucky and Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, who lost his re-election bid in November.

In a floor statement after the vote, Mr. Santorum said he opposed the nomination because he believed that Mr. Gates was in favor of engagement with Iran, a country the lawmaker blamed for contributing to the conflict in Iraq. "We should confront them," Mr. Santorum said.

Mr. Bunning gave a similar explanation. Mr. Gates, he said, "believes in directly engaging rogue nations such as Iran and Syria that are known sponsors of terrorist groups in Iraq, Lebanon and the West Bank and Gaza. I do not support inviting terrorists to the negotiating table."

President Bush telephoned Mr. Gates to congratulate him during the Senate vote after it became clear he would be approved by an overwhelming margin, Ms. Perino said.

In a statement issued by the White House, President Bush thanked the Senate and called Mr. Gates "an experienced, qualified and thoughtful man who is well respected by members of both parties and is committed to winning the war on terror."

Though the statement did not mention Iraq or the White House strategy review that is under way, Mr. Bush said Mr. Gates "will help our country meet its current military challenges and prepare for emerging threats."

During a perfunctory Senate floor debate on his nomination, the handful of senators who spoke endorsed Mr. Gates and said he represented the possibility of a strategy change in Iraq, which lawmakers from both parties said was necessary.

"I do not believe he is invested in the decisions, many of them bad, made in the Department of Defense over the last five years," said Senator Jack Reed, Democrat of Rhode Island. "He is a good listener, and I think he will draw on a cross section of views in making decisions."

Senate Confirms Gates For Defense (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel

The Los Angeles Times, December 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Senate voted overwhelmingly Wednesday to confirm Robert M. Gates as the 22nd U.S. secretary of Defense, giving the former CIA director decisive bipartisan support amid the increasingly divisive debate over the war in Iraq.

The Senate voted 95 to 2 to approve Gates' nomination. White House officials said he would be sworn in Dec. 18.

The quick handover would mean Donald H. Rumsfeld would fall less than two weeks short of becoming the longest-serving secretary of Defense since the position was created after World War II.

DOJ_NMG_0103372

The two votes against Gates came from Republicans — outgoing Sen. Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania and Sen. Jim Bunning of Kentucky, who opposed Gates over his criticism of Iraq policy and his support for opening talks with Iran and Syria.

President Bush thanked the Senate for moving quickly and said he was heartened by the bipartisan support.

"Dr. Gates has transformed the organizations he has led and empowered them to successfully address complex issues," Bush said. "I am confident that his leadership and capabilities will help our country meet its current military challenges and prepare for emerging threats of the 21st century."

Gates won over critics of the administration's handling of the war on both sides of the aisle during an adulatory confirmation hearing Tuesday in which he vowed to consider all options in Iraq and openly criticized some of the White House's decisions during the conflict. Democrats cited his openness as their reason for supporting the nomination.

"I was heartened to see the forthrightness and candidness employed by Dr. Gates at his confirmation hearing yesterday," Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) said during Wednesday's debate on the nomination. "He fully admitted the need for a 'change of approach' in Iraq, stating his view that we are not currently winning the war."

People close to Gates say he is unlikely to make widespread changes among top personnel in the Pentagon, and is expected to ask the department's No. 2 official, Deputy Secretary Gordon R. England, to remain.

Some officials tied closely to Rumsfeld have announced their intention to leave. Pentagon intelligence chief Stephen A. Cambone, a Rumsfeld ally who pushed hard for tough interrogation practices in Iraq and Guantanamo Bay, said last week that he would leave at the end of the month.

Gates has said he plans to travel to Iraq early in his tenure to get views from U.S. commanders on strategy and troop numbers.

Senate Confirms Gates As Defense Secretary (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, December 7, 2006

The Senate overwhelmingly approved Robert M. Gates yesterday as the new defense secretary to replace Donald H. Rumsfeld, sealing a swift confirmation with a vote of 95 to 2 that reflected bipartisan confidence in his willingness to overhaul U.S. strategy in Iraq.

Senate Democrats and Republicans lauded Gates's frankness after a day of testimony Tuesday in which he acknowledged that the United States is not winning in Iraq, and said that historians would have to judge whether the decision to invade Iraq in March 2003 was correct. He also pledged to take a fresh approach to Iraq in which "all options are on the table."

Two Republican senators -- Jim Bunning (Ky.) and Rick Santorum (Pa.) -- voted against Gates, with Bunning saying that Gates's criticism of "our efforts in Iraq" sends the wrong message to U.S. troops and allies.

Gates, 63, a former CIA chief and Russia expert who has served four previous presidents, is to be sworn in Dec. 18 as the nation's 22nd defense secretary.

President Bush called Gates soon after the vote to congratulate him. "I am confident that his leadership and capabilities will help our country meet its current military challenges and prepare for emerging threats of the 21st century," Bush said in a statement. "He is an experienced, qualified, and thoughtful man who is well respected by members of both parties."

Gates said that his first priority in taking the helm at the Pentagon will be to consult with senior U.S. commanders in the field and the Joint Chiefs of Staff to formulate recommendations on Iraq "with considerable urgency."

Gates's blunt public acknowledgement of problems in Iraq was amplified by yesterday's release of the Iraq Study Group report, which concluded that "current U.S. policy is not working" and has led to a "grave and deteriorating" situation there.

Both events have created a sense of momentum as pressure builds on the Bush administration to shift course in Iraq, where violence is at record levels and more than 2,900 U.S. troops -- including 10 killed yesterday -- have lost their lives since the U.S.-led invasion.

Gates, however, as with the Iraq Study Group report, has made clear that he knows of no startlingly novel ideas for stabilizing the country of 26 million people.

DOJ_NMG_0103373

"There are no new ideas on Iraq. The list of tactics, the list of strategies, the list of approaches, is pretty much out there," Gates told the Senate Armed Services Committee during his confirmation hearing Tuesday. "The question is: Is there a way to put pieces of those different proposals together in a way that provides a path forward?"

Senators from both parties said they were encouraged by Gates's willingness to speak his mind.

"He came to the table refreshingly open in a nonpartisan way," said Sen. Bill Nelson (D-Fla.) on the Senate floor before yesterday's vote.

"He has asserted his independence," said Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.).

Sen. John Cornyn (R-Tex.) also endorsed Gates -- an Eagle Scout and Wichita native -- saying his "manner and temperament" not only helped him win him Senate approval but would help him as defense secretary in facing "the most significant challenge of our time."

Indeed, several senators laid out the host of difficulties that Gates will confront at the Pentagon, including not only Iraq but also tough budget trade-offs and severe readiness problems in the Army and Marine Corps that have left the United States less prepared to respond to other potential world crises.

What Will Bush Do? Gates' Hiring May Signal Change In Air (USAT)

By Susan Page, David Jackson

USA Today, December 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush offered members of the Iraq Study Group cups of coffee and a polite hearing when he met with them at 7 a.m. Wednesday, but they left the White House an hour later with no guarantees that he would actually take their tough advice.

The commission made 79 recommendations that amount to an overhaul of administration strategy on the Iraq war and the Middle East: Setting a goal of withdrawing almost all U.S. combat forces from Iraq by early 2008. Launching a diplomatic initiative that includes Syria and Iran, regimes Bush now shuns. And moving to resolve the Palestinian issue, a problem he has largely sidelined.

What will Bush do now?

As TV cameras rolled in the Cabinet Room, the president used conciliatory words — "We will take every proposal seriously, and we will act in a timely fashion" — but he didn't commit to or even mention any specific steps. In the past two weeks, he's rejected several of the key items, including talking directly to Iran and setting what amounts to a timetable to withdraw U.S. forces.

Even so, a combination of events — the commission report, voters' rebuke in the midterm elections and the reality of spiraling violence — is forcing Bush toward the most far-reaching changes in approach since he ordered the invasion of Iraq nearly four years ago.

Actions may speak louder than words: He continues to insist that U.S. forces will remain in Iraq "until the job is done." But he also replaced Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, an architect of the war, with Robert Gates, who had been a member of the study group until he was nominated to head the Pentagon.

And with the announcement this week that United Nations ambassador John Bolton would step down, Bush now has the opportunity to replace one of the administration's biggest skeptics toward the sort of diplomacy that the commission says needs to be launched.

Former senator Chuck Robb, a member of the commission, said in an interview with USA TODAY that the group's members found Bush "quite open and receptive" to its recommendations. That was a relief, the Virginia Democrat said, since not even co-chairmen James Baker and Lee Hamilton were sure how their report would be received.

"He does accept the basic premise that it's a very difficult situation," Robb said of Bush.

Rep. Gary Ackerman, D-N.Y., a critic of Bush who was invited to an afternoon session with the president, said he emerged from the White House "more optimistic" about the prospect the president might make significant changes in strategy and tactics. "It's apparent the consideration of all options is on the table," Ackerman said.

DOJ_NMG_0103374

There are some precedents that give Ackerman and others hope that Bush will change course. After the Sept. 11 attacks, for instance, the White House opposed creating a Department of Homeland Security. When it became clear that Congress was going to approve it anyway, Bush relented, helped establish the new agency and then took credit for it.

Michael Green, a former senior aide on the National Security Council, cautioned against taking the administration's hang-tough rhetoric at face value. Based on his experience at the Bush White House, Green said, all options will be considered, albeit behind closed doors. "I would not mistake the message discipline of the White House for inflexibility on the part of the president," he said.

Green sees an even more important development in the arrival of Gates, whose nomination was confirmed 95-2 by the Senate late Wednesday. At a Senate Armed Services Committee hearing Tuesday, Gates split with Bush on several issues, saying the United States isn't now winning the war and endorsing diplomatic outreach to Tehran and Damascus.

The commission report represented a classic intervention by Washington graybeards, dispatched to deliver unwelcome advice to presidents in peril. During Watergate, Arizona Sen. Barry Goldwater led a trio of senior Republican senators to the White House to tell President Nixon he had to resign. In 1987, retired Tennessee senator Howard Baker was drafted by party elders to step in as President Reagan's chief of staff when the president was entangled in the Iran-contra scandal.

On this commission, the median age of the five Republicans and five Democrats is 75. Their résumés — former secretaries of State and Defense, White House chief of staff and attorney general, U.S. senator and Supreme Court justice — and their bipartisan unity gave their recommendations a heft that precluded Bush or Democratic congressional leaders from dismissing them out of hand.

"We're going to get it from the right, far right; we're going to get it from the far left. … Everybody'll say it can't work," former Wyoming senator Alan Simpson, a Republican member of the commission, predicted at an afternoon news conference on Capitol Hill. "Well, we're just sincere enough to believe that it will," he said. "Maybe it's corny; maybe it won't work. But it's sure as hell better than sitting there where we are right now."

Simpson's plain-spoken humor elicited laughter from scores of journalists gathered to get a first look at the long-awaited report. Earlier, he had broken the tension at the private White House meeting with similar remarks, according to two commissioners, Robb and former Supreme Court justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

He told Bush that the commission's bipartisan consensus was possible because they agreed that "all people with a 'D' after their name did not become a guard at Lenin's Tomb, and all people with an 'R' behind their name did not crawl out of a cave in the mountains, and that maybe we can do something."

White House Press Secretary Tony Snow emphasized that the commissioners were "entirely constructive," endorsed some of the president's goals and didn't call for an immediate pullout of U.S. forces. He accused reporters of misrepresenting the group's conclusions by focusing on its differences with the administration.

Even so, the 96-page report — 142 pages with appendixes — in large measure repudiates the administration's execution of the war and Bush's approach to dealing with other countries. While avoiding such hot-button words as "civil war," in substance it echoes some of Bush's harshest critics and warns of "a slide toward chaos" unless policies are changed. The title: The Way Forward — A New Approach.

"We do not recommend a stay-the-course solution," former secretary of State Baker, a Bush family consigliere, told reporters. "In our opinion, that is no longer viable."

There's not much time to act, the commission cautioned. It urged Bush to launch a regional diplomatic offensive by the end of the month. Hamilton, the commission co-chairman and a former Indiana congressman, warned that escalating violence in Iraq could overtake the commission's calculations in short order.

Among its recommendations:

•Change the mission of U.S. troops. The number of U.S. troops embedded with Iraqi units to train them should be multiplied, the report said. The 3,000 or 4,000 now embedded should have their ranks increased to 10,000 or even 20,000. These troops could be drawn from combat brigades already deployed in Iraq.

As that happens, U.S. combat forces could begin to move out.

DOJ_NMG_0103375

•Pressure the Iraqi government. The report lays out a detailed series of benchmarks. By the end of this year or early next year, it calls on the Iraqi government to approve laws to share Iraq's oil resources, outlaw militias and limit the purge of former members of Saddam Hussein's Baath Party. By next spring, the Iraqis should have completed "reconciliation efforts" by enacting an amnesty for insurgents willing to lay down arms and holding a referendum on possible constitutional amendments.

If the Iraqi government can't or won't act, the United States should reduce its role there.

•Enlist Iraq's neighbors to help. The report calls for the creation of a new Iraq International Support Group to include Iraq's neighbors, Egypt, the five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council (the United States, Britain, France, Russia and China) and the European Union. Negotiations over Iran's nuclear problem shouldn't preclude cooperation on Iraq.

•Address the Arab-Israeli conflicts. The report urges the administration to launch a major effort to resolve Israel's conflicts with the Palestinians and Syria. Edward Djerejian, a former U.S. ambassador to Israel and Syria who helped draft much of the commission's report, said the United States could not expect Syria to help stabilize Iraq without Israel addressing Syria's desire to regain the Golan Heights, captured by Israel in 1967.

The Bush administration has to move from "conflict management to conflict resolution" throughout the Middle East if its Iraq policies will have a chance to work, he said.

•Bring most U.S. troops home. Bush has said repeatedly U.S. forces would "stand down" as Iraqi forces were able to "stand up." The inability of Iraqi forces to handle security operations has delayed reductions in U.S. forces that the administration once expected to make this year.

If the Iraqi government failed to meet political and security benchmarks, the commission said, U.S. forces would be redeployed as planned and not "made hostage" to Iraqi actions or inaction.

The language on U.S. troop levels was the most difficult issue for the commission to resolve, O'Connor and Robb said. Some members argued for more specific deadlines. They agreed to compromise on March 2008 as a goal for U.S. combat troops to be withdrawn, although some advisers and trainers are likely to remain for years.

That timetable wasn't fast enough for some critics.

Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., an opponent of the war who will chair the powerful Defense Appropriations subcommittee when Democrats take control of the House in January, called for quicker and more "decisive" action. "Staying in Iraq is not an option politically, militarily or fiscally," he said.

Incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., and incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., praised the commission's work and urged Bush to accept its recommendations. The public's interest in the report's conclusions was high. Cable TV outlets provided nearly wall-to-wall coverage of the day's news conferences. The United States Institute of Peace posted a PDF file of the report on its website at 11 a.m. By 4 p.m., it had been downloaded 400,000 times.

Just how quickly Bush will respond isn't clear. He's waiting for appraisals of Iraq policy now underway at the State Department and Pentagon.

Even as a lame-duck president weakened by Republicans' loss of the House and Senate in last month's elections, he remains what he might call "the decider" on Iraq.

Congress can increase pressure for acceptance of the Iraq Study Group report by holding hearings and withholding action on other items that Bush wants, deputy Senate Democratic leader Dick Durbin, D-Ill., said. But when it comes to implementing the recommendations, "we cannot do this in Congress," Durbin said. "To change policy and change direction, there's one person who can do it." He said he hopes the president will.

Gates Won't Change 2008 Budget, Industry Believes (HILL)

By Roxana Tiron

The Hill, December 7, 2006

Robert Gates, the incoming Pentagon chief, has spurred high expectations of change in U.S. strategy in Iraq, but the defense industry does not anticipate any major changes in budget and policy decisions that could curtail their business, at least for now.

DOJ_NMG_0103376

The Senate confirmed Gates this week, allowing him to start his new job at the Pentagon this month, about a month and a half before the Department of Defense submits its budget request for 2008.

There will be very little Gates can change regarding a process begun months ago and nearly finished, several defense insiders said. But he will come into his own after a few months and be able to influence the 2009 defense budget, lobbyists said.

During his Senate Armed Services confirmation hearing Tuesday, Gates said that he is prepared to consult the administration and Congress if he thinks changes to the 2008 budget are needed.

"But I would also say, just looking at it as I understand it, as a percentage of GDP, defense spending, even with the cost of the war in Iraq, [is] at a relatively low level compared to most of post-World War II experience," he said during the hearing.

Lobbyists are less concerned with assessing Gates's impact at the Pentagon than with trying to gauge decisions that defense-related committees and subcommittees will make under Democratic leadership.

Congress already is under pressure to reduce, or steady, spiraling defense spending and expensive programs. "It is hard to imagine that the next five years are going to be nearly as generous to the [Defense Department] as the past five years have been," cautioned Steve Kosiak, director of budget studies at the non-partisan Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments.

But the Army's and Marine Corps' war-torn equipment desperately needs replacement and repair. Big modernization programs that many companies count on for profits could be cut to pay the bill.

Along with balancing current and future needs, some in defense circles expect Gates to redirect the military's "transformation" toward creation of a force capable of fighting so-called shadow wars.

Gates could focus on honing counterinsurgency skills, special operations and policing, according to Greg Treverton, senior analyst at the RAND Corp., a nonprofit research organization, and former vice chairman of the National Intelligence Council in the first Clinton administration. This could affect the defense industry, he said.

Tricky political matters such as defense transformation and emergency supplementals are where Gates could have a positive impact, said several defense insiders.

"Apart from the fact that Gates is supposed to be a quick study, he does have a reputation of reaching out to both Democrats and Republicans," said Dov Zakheim, a Pentagon comptroller in President Bush's first administration, and now a vice president for global defense at Booz Allen Hamilton.

Gates has said that he recognizes "the importance of balancing immediate and future needs."

The industry is anxiously waiting to see how the Pentagon's emergency supplemental request for 2007, which could reach $160 billion, will play with lawmakers increasingly fed up with using emergency spending to pay for what they consider predictable war expenses.

The emergency supplemental is a "more discreet issue" than the regular budget, and Gates could have a say in that, said Kosiak.

In his answers to the standard SASC questionnaire before his hearing, Gates said he would comply with new legislation that requires the Pentagon to submit a funding request for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan with his budget request, as well as an estimate of all funds expected to be required for the fiscal year for the operations. He said, however, that it is difficult to forecast "the scope and nature of wartime operations many months ahead of time."

"The issue is less about spending the money than [about] how it is spent. The major issue is … being honest about the request," offered Jon Kutler, founder and CEO of Admiralty Partners, a private investment firm that works with defense companies. "Part of the [solution] is just reaching out to Congress more than Rumsfeld did, and he can smooth over some issues."

House and Senate Democratic leaders intend to conduct relentless oversight of money going into the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. Approval of the supplemental could come with strings attached.

"It is very late into the process to affect what goes into the '08 budget," said Kosiak. "You can make last-minute alterations in one or two programs, but it is something people in the Pentagon do not like to see."

What the Pentagon buys, and how much, is largely driven by the military services' plans. And the services push for programs and force structure "in a way that is very difficult for any individual to have a major kind of impact [upon]," said Kosiak.

DOJ_NMG_0103377

Gates also is coming in with no Pentagon experience, but that doesn't necessarily make him the exception. Rumsfeld is the only defense secretary to have served twice. But Gates's lack of experience inside the Pentagon is not going to affect the Defense Department's dealings.

"The Pentagon has a great deal of institutional knowledge," said Kutler, who served in the Navy for 10 years. "The Pentagon budget is a long-cycle process and it is rare that a secretary sees many reiterations of the budget. His position is more of a leadership priority type of a job than micromanaging."

In addition, if Deputy Secretary of Defense Gordon England decides to stay, he would be tremendously helpful to Gates as he transitions to the Pentagon, Zakheim said.

With Gates's arrival at the Pentagon, several appointed administration officials are expected to resign. Already, Under Secretary for Intelligence Stephen Cambone, one of Rumsfeld's trusted allies, has departed. All Pentagon political appointees have been asked to submit their resignations "pro forma," as they would be asked to do in any regime change, according to a source.

Gates's answers on the SASC questionnaire were deliberately vague, said a former appointed administration official. "He cannot really take a position until he is confirmed; he cannot talk about any decisions that require him to make a judgment on policy."

Blair Agrees War "Not Being Won" (BBC)

BBC.com, December 6, 2006

Tony Blair has agreed with the incoming US defence secretary's assessment that the war in Iraq is not being won.

Asked by Tory leader David Cameron at prime minister's questions if he agreed with Robert Gates' assessment of the war, Mr Blair said: "Of course."

Mr Blair has arrived in Washington for discussions with President Bush about the Iraq Study Group's report.

Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett said the report was "substantial and complex" and in line with UK policy.

The report from the study group, which was set up by Congress and led by ex-Secretary of State James Baker, calls for combat troops to leave Iraq in 18 months.

The report has called the situation in Iraq "grave and deteriorating" and said the current US approach was "not working". It said the ability of the US to influence events was diminishing.

It also said 2,900 American lives had been lost and $400bn (£203bn) spent in the conflict.

On Tuesday, Mr Gates said the next two years could see slow improvements or "the very real risk of a regional conflagration".

In response to Mr Cameron during PMQs, Mr Blair said: "What's important however is that we go on to succeed in the mission we set ourselves."

Mr Cameron said it was essential strategy for Iraq was decided "by the British government and in the British national interest".

Liberal Democrat leader Sir Menzies Campbell asked: "Isn't it clear that the British government has no policy of its own in relation to Iraq? And that we are wholly dependent on the decisions taken in Washington?

"What sort of strategy is that? And what sort of legacy is that?"

Mr Blair said the British stood side-by-side with the US and the Iraqi government in working to make the country stable.

The prime minister added: "As progressively, the Iraqis are capable of taking on their own security, as now they are doing in two out of the four provinces and in one half of Basra... then the need for British troops diminishes. That is our strategy."

He said that the whole of the Middle East needed to be put on a more stable footing and that part of that meant finding a solution for the Israel-Palestine conflict.

During PMQs, Mr Cameron asked Mr Blair what he believed the changes to US policy following the US report should be.

Mr Blair, who gave evidence to the US inquiry, said: "Inside Iraq, what is important is that we complete the building up of the capability, particularly of the Iraqi army.

DOJ_NMG_0103378

"We've also got to make sure that the governance and capability of the Iraqi government is improved - not just in relation to the way it functions but also, for example, to the disbursement of money both in Sunni and Shia areas.

"It's also important we make sure the process of reconciliation ... is carried through, with greater effect than so far."

The Iraq Study Group report also suggested a diplomatic offensive setting up a support group, which would include Iran and Syria.

Mr Blair has raised the possibility of discussion with Iraq's neighbours; something Washington has so far ruled out.

Responding to the publication of the report, Sir Menzies Campbell called the Iraq "adventure" Britain's "biggest foreign policy mistake since Suez".

He said: "The damage to Britain's interests has been incalculable."

Congress Takes Up Trade, Taxes, Abortion (AP)

By Jim Abrams

AP, December 7, 2006

In the final hours of Republican rule, the Senate put forward an all-purpose bill covering everything from normalized trade with Vietnam and tax breaks for millions of taxpayers to an expansion of offshore oil drilling. The House, while preparing its own tax and trade agenda, gave conservatives perhaps their last chance for a while to vote on an abortion bill. It was defeated.

As of late Wednesday, House and Senate negotiators were still struggling to come up with a common approach to the tax and trade package.

Senate Finance Committee leaders said they were bringing to the floor as early as Wednesday the session-ending package that would renew expired or expiring tax breaks for businesses and middle income individuals and trade items affecting economic relations with Vietnam, Haiti, Africa and Andean nations.

The tax portion, said Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, gives "continued tax relief to families paying college, teachers buying classroom supplies and producers of clean energy from sources such as wind."

The package would also open up 8 million acres off the Gulf of Mexico to oil and gas drilling, postpone a planned cut in Medicare reimbursements to physicians and extend an abandoned coal mine reclamation program.

The House put off until Thursday any vote on its Vietnam trade bill as lawmakers pondered whether to combine it with the tax break measure. Completing those bills could be the last major task before this Congress adjourns at the week's end, making way for the new Democratic-controlled Congress to convene on Jan. 4.

It remained uncertain whether the House and Senate could come together on a package that would not be so laden with expensive programs that it becomes unpassable.

The fix on Medicare payments is estimated to cost more than $10 billion over a one-year period. The abandoned mine bill could cost $5 billion over 10 years.

Among the tax breaks, a research and development deduction extension through 2006 and 2007 would cost $16.5 billion. Extending tuition deductions through the end of 2007 would cost $3.3 billion. Another provision allowing taxpayers in states without income taxes to deduct state and local sales taxes would cost $5.5 billion.

House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas, R-Calif., said they were working to keep Medicare payments within budgetary limits. "It will be revenue neutral if you squint."

House GOP leaders, in a parting gesture to their conservative base, brought up a bill that would require abortion providers to inform a woman 20 weeks into her pregnancy that an abortion would cause pain to the fetus. The 250-162 vote was well short of the two-thirds majority needed under a procedure that limited debate.

The bill defined a 20-week-old fetus as a "pain-capable unborn child." That's a controversial threshold among scientists, with debate over whether a fetus at that stage of development feels pain or reflectively draws back from stimuli.

Had it passed, the legislation had almost no chance of advancing in the Senate, while the new Democratic Congress is expected to have little appetite for abortion-related bills.

The Senate on Wednesday approved a measure to renew the $2.1 billion-a-year Ryan White CARE Act for prevention and treatment of AIDS. The bill still needs House consideration.

DOJ_NMG_0103379

It also voted 95-2 to confirm Robert Gates as defense secretary, replacing Donald H. Rumsfeld.

On the to-do list before Congress departs is approval of legislation to continue paying for most federal programs, at last year's budget levels, through Feb. 15. The legislation is necessary because this Congress was unable to pass any of the annual spending bills for the current budget year, which started Oct. 1, except for the Defense and Homeland Security departments.

This funding bill also passes off to the new Democratic majority the tough questions of how to meet spending demands for health and education programs while tackling the budget deficit.

The Vietnam bill would end Cold War-era requirements of annual reviews of trade with the communist nation. The House rejected the bill before the Nov. 7 election when the measure came up through an expedited procedure requiring a two-thirds majority.

The bill needs a simple majority of the 435-member House to pass this time, but textile state lawmakers may oppose it. They already oppose existing programs that let Haiti and some African countries export apparel to the U.S., while getting some materials from China and elsewhere.

The House, trying to finish up on Thursday, rushed through some three dozen mostly noncontroversial bills, including measures to honor two well-known men who recently died — economist Milton Friedman and journalist Ed Bradley — and the late baseball star Satchel Paige.

In other action:

• The House approved $289 million over five years for states to train volunteers and provide services to the estimated 50 million families caring at home for adults and children with special needs. The sponsor, Rep. Mike Ferguson, R-N.J., said his father spent six years caring for his ailing wife, and Ferguson wants to help families in similar situations. The Senate is expected to approve the bill.

• The House passed a Senate bill that requires the Health and Human Services secretary to develop and put in place a plan for autism research.

• The House passed by voice a renewal of a pipeline safety law, with tougher penalties for energy companies that fail to follow construction rules and, in response to shoddy maintenance that led to disruptions in Alaska oil lines last summer, new federal standards for low-pressure oil pipelines.

• The House passed legislation to improve tsunami detection and preparedness in the United States and abroad.

Jockeying In Senate Endangers Tax Breaks (WP)

By Lori Montgomery

The Washington Post, December 7, 2006

A variety of popular tax breaks held up in Congress for more than a year by political jockeying has been saddled once again with a host of contentious measures, including proposals to expand offshore oil drilling, cancel a Medicare payment cut for doctors and provide more money to clean up abandoned coal mines.

The massive last-minute tax bill, unveiled yesterday by leaders of the Senate Finance Committee, also would create or extend a variety of trade measures, including a plan to grant Haitian clothing duty-free entry into the United States that has sparked criticism from the American textile industry.

Several senators yesterday raised objections to the bill, blocking its path to a full vote in the Senate and raising alarm among business lobbyists concerned about the fate of the largest of the tax breaks, a credit for research and development worth $7.5 billion in this fiscal year alone.

Meanwhile, with time running out on the 109th Congress, Senate negotiators were still trying to resolve differences with the House, which must also approve the package.

Business organizations and their members were waging a fierce lobbying campaign on behalf of the research credit, urging lawmakers to prevent it from expiring. California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) and Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano (D) sent letters adding their support, and former Michigan governor John Engler, now president of the National Association of Manufacturers, warned lawmakers that "failure is not an option."

As of late yesterday, business lobbyists remained hopeful that the research credit would be preserved.

DOJ_NMG_0103380

The tax measures would extend until December 2007 breaks that, for the most part, expired last December. If Congress does not act, many businesses and individual taxpayers will be unable to claim them in April. The breaks include a reward for employers who hire former welfare recipients, a personal deduction for state and local sales taxes paid by people who live in states without income taxes, and another personal deduction for elementary and high school teachers who spend at least $250 of their own money on classroom supplies. The bill also includes incentives for businesses that invest in the District.

The tax breaks are popular with members of both parties, but their passage has been complicated by Republican efforts over the past year to use them to attract votes on more disputed measures. In July, for example, the tax extensions were attached to a bill that would have raised the minimum wage and permanently slashed the estate tax. The bill passed the House, but was blocked in the Senate, leaving the tax breaks in limbo.

With lawmakers hurrying to wrap up work by Friday, business leaders learned yesterday that Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa) and ranking Democrat Max Baucus (D-Mont.) had tied the tax extensions to a new set of controversial issues, including trade, health care, coal mines and offshore drilling.

The trade measures would grant permanent normal trading relations to Vietnam, a measure that failed last month after a preliminary vote in the House, and extend trade relationships with sub-Saharan and Andean countries, as well as other developing nations.

One of the most disputed provisions would allow some types of clothing made in Haiti to be exported to the United States tax free. The Bush administration has championed the measure as a form of aid to one of the world's poorest countries, but some trade groups have attacked it, focusing on the fact that it would allow a portion of the raw materials used in Haiti to come from other countries. That could give duty-free access to textiles and yarn from China and intensify fears that too much of the global apparel trade is shifting to the world's most populous country.

On health care, the bill would cancel a 5.1 percent cut in payments to physicians scheduled to take effect Jan. 1. The cut is unpopular with doctors, who say it is unfair and will force some physicians to close their doors to Medicare beneficiaries. Congress has blocked similar cuts since 2002; the Senate bill would stave off the latest cut by freezing payments at the current level and allowing doctors to earn bonuses for part of the year if they participate in federal efforts to measure health care quality.

The Senate bill would fund the move, about $12 billion over five years, partly with cash from a special fund created to give private insurers financial incentives to offer Medicare drug plans in rural areas. House negotiators also want to delay the cut in physician payments, but House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas (R-Calif.) has been trying to push some of the costs off into next year, when Democrats will control Congress and the budget process.

The bill also contains a provision to open more than 8.3 million acres on the outer continental shelf to oil and gas leasing. And it would create a mandatory funding stream to reclaim abandoned coal mines and pay health benefits for former mine workers. The mine provision would add $4 billion to the national deficit, according to Senate Budget Committee chairman Judd Gregg (R-New Hampshire), who is demanding that it be stripped out of the legislation.

As House and Senate negotiators met late last night, business lobbyists who were worried about the research credit waited for other battles to be resolved.

"Adding new things always complicates and potentially threatens your core issue," said Ralph Hellmann, senior vice president for government relations at the Information Technology Industry Council. But "they'll sort through it," he said. Otherwise, "they are going to wake up and have angry voters and businesses wondering why" their taxes are going up.

Antiabortion Measure Falls Short In House (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, December 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — House Republicans opposed to abortion rights failed Wednesday in their bid to pass a controversial measure that would have required women seeking abortions to be informed that some fetuses feel pain.

Although it was clear the bill would have stalled in the Senate, the abortion opponents hoped the House vote would provide a symbolic victory before control of Capitol Hill passes to Democrats in January. Instead, the vote dealt social conservatives a final setback in a two-year congressional session that has not produced a major piece of antiabortion legislation.

DOJ_NMG_0103381

The bill received majority support, 250 to 162. But that fell short of the two-thirds margin required under rules that limited debate.

Those decrying the outcome included Concerned Women for America, an advocacy group for socially conservative causes.

"Abortion not only kills a baby, it tortures them," said Wendy Wright, the group's president. "Regrettably, congressmen — many who denounced the use of torture against suspected terrorists — have voted to not let women know that abortion will torture their innocent unborn babies."

Abortion rights supporters applauded the bill's failure as they prepared for the arrival of a Democratic Congress, where such measures almost assuredly will not be considered.

"This sham bill is yet another partisan political ploy that misguidedly attempts to insert the government into private medical conversations between women and their doctors," said Rep. Lois Capps (D-Santa Barbara), who helped lead opposition to the legislation.

The opponents also disputed the claim by the bill's backers that fetuses 20 weeks and older experience pain.

The bill has not been a top priority for antiabortion activists. Their movement suffered a tougher loss this fall when a measure to strengthen parental consent laws was derailed in the Senate after passing the House.

The fetal pain bill was sponsored by Rep. Christopher H. Smith (R-N.J.).

"It's about time that women were told the truth about abortion," he said during floor debate.

Smith and others argued that because some evidence has been found that older fetuses feel pain, women seeking to terminate a pregnancy should be informed of that by abortion providers.

The bill would have required that the women be offered the choice of having anesthesia administered to the fetus.

Smith also said: "Is it our hope that this [bill] may dissuade a woman from allowing her child to be killed? Absolutely."

NARAL Pro-Choice America, one of the nation's leading abortion rights groups, was neutral on the bill. But a host of other groups, including the National Abortion Federation, opposed it, arguing that the evidence that fetuses feel pain was inconclusive.

"Requiring misleading mandated communication is an inappropriate and dangerous intrusion of Congress into private healthcare decisions," the heads of seven abortion rights groups and healthcare providers wrote in a letter to lawmakers.

Anti-Abortion Bill Stalls; Session Nears End (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, December 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 6 — The House on Wednesday rejected an anti-abortion measure offered by Republicans as Congressional leaders struggled to bring the 109th Congress to a close.

On a 250-to-162 vote, backers of the measure fell short of the two-thirds majority necessary to pass the bill, which would require medical personnel to inform women that a fetus could experience pain and to offer anesthesia for the fetus. The supermajority vote was required under special rules used to consider the bill.

Democrats accused Republicans, who will no longer be in the majority next year, of trying to score political points. The measure had no chance of becoming law in the last few days of this session.

“We are wasting time today on a bill that is laden with rhetoric but very little science,” said Representative Lois Capps, Democrat of California.

But Republicans said the measure was intended to allow women to make informed choices when considering an abortion. They disputed scientific research suggesting that a fetus did not experience pain. “This legislation is very, very badly needed,” said Representative Phil Gingrey, Republican of Georgia, an obstetrician.

Proponents of the measure said that they do not expect the new Democratic majority, whose leadership strongly supports abortion rights, to bring up such measures, and that they will press the leadership to allow a second vote under regular rules. But Republican officials said they had no plans to revisit the issue.

With time running out, House and Senate leaders were trying to negotiate an endgame that could lead to votes on tax, trade and spending measures before Congress adjourns and Democrats take control in January. But there were snags on nearly every front, and Congress had not yet advanced a stopgap spending bill to keep the government operating beyond Friday.

"All the decision makers are moving boxes," said Representative Sherwood Boehlert, Republican of New York, who is retiring this year. Mr. Boehlert was referring to the flurry of packing under way because some lawmakers — including some writing the remaining legislation — are leaving to make way for new members of Congress, and some in the leadership are getting ready for the transfer of power.

Members of the House and Senate were trying to reach agreement on the elements of a broad measure that would restore popular tax breaks like the college tuition tax credit and to provide a way to pass more contentious legislation like a trade deal with Vietnam and a bill opening part of the eastern Gulf of Mexico to oil and gas drilling.

Hoping to break the impasse, the leaders of the Senate Finance Committee — Senator Charles E. Grassley, Republican of Iowa, and Senator Max Baucus, Democrat of Montana — on Wednesday introduced legislation that included those proposals as well as a freeze on cuts in physician payments under Medicare. Their bill also renews for one year trade benefits for the Andean countries of Peru, Colombia, Ecuador and Bolivia and would ease rules on imports of apparel from Haiti.

Mr. Grassley acknowledged that assembling the bill was a delicate balancing act and that some of the add-ons were drawing objections that threatened the measure. "It is a wonder we ever get anything done around here," he said.

Though they were leaving most of the spending bills for Democrats to deal with next year, Republicans were hoping to win approval of one measure that provides money for improvements at military installations and other benefits for members of the armed forces. But some Senate conservatives were reluctant to allow the measure to go forward, fearing it could become a magnet for last-minute pet projects.

The House and Senate were also bickering over a stopgap measure that would keep the government operating while the final spending measures are worked out next year. Aides said Senate leaders wanted to use that measure to provide money for additional veterans care and a pay raise for federal employees while the House opposes such extra provisions. The legislation, known as a continuing resolution, has to pass before the existing bill expires Friday.

The Senate also passed a measure that would provide about $7 billion over three years for AIDS treatment and care, much of it funneled through state and local programs, after a dispute was resolved over the level of spending in New York, New Jersey and California among other states.

Who'll Be Bolton's Replacement At U.N.? (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer

AP, December 7, 2006

Speculation on a new U.S. ambassador to the United Nations to succeed John Bolton is focusing on Washington's current ambassador in Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, and a former U.S. deputy ambassador at the U.N., Richard Williamson.

But there also are a number of other Republicans and even some Democrats whose names have been floated among diplomats at U.N. headquarters.

The Republican speculation includes Rep. Jim Leach, a 15-term lawmaker from Iowa and opponent of the war in Iraq who lost his seat in the Democratic takeover of the House of Representatives in November, and two undersecretaries at the State Department, Nicholas Burns and Paula Dobriansky.

On the Democratic side, two former senators have been mentioned — George Mitchell of Maine and Sam Nunn of Georgia.

President Bush accepted Bolton's resignation Monday, angered that a few Republicans joined Democrats in preventing his nomination from reaching the floor of the Senate. Bush appointed Bolton last year when Congress was in recess, but his term is about to expire. With a long fight for confirmation going nowhere, Bolton decided to resign.

Bolton refused to talk about his personal situation when he came to U.N. headquarters Thursday to vote on a resolution authorizing an African force to protect Somalia's transitional government, which the U.S. sponsored.

"I will continue to serve until my appointment ends because I've not resigned, I've simply indicated I will leave federal service when the recess appointment ends," he said. That will happen when Congress adjourns, either in late December or early January.

Khalilzad, an Afghan-born Sunni Muslim and Republican insider, took up the Iraq post in June 2005 after serving as U.S. ambassador to Afghanistan from 2003 to 2005 following the fall of the Taliban. In November, a senior State Department official said he was likely to leave Iraq as soon as the end of the year but was more likely to remain through the spring.

ABC News reported Tuesday that Khalilzad will soon return to the United States and is under "strong consideration" to be the new ambassador to the U.N., quoting a senior administration official.

The acting spokesman for the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad, Michael McClellan, told The Associated Press "there's no comment because there's no official announcement."

Some diplomats question whether Bush would want to change ambassadors in Baghdad after a report by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group released Wednesday said U.S. policy in Iraq "is not working," and urged an immediate diplomatic attempt to stabilize the country and allow withdrawal of most combat troops by early 2008.

Williamson, now a partner in the Chicago law firm of Mayer Brown Rowe and Maw, was a deputy ambassador at the U.N. in 2002-03 and ambassador to the U.N. Human Rights Commission in Geneva in 2004. He was recently in Washington where he reportedly spoke to several senior State Department officials.

Both Khalilzad and Williamson have strong international and political backgrounds.

Khalilzad served at the National Security Council as special assistant to the president and senior director for Islamic Outreach and Southwest Asia, and as head of the Bush-Cheney transition team for the Defense Department.

Williamson served as assistant secretary of state for international organizations in the State Department from 1988-89. He is a former chairman of the Illinois Republican Party and currently on the board of directors of the International Republican Institute.

Nominee For Pentagon Watchdog Withdraws (AP)

By John Solomon

AP, December 6, 2006

President Bush's nominee to be Pentagon inspector general has withdrawn from consideration, meaning the Defense Department likely will start a second year without its chief watchdog even as the military spends billions a month in Iraq.

David Laufman, a decorated federal prosecutor, sent Bush a letter last week withdrawing from consideration after the Senate Armed Services Committee declined to hold a vote on his nomination before Congress recessed this year.

The committee's top Democrat, Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, is poised to become its chairman in January and has raised concerns about Laufman's nomination. The White House formally withdrew Laufman's name on Wednesday.

The inspector general's office is charged with investigating waste, fraud and abuse inside the military, and it has been without a presidentially appointed leader for more than a year. The last inspector general, Joseph Schmitz, stepped down in August 2005.

Career officials have been running the office, but the watchdog has been criticized for being slow to get staff on the ground to investigate issues in Iraq and for shying away from examining the National Security Agency's electronic surveillance program.

Laufman, who won accolades for prosecuting a Virginia man convicted of plotting to kill the president, vowed to examine such controversial issues and be an independent and aggressive watchdog. Some current inspectors general took the rare step of endorsing him.

But the nomination came to a halt after Laufman testified to the Senate Armed Services Committee this summer that the inspector general's law requires him to consult with the defense secretary before embarking on sensitive cases.

Levin challenged Laufman's credibility and his independence, saying such consultations would be a major departure from current practices. While the senator was correct that the current inspector general hasn't been consulting that way, Laufman was correct in noting the law suggests that he should.

Sen. Warner Is Leaving The Peak, But Not The Hill (VAPILOT)

By Dale Eisman

DOJ_NMG_0103384

Norfolk Virginian-Pilot, December 7, 2006

WASHINGTON - Sen. John Warner of Virginia capped the proudest chapter of his four decades in public life with a victory Wednesday, then hinted strongly that he hopes to remain in office at least another eight years.

As he prepared to relinquish the chairmanship of the Senate Armed Services Committee, Warner told reporters he's "leaning in favor" of seeking re-election in 2008. A sixth term, ending in January 2015, would make the 79-year-old Republican the longest-serving Virginia senator ever.

Warner had been widely expected to step aside when his current term expires. Term limits set by his GOP colleagues are forcing him to give up a leadership role of the Armed Services panel, a job he called the pinnacle of his Senate career.

But since the defeat last month of fellow Republican Sen. George Allen, Warner has been dropping hints that he's reluctant to see the state represented by two first-term senators, as it would be if he retires. Democrat Jim Webb will have just two years of Senate experience by the end of 2008.

Warner's comments came as he marshaled bipartisan Senate support for President Bush's nomination of Robert Gates to be secretary of defense and pleaded for more bipartisanship in the debate over the future of America's role in Iraq.

The Gates nomination, approved 95-2, and the unanimous recommendations released Wednesday by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group should be a model for both Bush and the Congress, Warner suggested.

"All of us may have to give up a little bit," Warner told colleagues. "We owe that to the men and women of the armed forces."

Warner will relinquish the Armed Services chairmanship after a final hearing today and testimony from members of the study group. He spent much of Tuesday and Wednesday basking in praise from Armed Services Committee members from both parties.

American troops "have never had a greater champion" than Warner, said Michigan Sen. Carl Levin, the Democrat who will succeed him as Armed Services chairman in January. "He is an example that all of us try to follow."

In a reflective mood on Wednesday afternoon, Warner said the continuing loss of American lives in Iraq and Afghanistan "weighs heavily on me," and that he worries that strains the war has placed on the military will make it tough to recruit and keep troops.

The all-volunteer force launched in the 1970s has given the United States the finest military in history, Warner said. "I don't want to ever, ever return to the draft."

Warner also recalled how he struggled as a Marine in the Korean War to cope with the deaths of his comrades and said those memories give him an appreciation for the challenges facing today's service members and their families.

"We lost two guys who over a period of time were sleeping in my tent," he said, closing his eyes and rubbing his temples at the memory. It fell to him to wrap up the men's belongings and ship them to their loved ones.

"You don't forget those things," he said.

He acknowledged that pre war intelligence on the dangers posed by the regime of Saddam Hussein proved faulty and that there should have been more careful planning for the country's occupation. Still, he defended his committee's pre war scrutiny of Saddam's government and the Bush administration's decision to topple it.

"I saw clear justification " for the war, Warner said. "I made the decision I thought was right at the time, based on the information that was given me and I stand by it."

Warner said he watched in "total astonishment" as looters sacked the country's museums and government buildings and sectarian factions inside the country turned on one another.

"I guess it was just a failure... to understand some of the culture that goes back thousands of years in that region," he said.

Case Of The Dwindling Docket Mystifies The Supreme Court (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, December 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 6 — On the Supreme Court's color-coded master calendar, which was distributed months before the term began on the first Monday in October, Dec. 6 is marked in red to signify a day when the justices are scheduled to be on the bench, hearing arguments.

DOJ_NMG_0103385

The courtroom, however, was empty on Wednesday, and for a simple reason: The court was out of cases. The question is, where have all the cases gone?

Last year, during his Senate confirmation hearing, Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. said he thought the court had room on its docket and that it "could contribute more to the clarity and uniformity of the law by taking more cases."

But that has not happened. The court has taken about 40 percent fewer cases so far this term than last. It now faces noticeable gaps in its calendar for late winter and early spring. The December shortfall is the result of a pipeline empty of cases granted last term and carried over to this one.

The number of cases the court decided with signed opinions last term, 69, was the lowest since 1953 and fewer than half the number the court was deciding as recently as the mid-1980s. And aside from the school integration and global warming cases the court heard last week, along with the terrorism-related cases it has decided in the last few years, relatively few of the cases it is deciding speak to the core of the country's concerns.

The reasons for the decline all grow out of forces building for decades. The federal government has been losing fewer cases in the lower courts and so has less reason to appeal. As Congress enacts fewer laws, the justices have fewer statutes to interpret. And justices who think they might end up on the losing side of an important case might vote not to take it.

In a divided court, in a divided country, the court's reduced role is perhaps not surprising, nor is it necessarily a bad thing. "In the post-Bush v. Gore era, the court may be concerned about taking the wrong case and making an unpopular decision," said Frederick Schauer, a professor at the John F. Kennedy School of Government at Harvard, in an interview.

Professor Schauer argued in a recent and much-discussed Harvard Law Review article that the court's work "had only minimal direct engagement with the central issues of the nation's public and policy agenda." In an interview, he said, "I think they like being under the radar."

In private conversations, the justices themselves insist that nothing so profound is going on, but rather seem mystified at what they perceive as a paucity of cases that meet the court's standard criteria. The most important of those criteria is whether a case raises a question that has produced conflicting decisions among the lower federal courts.

But there are still plenty of lower-court conflicts that go unresolved, said Thomas C. Goldstein, a Supreme Court practitioner and close student of court statistics who wrote last week on the popular Scotusblog that the justices were "on the cusp of the greatest shortfall in filling the court's docket in recent memory, and likely in its modern history."

"I don't think we're at the end of history and have fixed all the problems," Mr. Goldstein said in an interview.

One theory is that the court is so closely divided that neither the liberals nor the conservatives want to risk granting a case in which, at the end of the day, they might not prevail. To grant a case takes four votes, which can be a heartbreaking distance from the five votes it takes to win. Scholars of the court call this risk-averse behavior "defensive denial."

While such behavior may account for a portion of the shortfall, it can hardly provide a global explanation, because only a relative handful of the 8,000 appeals that reach the court each term are ideologically charged.

Other, more neutral explanations provide likely pieces of the puzzle.

One is the decreasing number of appeals filed on behalf of the federal government by the solicitor general's office. Over the decades, the Supreme Court has granted cases filed by the solicitor general's office at a high rate. In the mid-1980s, the office was filing more than 50 petitions per term. But as the lower federal courts have become more conservative and the government has lost fewer cases, the number has plummeted, opening a substantial hole in the court's docket.

As recently as the court's 2000 term, the solicitor general filed 24 petitions, of which 17 were granted. Last term, it filed 10, of which the court granted 4. This term, the solicitor general has filed 13 petitions; the court has granted 5, denied 3 and is still considering the rest.

Another explanation lies across the street from the Supreme Court, in Congress.

Over the years, about half the court's docket has been made up not of constitutional cases, but of cases requiring the justices to interpret federal statutes. Statutes from the 1970s, including major environmental laws, antidiscrimination laws and Erisa, the employee-benefits law, have been staples of the court's docket for decades. But as Congress's willingness to pass new laws has waned, the flow of statutory cases has begun to dry up.

DOJ_NMG_0103386

Another possible explanation is the method by which the justices screen the thousands of petitions. Eight of the justices, all except Justice John Paul Stevens, pool their law clerks and have only one clerk make the initial recommendation for each case.

The recommendation is not binding, of course. But there is a built-in "institutional conservatism" in which law clerks are afraid to look overly credulous and so are reluctant to recommend a grant, according to Stephen M. Shapiro, a former deputy solicitor general who practices law in Chicago with Mayer, Brown, Rowe and Maw.

"Perhaps the clerks have been trained to be naysayers for so long that they don't know any other way," Mr. Shapiro said in an interview.

The sharpest drop in opinions came after William H. Rehnquist became chief justice in 1986. He had made clear his belief that the court under Chief Justice Warren E. Burger was taking too many cases, and Congress assisted in 1988 by eliminating from the court's jurisdiction a category of "mandatory" appeals to which the justices collectively had long objected.

In the early 1990s, after the number of decisions dropped to 107 from 145 in the space of five terms, Chief Justice Rehnquist responded to reporters' questions by commenting wryly that the Supreme Court would be the first institution of American government to fulfill Karl Marx's prophecy of the withering away of the state.

He was kidding, of course. The late chief justice believed in a muscular role for the court, and went on to show that he could accomplish more with less.

The question now, on a docket dominated by cases that only a law professor could love, is how much less.

"It's not obvious to me that the court should be doing more," said Orin Kerr, a visiting professor at the University of Chicago Law School who wrote on his blog that constitutional law scholars "are kind of bored these days."

In an interview, Professor Kerr said that while it was easy to say that the court should be doing something different, "no two people would agree on how it should change."

Democratic Wave In Congress Further Erodes Moderation In GOP (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, December 7, 2006

Iowa Rep. Jim Leach (R) seemed a natural to weather voters' antiwar sentiment this fall. His independent streak and moderate views had engendered the allegiance of his Democratic-leaning district for the past 30 years, and he broke with his party and President Bush in October 2002 by voting against the Iraq war.

Yet on Election Day, voters in Iowa's 2nd Congressional District ousted him in favor of an untested Democrat, a college professor -- a testament to the vulnerable position that Republican moderates found themselves in all year. Voters in Leach's district said that they respected him but that his party affiliation kept them from voting for him this year.

"He's a good guy, and he has integrity, and I think he has done a great job -- but he's still a Republican," said Jeremy Jackson, an Iowa City novelist.

With the defeat of Leach and several other Republican moderates Nov. 7, the Democrats' victory in the midterm election accelerates a three-decade-old pattern of declining moderate influence and rising conservative dominance in the Republican Party. By one measure, the GOP is more ideologically homogenous now than it has been in modern history. The waning moderate wing must find its place when the Democratic majority takes over in January.

"The irony of this election is that the public, in seeking change, has . . . weakened the center," Leach said recently. "In a sense, what has occurred is the strengthening of the edges of the parties."

Eight of the House's 20 most moderate Republicans lost their seats: Rob Simmons and Nancy L. Johnson (Conn.); Jeb Bradley and Charles Bass (N.H.); Michael G. Fitzpatrick and Curt Weldon (Pa.); Sue W. Kelly (N.Y.); and Leach. Also, moderate GOP Rep. Sherwood L. Boehlert (N.Y.), is retiring, and he will be replaced by Democrat Michael A. Arcuri, the Oneida County district attorney.

On the Senate side, the defeat of Lincoln D. Chafee (R-R.I.), a critic of the war who declined to vote for Bush's reelection in 2004, underscored the same trend.

By one measure, the 110th Congress will have the fewest moderates since the 19th century. This finding is based on an analysis of voting records by Keith T. Poole, a political science professor at the University of California at San Diego, and Howard Rosenthal, a New York University politics professor.

For the purpose of the study, a moderate is defined as someone whose votes consistently fall near the middle of the political spectrum on both fiscal and social issues.

The decline in moderates has had a greater impact on Republicans than Democrats. According to Poole's calculations, almost half of House Republicans were moderates 30 years ago, compared to well under 10 percent today. The professors argue that the decline of moderates in Congress has increased polarization.

To some moderate Republicans, the message of the Nov. 7 election was clear: The only path back to the majority is through the political center. With a small and shrinking membership, however, it is unclear whether the moderate wing will have much influence over the future direction of the GOP.

"There's a faction in the Republican conference that believes we lost the majority because we were never fiscally conservative enough, we were not socially conservative enough," Bass said. Indeed, over the last 12 years, the increasing conservative dominance in the GOP has mirrored growing Republican dominance in Washington -- first in Congress, then the White House.

Rep. Michael N. Castle (R-Del.), a prominent moderate, said he expects that his party will hold a series of internal debates next year about when to work with the Democrats and when to resist. Throughout the 109th Congress, moderates sided with the Democrats on such issues as stem cell research, drilling in Alaska's Arctic National Wildlife Refuge and overhauling immigration policy. Castle says moderates could build consensus on two issues likely to create fireworks between the parties: devising a new strategy in Iraq and reshaping lobbying.

Another moderate, Rep. Charles W. Dent (Pa.), said there is room for agreement within the GOP on tax and budget issues and on efforts to restore fiscal discipline and restrain the growth of government. "I think voters sent us a message" to get back to those types of issues, he said.

An important factor in the Democrats' victory in the midterm election was that independent and moderate voters abandoned the GOP in droves. Since the 2002 midterms, support for the Republican Party has declined seven percentage points among moderates and nine percentage points among independents, according to exit polls.

That trend was at play in Leach's eastern Iowa district, which includes rolling hills and farmland and high-tech plants and offices in Cedar Rapids. In 2004, Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) won 59 percent of the vote in the district, more than he won in any other Republican-held congressional district. Still, Leach, a Princeton graduate and one-time U.S. Foreign Service officer, defeated his opponent 59 percent to 39 percent.

During the past two years, as the president's approval rating plummeted and Iowa voters grew dissatisfied with Republican rule in Washington, Leach argued that the best way to alter the policies of the GOP and Congress was to elect more moderates to strengthen the political center.

That argument resonated with much of his district, but not in Iowa City, a heavily populated Democratic bastion and home to the University of Iowa. It was there that David Loebsack, a first-time Democratic candidate, carried a huge majority -- enough to unseat Leach, 51 percent to 48 percent.

"My opponent would have suggested the real change in Washington would be to get a check on Republican power," Leach said. "My opponent was clearly perceived as compelling in this election."

Loebsack said: "The party had moved away from him over the course of a number of years. His argument that he could bring them back to the center didn't wash any longer."

While Leach was going down, another prominent Republican moderate, Rep. Christopher Shays (Conn.), managed to hold on. Shays, unlike Leach, had supported Bush's war policies, despite strong antiwar sentiment in Connecticut.

Shays faced the same opponent he did in 2004, town official Diane Farrell, who had campaigned against him hard for two years. Shays knew he was a top target all year long, which gave him -- and Republicans in Washington -- time to raise and spend money to defend the seat. He also slowly altered his stance on the conduct of the war and called for the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

DOJ_NMG_0103388

Leach's vulnerability emerged late in the election. But when the Republican House campaign committee sent out two mailings attacking Loebsack, Leach, who had never run a negative campaign, told the party to stop the mailings.

Snowe Wants To Encourage Bipartisan Get-Togethers (RC)

By Emily Pierce

Roll Call, December 7, 2006

Sen. Olympia Snowe (R-Maine) quietly is laying the groundwork to overhaul the Senate Centrist Coalition into a regular bipartisan working group that eschews ideological labels.

Snowe, who co-chairs the coalition with Sen. Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.), said she wants to change the name of the group and hopes to invite a broader cross-section of the Senate to attend breakfasts or lunches, potentially on a weekly basis, that are designed to foster bipartisanship in the new Congress.

"There is no forum" for bipartisanship, Snowe said in an interview last week. "Republicans and Democrats meet. They just never meet together just to have a conversation."

She said she envisioned the relaunched gatherings as a "breakfast or a lunch, or something, in some way, to get together to have a forum just for creating the atmosphere" conducive to working across the aisle on legislation.

Snowe noted that the meetings need not be focused on a particular issue, but should merely offer a place to go for building relationships and friendships. Still, she cautioned that she is continuing to vet her ideas with Lieberman and others, and that nothing has been decided yet.

Lieberman said he and Snowe's staff still are talking about the future of the Centrist Coalition, but he added that the group could have a big impact in the 110th Congress.

"It's an important group, and I think there's a new receptivity here to bipartisanship after the election," said Lieberman, who beat back a tough challenge from the left this year, in part by emphasizing his ability to work with Republicans.

Snowe said the impetus for considering a new configuration for the group comes from the recent election, which swept Republicans out of power in Congress and hurt moderates, especially from the Northeast, particularly hard.

"The message from the American people was that they ... are impatient with the polarization and the hostility that has emanated from Washington. So they sent a very strong and stern message," she said.

Sen. Mark Pryor (D-Ark.), a current Centrist Coalition member, said he was receptive to the idea of broadening the group.

"I think that would help, because Senators need a place where they can come and work with each other without having their head chopped off," he said.

Sen. Gordon Smith (R-Ore.), another coalition member, agreed, saying that bipartisanship "in the past has been frustrated by the party conference agenda."

Snowe said the current Senate Centrist Coalition, which is made up of Democrats and Republicans who consider themselves middle-of-the-road ideologically, creates a dilemma for her because she believes that true bipartisanship must be developed among Members of all ideological perspectives.

"We want the name to not describe any particular philosophy," Snowe said, throwing out an idea to call it "the Thursday Group" or something equivalent that does not indicate ideology.

Plus, she said, many Members who may have moderate-to-centrist views on some subjects don't necessarily want to be labeled "centrist."

"There are a lot of people in the Senate who are not moderates but who do want to see legislation move," Pryor echoed. "So 'centrist' may not be the right title" for the group.

Many well-known Senate dealmakers sit on either the left or right of the ideological spectrum, including Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.), Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) and Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.).

During the turbulent days before the bipartisan "Gang of 14" brokered a deal preventing Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) from eliminating the right to filibuster judicial nominations, McCain and Graham attended a Centrist Coalition meeting at which Frist and Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) talked about the "nuclear" option.

DOJ_NMG_0103389

While most of the attendees of the May 17, 2005, meeting, including the two leaders, were seated at a conference table, McCain sat on a couch. When asked why he didn't join the group at the table, McCain responded, "I'm not a centrist," according to an aide who was present at the meeting.

That explains why Snowe considers the Gang of 14 a good model of the types of people who might be interested. Besides centrists such as Snowe, left-of-center Democratic Sens. Robert Byrd (W.Va.) and Daniel Inouye (Hawaii) and conservatives such as Graham and McCain also were involved in the group. And conservative Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) was one the first Members to seek a compromise on the nuclear option, before pulling back in deference to Frist.

In addition, Snowe said she hopes that a bipartisan group dedicated to breaking logjams in the Senate would not be necessary all the time.

"You hope that we can return to the process of having the committees work through their differences and come up with those solutions," Snowe said. She added that she wants to give both incoming Majority Leader Reid and incoming Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) a chance to forge compromises before having the new group jump in.

"We never try to get ahead of the leadership," she said. "If something fails, that's where you can help to step in if necessary."

Of course, Snowe isn't the only Senator looking to create a group of bipartisan consensus-makers. Maine's other Senator, Susan Collins (R), and Louisiana Democratic Sen. Mary Landrieu have said they are working to create a similar group. They have been talking about carrying the spirit of the Gang of 14 into other legislative issues that might bedevil party leaders in the 110th Congress.

Snowe said she doesn't see the need for competing groups and indicated that she believes some bipartisan group will emerge, whether it comes from the foundations of the Centrist Coalition or elsewhere.

"Maybe it's just knowing that there are a number of different Senators, depending on the issue, that might be willing to work across party lines and build personal relationships," she said.

Still, Snowe cautioned that the plan to expand the Centrist Coalition could fail if Senators don't commit themselves to the group. And that could be a problem, given that Members have so many competing interests and obligations.

"As a Senator, you are so busy. And the agenda is so compact that there is very little forgiveness for doing or taking on additional commitments," she said.

Blue Dogs Promise Bipartisanship (HILL)

By Cameron Joseph

The Hill, December 7, 2006

In a luncheon yesterday, members of the fiscally centrist Democratic Blue Dog Coalition promised to build bipartisan consensus to establish "fiscal sanity" and attempt to improve government accountability, transparency and oversight.

"This country is desperate for the middle, desperate for common-sense solutions," said Rep. John Tanner (D-Tenn.).

"We have to tear down that aisle between Republicans and Democrats," said Rep. Allen Boyd (D-Fla.).

Rep. Mike Ross (D-Ark.) said Democrats only have a short time to prove they can work across the aisle to get things done.

"The message that was sent on election night was not that the American people chose Democrats to lead the country out of this mess — they fired the current Republican leadership. We have a narrow window of opportunity to prove we can do better."

President Bush has invited members of the centrist Blue Dog and New Democrat coalitions to the White House on Friday to discuss areas "of mutual cooperation," in the words of one Democratic aid.

Alexander Defectors Were Collins, Warner (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, December 7, 2006

Sen. Trent Lott's (R-Miss.) stunning return to the Senate leadership was made possible by the last-minute defections of Sens. John Warner (R-Va.) and Susan Collins (R-Maine) from Sen. Lamar Alexander's (R-Tenn.) rival campaign for Republican whip.

Ironically, four years earlier, Warner and Collins helped drive Lott from leadership by giving his rivals support at crucial moments during the controversy over his comments at the 100th birthday party of the late Sen. Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.).

DOJ_NMG_0103390

The week before last month's leadership election, Alexander told reporters that he had been promised enough votes to become whip. He said he was working to achieve a consensus of support within the GOP conference.

But when senators cast secret ballots the next day in the Old Senate Chamber, Alexander garnered only 24 votes. Lott collected 25, giving him a one-vote upset victory.

Lott was able to win because of the last-minute support of several wavering centrists, including Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.). Those votes came his way in the final hours because of the work of a small band of strong supporters such as Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.), Ted Stevens (R-Alaska), Judd Gregg (R-N.H.), John Thune (R-S.D.), and John Sununu (R-N.H.).

The day before the election, Alexander believed he had received promises of support from 28 of his colleagues. But he suspected that one of his pledged supporters, Warner, was wavering, and confronted him about his position, said a person familiar with the sequence of events.

Warner told Alexander that he was in fact planning instead to support Lott, a longtime ally. It was at least the second time Warner flipped on the question of Lott's role in the Republican leadership.

Four years earlier, Warner had been one of Lott's strongest defenders during the controversy that erupted after Lott praised Thurmond with an off-the-cuff suggestion that the country would have done well to have supported his 1948 segregationist presidential campaign.

But Warner later surprised his old friend when he told him he would support Sen. Bill Frist's (R-Tenn.) campaign to replace him as majority leader, according to Lott's memoir "Herding Cats: A Life in Politics."

"Warner eventually phoned me, stating cheerily that he was on the Frist team," Lott wrote.

Warner's later defection back to Lott's camp may have surprised Alexander, but he still thought he had the whip race in hand because 27 other Republicans had promised to support him, he said. One Lott ally said McCain was instrumental in persuading Warner to switch his support to Lott. Lott also held a long meeting with Warner.

After the vote, Alexander did not know who else deserted him.

"I wrote 27 thank you letters for 24 votes," said Alexander yesterday.

Collins received a thank-you letter even though, according to Senate sources, she also defected from Alexander despite reiterating her support for him the day before the vote.

Lott's allies pursued Collins vigorously right up until the day she was to cast her ballot.

Thune was seen having dinner with Collins and several other people the night before the vote, according to a witness. Thune's office declined to comment.

Another source said Gregg worked on Collins as well. A third said McCain lobbied Collins, with whom he is close and regularly meets over lunch.

During the secret vote, Collins's nervous body language led Alexander's allies to suspect that she had switched at the final moment.

But Collins declined in an interview yesterday to reveal how she voted.

"I'm not going to discuss my votes in the whip race," she said.

Four years earlier, Collins abandoned Lott at a crucial moment, Lott recounts in his memoir.

During a conference call with colleagues during the Thurmond controversy, Warner, who at the time was defending Lott, urged his fellow lawmakers to declare their support publicly for the embattled Mississippian. But then-Republican Whip Don Nickles (R-Okla.), who was angling to replace Lott, urged the vote on supporting Lott to be delayed.

"Nickles's monkey wrench quickly attracted support from several others. 'He's right. Let's wait to vote,' Collins said," Lott wrote in his book. "Frist also expressed reservations about a vote then and there — a sign of things to come."

Alexander yesterday declined to say whether Collins had promised to support him, declaring that he was ready to move forward and adding, "I've closed the investigation as to who might have changed."

Alexander said he had hoped until the last moment that Specter would vote for him. The senior centrist had remained steadfastly undecided during lobbying for his vote.

DOJ_NMG_0103391

Specter said in an interview that he met Alexander and Lott separately in the days before the vote. He said he telephoned Alexander the morning of the election to tell him that he would support Lott. He then told Lott.

Alexander said Specter handled himself like a "perfect gentleman."

Many observers of the race between Alexander and Lott have speculated that Lott knew he had the votes to win when he publicly declared that he would enter the race a few days before the votes were to be cast.

But a former Republican aide said Lott did not know that he had enough votes, but that he was confident he could win the support he needed.

The former aide said there are two things important for being a whip.

"One is being able to count the votes and the other is being able to get the votes," said the source.

Lott Fills Out Team, With Thune At Top (RC)

By Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, December 7, 2006

Incoming Senate Minority Whip Trent Lott (R-Miss.) has opted to dramatically cut the size of the GOP vote-counting team in the next Congress, assembling a group of eight loyalists, led by South Dakota Sen. John Thune, to aid in the party's floor efforts.

Insiders suggested the size and membership of the whip team could be a sign that Lott is likely to rely heavily on his own experience and floor know-how to keep his party unified in the 110th Congress.

Lott's whip organization largely consists of junior, up-and-coming Senators who supported his bid for the No. 2 GOP leadership slot, in which he bested Sen. Lamar Alexander (Tenn.) by just one vote in a secret ballot tally last month.

In addition to Thune, who will serve as Chief Deputy Minority Whip, Lott has brought on GOP Sens. Richard Burr (N.C.), Larry Craig (Idaho), Norm Coleman (Minn.), James Inhofe (Okla.), Olympia Snowe (Maine), John Sununu (N.H.) and David Vitter (La.) to round out his team. Thune, Burr, Vitter, Coleman and Sununu are in their first terms.

A Western conservative who ousted then-Minority Leader Tom Daschle (D) in 2004, Thune already was viewed as a rising star in the Republican Conference. He initially was expected to take the job of chairman of the National Republican Senatorial Committee for the 2008 cycle but opted against pursuing the post last summer, citing travel and time commitments.

Lott said in a statement that his South Dakota colleague "has demonstrated outstanding leadership skills." Like several of the team of eight, Thune was one of Lott's key vote counters during his quiet campaign against Alexander.

"I want to put his clout to work in developing the whip strategy to get the votes for our priorities," Lott said. "John will be actively engaged in our leadership team."

For his part, Thune said Lott had assembled "a great team."

"We have some heavy lifting ahead of us in terms of the agenda, especially now that we're in the minority," he added. "It is a good opportunity for me to continue to learn from someone who has the experience that Sen. Lott has."

Sources close to Lott said the Mississippian sought to create a diverse whip organization that could reach out to Republicans of all ideological and geographical stripes. His group includes two Northeasterners, three Southerners and three Western-state Senators. It also boasts a moderate in Snowe, a conservative standard-bearer in Craig and Senators from classic swing states in Coleman and Sununu.

Coleman said he signed on because he wanted to see the GOP agenda advance in the next Congress.

"One of our failures [as a majority] is that we didn't get things done, and we paid a price for it," the Minnesota Republican said.

Those close to Lott noted that he wanted his team to include Senators whom he trusts and who would have the energy and commitment to work with him to ensure party unity.

"A very good, smart and calculated team," said one Lott ally.

The organization is about half the size of current Majority Whip Mitch McConnell's (Ky.) team of 14. McConnell, however, was responsible for counting the votes of 55 Republican Senators in the 109th Congress.

McConnell officially moves from Majority Whip to Minority Leader on Jan. 3.

DOJ_NMG_0103392

Lott also is planning on a smaller staff structure for his leadership office. Lott's current senior policy adviser, Manny Rossman, will serve as chief of staff, while Susan Wells, his staff director on the Rules and Administration Committee, also will take a senior position in the whip shop.

The lean nature of the Lott structure is not surprising, as he has twice served as the Republican whip, once in the House and previously in the Senate. He also earned a reputation for his knowledge of Senate procedures after having served as the chairman of the Rules Committee and as Majority Leader for six years.

Lott led his party until 2002 when he was forced to step aside after delivering what were perceived as insensitive remarks at the 100th birthday party of then-Sen. Strom Thurmond (S.C.).

In his speech returning to leadership, Lott sought to put to rest, once and for all, concerns over his fall from grace, apologizing emotionally before his fellow lawmakers. Lott also vowed to work hand in hand with McConnell and sought to dispel any suggestion that he had sights on returning to the top Republican leadership job.

Hensarling Triumphs In RSC Race (HILL)

By Patrick O'connor

The Hill, December 7, 2006

Rep. Jeb Hensarling (R-Texas) triumphed yesterday in his bid to chair the conservative Republican Study Committee during the 110th Congress, beating Rep. Todd Tiahrt (R-Kan.) 57-42.

Hensarling, an outspoken second-term conservative who has faced off with Republican leaders on budget and spending issues, won the chairmanship despite Tiahrt's nomination by the group's three remaining founders.

With Republicans assuming the minority next year, Hensarling hinted that the RSC's role in the conference would shift somewhat, from that of agitator in the majority to educator in the minority.

"Public squabbles are a luxury of the majority," Hensarling said afterward.

Tiahrt, an appropriator, was viewed by many as the leadership-backed candidate whose job it would be to rein in upstarts on the committee, but Hensarling and the Kansas Republican both dismissed that suggestion yesterday.

"The only leadership guy who got involved is [Chief Deputy Whip] Eric Cantor (R-Va.), and he backed my opponent," Tiahrt said before the election. "I think that's an unfair charge."

Hensarling suggested that the role of the RSC and its members in the minority would be to educate all members of the party on conservative principles as leaders present an alternative to the Democratic agenda.

The newly elected chairman pledged to take a stand, though, if he believes the party is moving away from core conservative principles.

Hensarling and a core group of outspoken RSC members, including Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.), the outgoing chairman, led public showdowns with the White House, the Republican leadership and lawmakers on the Appropriations panel over a series of budget and spending issues during the 109th Congress.

Before the race, many RSC members believed the race would be tight and that attendance would be a crucial determining factor. Indeed, the turnout for yesterday's election was higher than expected, with nominal members who rarely attend meetings, such as Rep. Tom Reynolds (R-N.Y.), showing up to cast their vote.

Aides to RSC staff members were barred from the Budget Committee hearing room where the election took place; they crowded the Cannon House Office Building hallway until their bosses emerged.

Hensarling's team entered the room yesterday believing it had the support of 56 RSC members, one less than his final tally, an aide said afterward. Tiahrt expressed similar confidence early yesterday morning.

Rep. Paul Ryan (R-Wis.), a fellow budget hawk, nominated Hensarling in the closed-door session, with Pence and Rep. Marilyn Musgrave (R-Colo.) delivering seconding speeches.

Rep. Sam Johnson (R-Texas), one of the group's original founders who has close ties to Minority Leader-elect John Boehner (R-Ohio), nominated Tiahrt, with Reps. Mark Souder (R-Ind.) and Cathy McMorris (R-Wash.) giving his seconding speeches.

DOJ_NMG_0103393

Before the election, Johnson highlighted Tiahrt's service on the Appropriations panel and his knowledge of the leadership as his principle qualifications for the job.

Afterward, Hensarling thanked Tiahrt for running and said he would start sitting down with members of the committee as soon as possible to learn what issues they would like the committee to highlight over the next two years.

Asked about his plans after the race, Hensarling joked that he would drink a Diet Dr. Pepper and call his wife, Melissa.

"It's a humbling experience to be asked to lead the Republican Study Committee," he said.

Kilpatrick Tapped To Lead Black Caucus (AP)

By Ben Evans

AP, December 7, 2006

The Congressional Black Caucus on Wednesday tapped Rep. Carolyn Cheeks Kilpatrick as its chairwoman for the next two years, when black lawmakers will wield more power in Congress than ever.

Kilpatrick, D-Mich., a former school teacher and the mother of Detroit Mayor Kwame Kilpatrick, was chosen unanimously. She succeeds Rep. Mel Watt, D-N.C.

"Watch for us," Kilpatrick told reporters. "We will take this caucus to another level."

Because Democrats will be in control when Congress convenes a new session Jan. 4, the 43-member caucus will take up a historic slate of leadership positions, including the third-ranking member in the House, Majority Whip James Clyburn of South Carolina.

It also will count as members four likely committee heads, up to 20 subcommittee leaders, and the only black senator, Barack Obama of Illinois, a possible presidential candidate.

"That's more power than African-Americans have ever had in the Congress of the United States," said Ronald Walters, a political scientist and director of the African American Leadership Institute at the University of Maryland.

Kilpatrick said she would continue the organization's focus on issues such as health care, housing and education. Watt said the caucus also would seek to address racial inequities in the criminal justice system and the crisis in Sudan's Darfur province.

Walters cautioned against expectations that black leaders would win dramatic legislative victories. Instead, he said, they probably will join Democratic leaders in charting a moderate course.

"They're going to be circumspect in what they do in this period because it's going to affect the politics of 2008," Walters said. "I would expect that they would be very cautious."

Nonetheless, the shift marks a dramatic turnabout from current Republican rule; there are no black Republicans in Congress much less committee chairmen or party leaders.

The black lawmakers will have direct oversight on issues such as tax policy, homeland security and the legal system. With their committee gavels will come the ability to shape the public agenda through hearings and to regulate which bills get a public airing.

"The Congress is going to look like America. At least our side of the aisle will look like America," said Georgia Democrat John Lewis, a civil rights leader who marched alongside the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. in the 1960s before winning his House seat in 1986. "This is a historic Congress. It's amazing what we're going to be able to do."

"Our problem is going to be more than anything else to find the resources," he added.

Kilpatrick, 61, has represented a Detroit-area district since 1997.

California Rep. Barbara Lee also sought the leadership post but stepped aside as it became clear Kilpatrick had more support.

Postcampaign Lobbying Thrives (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings

The Wall Street Journal, December 7, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Democrats may be promising a clampdown on lobbyist freebies once they take control of Congress. But ahead of that push, party leaders are collecting lobbyists' checks, while Democratic staffers angle for jobs inside their well-appointed offices.Verizon Communications Inc. earlier this week sponsored a reception for newly elected Missouri Sen. Claire McCaskill. Illinois Democratic Rep. Melissa Bean was the beneficiary of a Tuesday night fund-raiser in the new Capitol Hill offices of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. In addition to retiring Ms. Bean's debt, Chamber Political Director Bill Miller said the reception was a chance for corporations and lobbyists who didn't back her re-election to "meet her and see what a great representative she is."

DOJ_NMG_0103394

Yesterday, Illinois Rep. Rahm Emanuel, mastermind of the Democrats' House takeover, accepted donations at Sonoma, a trendy Capitol Hill restaurant that features California cuisine to match the wine list, for his leadership committee, a type of account employed by ambitious lawmakers to make donations and curry favor with their colleagues.

Separately, Moses Mercado, the Democratic National Committee's deputy executive director, will soon be joining the Federalist Group, a lobbying group with close ties to the White House that went bipartisan about a year ago. Mr. Mercado "can help our clients deal with the new majority on Capitol Hill," says Wayne Berman, the Republican founder of the firm. Senior aides to incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid also have been snatched up by lobbying shops, while Democratic lobbying firms, largely frozen out in Washington for years, are being courted by dozens of new potential clients.

Postelection fund-raising and political repositioning are hardly new in Washington. Candidates routinely use the last months of an election cycle to clear campaign debt. Lobbyists use the time to target freshmen who haven't staked out firm positions on the vast array of issues that come before Congress.

But the cycle turns especially intense when a major power shift is under way -- as is the case this year, for the first time since Republicans took Congress in 1994. For instance, receptions such as those being held this week, coinciding with the return of Congress for its lame-duck session, are prime networking opportunity for lobbying shops looking to hire Democrats, and aides looking to cash in on their new status.

Moreover, this year's packed schedule of fund-raisers and "debt reduction" events comes as incoming Democratic leaders tout a curb on the influence of lobbyists in Congress as a top priority when they take over next month.

Democrats are pushing to change lobbying rules after a string of scandals that tarnished Republican leaders and contributed to the defeat of several incumbents. Among the most notorious was that involving former lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who financed elaborate trips and provided free dinners to lawmakers and key aides to win help for his clients.

Incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi says she plans to make changes in House ethics rules the centerpiece agenda item for the new Congress. She successfully pressed House Democrats to cancel a planned caucus ski retreat in Vail, Colo., in January because it was likely to draw dozens of lobbyists and send a message that it was business as usual in Washington.

But the Pelosi rule changes will largely affect how lobbyists and lawmakers interact during the legislative calendar, when Congress is debating and voting on policy matters. They are aimed at curbing lobbyists' ability to lavish lawmakers with free trips, meals and gifts, such as skybox seats at major concerts and sporting events.

The new rules won't change the campaign-finance rules that dictate giving during the political season -- and that is what this week's events are all about.

"We will break the link between lobbyists and legislating," said Pelosi spokesman Brendan Daly. "People still need to raise money to run campaigns."

Fueling the frenzy is the Democrats' big victories in both the House and Senate, which caught some lobbyists by surprise and made them eager to make new friends. Campaign donations are recorded on an annual basis, so a check given now counts toward the 2005-2006 cycle. That gives lobbyists a window in which they can appear to be standing with a candidate at the time of the midterm victories. It also allows them to clear the way for yet another donation when the new Congress officially convenes in January.

It is akin to the business practice of "cleaning up the balance sheet before the quarter ends," says Anthony Corrado, a political-giving expert at Colby College, Waterville, Maine.

Some companies and lobbyists began shifting more donations to Democrats before Election Day. But Political Money Line, an organization that tracks political giving, reported last month that federal political action committees -- the kitties used by corporations and organizations to make donations -- held back $280 million in the final days of the midterm races. That is money now being tapped to welcome the old and new Democratic leaders back to town.

DOJ_NMG_0103395

Burlington Northern Santa Fe Corp.'s RAILPAC this week reported postelection donations of $5,000 to the centrist New Democrat Coalition, $1,000 to newly elected Ohio Democratic Sen. Sherrod Brown and another $1,000 to incoming Colorado Democratic Rep. Ed Perlmutter.

To be sure, Republicans continue to raise cash too. Newly elected Tennessee Sen. Bob Corker is having his own "debt reduction" party this week. But for Democrats, whose minority status left them to struggle with postelection debt for the past 12 years, this is a prime opportunity to pay off debts from 2006, or to raise money for 2008.

Or to bask in their newly empowered status. Last night, incoming House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles Rangel hosted a Capitol Hill fund-raiser for his leadership committee. Mr. Rangel has never been seriously challenged. He was elected in 1970 with 87% of the vote and has won re-election by margins of more than 90 points ever since. But the New York congressman did shell out $370,000 to the House re-election committee to help his colleagues in last month's races. He now has a chance to recoup that investment -- and more.

Both the Democratic House re-election committee and Senate re-election committee have held events recently. The Senate reception Tuesday night was at the Acadiana Restaurant near Capitol Hill, featuring Louisiana cuisine. About a dozen senators attended, along with roughly 200 supporters and lobbyists, says an attendee.

Entry into the Senate and House committee fund-raisers ranged from $15,000 for those who want to be "co-hosts" to $2,500 for those content to be simply "guests." Invitations to both events were dispatched by e-mail to lobbying offices throughout the city. One Democratic lobbyist said the biggest change for him since the elections is, "I've got all these debt-reduction receptions to attend."

If Congress Is Serious About Reform, Here's What It Looks Like (HILL)

The Hill, December 7, 2006

Just in case the incoming Democratic majority is serious about real ethics reform, here are a few ideas for its members to consider:

Ban spousal and family employment by campaign committees and PACs.

This is not a new phenomenon. Sen. Harry Truman hired his wife, Bess, to work on his public payroll at a $2,500 salary (this when senators were paid $10,000). Worried about media criticism, he urged her to "only just drop in and do some signing of letters. It helps all concerned." Truman was right to be concerned. It was wrong then and it's wrong now.

Rep. Jesse Jackson Jr. (D-Ill.) opened the floodgates to the latest version of this abuse when he secured a ruling from the FEC allowing him to hire his wife as a fundraiser on his campaign payroll. In his case, his wife was an experienced campaign aide. But now 30 members have employed their wives or other family members on their campaign or PAC payrolls.

Whether these people are competent or not is beside the point. Campaign contributions are not bribes because they are not personal income. But when the campaign money flows to a spouse, the contributions become income for the member. This thinly veiled way to launder campaign contributions so that they add to the family income should be banned. Hiring of other family members should also be prohibited.

Those who have hired spouses and family members include: Reps. Richard Pombo (R-Calif.), wife and two brothers; Zoe Lofgren (D-Calif.), husband's law firm; Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.), wife and step-daughter; John Doolittle (R-Calif.), wife; Ralph Hall (R-Texas), daughter-in-law; Pete Stark (D-Calif.), wife; Buck McKeon (R-Calif.), wife; Ron Lewis (R-Ky.), wife; Bart Stupak (D-Mich.), wife; Jim Costa (D-Calif.), cousin; Dana Rohrabacher (R-Calif.), wife; Dave Reichert (R-Wash.), nephew; Chris Cannon (R-Utah), three daughters; Lincoln Davis (D-Tenn.), sister-in-law and daughter; Louie Gohmert (R-Texas), wife; Tim Bishop (D-N.Y.), daughter; Bob Filner (D-Calif.), wife; J.D. Hayworth (R-Ariz.), wife; Bob Inglis (R-S.C.), wife; Elton Gallegly (R-Calif.), wife; Sherwood Boehlert (R-N.Y.), wife; John Sweeney (R-N.Y.), wife; Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.), wife; Ed Pastor (D-Ariz.), nephew; John Shadegg (R-Ariz.), son; and Howard Berman (D-Calif.), brother Michael's political consulting firm; Sens. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.), son; and Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.), son and daughter during vice presidential race; and ex-Reps. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), wife; and Tom DeLay (R-Texas), wife and daughter.

Ban immediate family members of senators or congressmen from lobbying Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0103396

An only slightly more removed form of family enrichment is the increasingly frequent hiring of the wives or children of congressmen or senators as lobbyists. House Speaker Dennis Hastert's (R-Ill.) son, for example, closed his music business in Illinois and moved to Washington where he was eventually hired to lobby for Google. Incoming Majority Leader Harry Reid's (D-Nev.) son and son-in-law are lobbyists. The wife of House Republican Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) is a lobbyist who hawks for tobacco companies, one of the congressman's biggest contributors. While legislators piously maintain that family members do not lobby them and some even bar them from communicating with their offices, their status as family members of key legislators is well known to their colleagues, who cannot avoid feeling pressure to give them special advantage.

Restore presidential power to line-item veto earmarks in appropriations bills and reverse the anti-impoundment legislation passed during the Nixon administration.

It is only by letting the administration police appropriations bills that the massive conflicts of interest inherent in the earmarking-for-campaign-contributions scam can be stopped.

Proposals to require public reporting of who has inserted what earmark will not be effective since most members are quite proud of their earmarks and would not only not mind public disclosure, but would actually likely welcome it.

And finally:

• Require lobbyists to disclose the specific bills that they are lobbying for or against on the lobbying registration forms.

• Ban all privately paid travel by members, including use of corporate jets.

• Require electronic filing of all travel disclosures for private and government travel.

• Require both chambers to work a full week, instead of the two- to three-day schedule they've had for the past few years.

• Don't hold your breath waiting for these reforms, but they do represent what Congress should do if it wants to come clean.

Do-Something Congress (WP)

The Washington Post, December 7, 2006

WHEN DEMOCRATS take over the House next year, the regular workweek will stretch to a backbreaking five days -- up from the now-customary Tuesday-through-Thursday arrangement. Members of the House and Senate -- no doubt reeling from the two weeks they've worked since the election -- will have a mere four weeks off after they leave town Friday. Hard to believe, but the new leadership actually expects them to come to work on Jan. 4 rather than enjoy the usual elongated holiday break as they wait around for the president to deliver his State of the Union address in late January. In the Senate, the weeklong March break is being eliminated and the two-week April vacation cut in half.

This kind of punishing schedule is enough to unite lawmakers of both parties, in both chambers, in a chorus of behind-the-scenes bipartisan grumbling. What, us work?

It would be quite a change. The 109th Congress will have been in session for a grand total of 103 days this year, which, as Lyndsey Layton pointed out in yesterday's Post, is seven days fewer than the "Do-Nothing Congress" of 1948. An ordinary full-time worker with a generous four weeks of vacation would have clocked 240 days of work during that same period.

Yes, lawmakers do work back home, and they need time to campaign and to grub for campaign cash. But it's undeniable that the time lawmakers spend in the capital, actually legislating, has been on a downward path for the past few decades. According to the American Enterprise Institute's Norman Ornstein, the average number of days in session for a two-year Congress has dropped from 323 in the 1960s and '70s to just 250 during the first six years of the Bush presidency.

This saps lawmakers' ability to get much done. It's one explanation, though not the only one, for why they were able to finish work on only two spending bills this year. It takes a toll, too, in less measurable ways, on congressional civility and bipartisanship. How can lawmakers forge friendships -- or even learn to get along -- when they're barely in town long enough to learn each other's names?

It's amazing enough that the incoming leaders are meeting private resistance from lawmakers who've gotten used to this drop-by legislating. It's even more amazing that some of them have the audacity to complain about it publicly. "Keeping us up here eats away at families," Rep. Jack Kingston (R-Ga.) told The Post. Democrats, he said, "could care less about families -- that's what this says." Eats away at families? Gee, Mr. Kingston, they could move here. And, we wonder: Where, exactly, did you think the Capitol was when you ran for this job?

No Hard Feelings, Ken (RC)

By Mary Ann Akers, Roll Call Staff

Roll Call, December 7, 2006

Outgoing Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman got some friendly advice about his career prospects Wednesday from a most unlikely source: Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.).

Emanuel was walking down the hall when he spotted Mehlman in the tiny Capitol branch of the Congressional Federal Credit Union, where Mehlman, a former House staffer, still does his personal banking. Emanuel, who can and does take an enormous amount of credit for winning back the House for Democrats, clearly has a lot more to cheer about these days than does Mehlman. So it was fitting that Rahmbo gave his deflated pal/political nemesis a mini-bear hug when he saw him, before beginning the inquisition.

What next? What job, Kenny? Mehlman explained he was talking to law firms around town. Emanuel wouldn't hear of it.

"What about the banks, what about the banks?" the type-A departing Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee chairman asked.

Before Mehlman, a lawyer, could fully answer, Emanuel instructed: "Banking, Ken, that's where the money is."

A Roll Call reporter who happened to be doing his own personal banking at the time turned to Mehlman and laughed: "He knows what he's talking about with banking."

"I know, I know," Mehlman said.

And don't we all. After leaving the administration of former President Bill Clinton, Emanuel went back to the Windy City and made a cool $16 million in just two and a half years as an investment banker with zero experience.

Come on, Kenny, if Rahm can do it, you can, too!

RIAA Rocks. It's that time of year again, when lusty holiday partygoers anxiously await that golden invitation from the Recording Industry Association of America. It arrived Wednesday in all its glory, announcing that this year's surprise entertainment will be the Barenaked Ladies.

Go ahead, you hipster music snobs, turn up your noses and miss the best party of the season. HOH shall not — the bash will kick off Hanukkah in style at sundown Dec. 15 at Platinum Night Club on F Street Northwest, where, even if we don't get jiggy wit it, we'll be bebopping our heads to the melodious "If I Had $1000000" tune.

And for those of you in other (yes, older) generations who may wonder whether the Barenaked Ladies are a harbinger of the Democratic-controlled times to come, the RIAA gave careful consideration to folks like you.

A high-level music source involved with the party told HOH: "In a sign that the seismic shift in control hasn't quite yet gotten through to RIAA head and former [Senate Majority Leader Bill] Frist staffer Mitch Bainwol, there was apparently some debate over whether we could do a party with a band called 'Barenaked Ladies.'"

But then they must have figured, if you can have a poker party with 'em, why not a Christmas party?

Stork Strikes, Big Time. Congratulations and good luck to Ashley Turton, chief of staff to Rep. Rosa DeLauro (D-Conn.), who has not one but two babies on her hands.

Both babies, twin boys, are home safe and healthy now after a rough-and-tumble start to life. They were both hospitalized for about a month after the stork arrived too early (as he's prone to do with twins) on Oct. 17.

Baby Shaw weighed 4 pounds, 1 ounce while his brother, Lane, weighed 2 pounds, 12 ounces.

After delivering the twins, while they remained in the hospital, Turton went back to work, helping her party regain control of the House. Now that the babies are at home, she's working a little here, a little there, staffing DeLauro in her new capacity as co-chairwoman of the Democratic Steering and Policy Committee. And enjoying motherhood.

"After working six cycles in the minority, the Turton family could not be happier to welcome two new Democrats, obviously lucky charms, to the new Democratic Majority," said Turton, whose husband, Dan Turton, is a Democratic lobbyist.

DOJ_NMG_0103398

And she said putting two babies to bed is easier than you might think. “Shaw and Lane have no trouble falling asleep once I start discussing committee assignments with them during their 2 a.m. feeding.”

Iron Lady, Dissed. What a kick in the pants, or the skirt, as the case may be, to former British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher.

A revised floor schedule for Wednesday was sent out advising, “H.R. 6136 — Margaret Thatcher Congressional Gold Medal Act HAS BEEN PULLED.”

The measure’s sponsor, Rep. Mark Kirk (R-Ill.), noted that among her accomplishments, Thatcher’s “close friendship with the United States led to a potent foreign policy partnership that contributed to the end of Soviet communism.”

A GOP leadership source told HOH that the reason the bill was pulled was because Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.) objected to it.

Frank explained to HOH in a telephone chat that he opposed giving Thatcher a gold medal because the bill “hadn’t gone through the regular rules” procedure and, frankly, it “was being used by Republicans for partisan purposes. She was a very conservative person.”

Frank also objected in 2004 to giving a gold medal to former Spanish Prime Minister José María Aznar, whose People’s Party lost the 2004 elections in the aftermath of the March 11 terrorist bomb attacks in Madrid, Spain. Well, since Aznar lost, Frank argued: “Let’s give him a silver medal, since he finished second.”

“There is no silver medal of course,” Frank said Wednesday, recalling how his smart-aleck amendment was shot down. The point is, he said, “I don’t think the Congressional Gold Medal ought to be used to make political points.”

House Denounces French Street Name (AP)

By Kimberly Hefling

AP, December 7, 2006

The House passed a resolution Wednesday denouncing a French city for naming a street in honor of Mumia Abu-Jamal, who was sentenced to death for shooting a Philadelphia police officer 25 years ago this month.

"We must stand together as one and send a strong message to the world that cop-killers deserve to be punished, not to be celebrated," said Rep. Mike Fitzpatrick, a Philadelphia-area congressman who authored the resolution.

The vote came a few days shy of the 25th anniversary of the shooting of Daniel Faulkner, a 25-year-old officer shot after he pulled over Abu-Jamal's brother on Dec. 9, 1981. Abu-Jamal, a one-time radio reporter and former Black Panther, was convicted in 1982 and sentenced to death.

Abu-Jamal's writings and taped speeches on the justice system have made him a cause celebre among Hollywood activists, foreign politicians and some death-penalty opponents who believe he was the victim of a racist justice system.

In December 2001, a federal judge overturned Abu-Jamal's death sentence but upheld his conviction. Both sides have appealed that ruling, and Abu-Jamal remains on death row in western Pennsylvania. Last year, the 3rd U.S. Circuit of Appeals agreed to consider Abu-Jamal's appeal of his conviction.

In April, a street in St. Denis, a suburb in France just north of Paris, was named after Abu-Jamal.

The resolution asks the French government to step in to change the street name if St. Denis opted not to. The measure passed 368-31, with eight members voting present.

The vote was symbolic since the Senate is not expected to take up the measure before Congress adjourns this week.

Once Unloved, Medicare's Prescription-Drug Program Defies Critics, But Issues Remain (WSJ)

By David Wessel

The Wall Street Journal, December 7, 2006

Critics carped about the shortcomings of the twisted, complicated design of the standard benefit, the result of a political compromise aimed at keeping down the cost. Because private insurers aren't required to offer the standard plan, fewer than 20% of enrollees are covered by that standard package.

DOJ_NMG_0103399

Still, to the consternation of Democrats and many seniors, most beneficiaries are stuck with the much-derided "doughnut hole," a gap in coverage that requires seniors who avoid catastrophic illness to pay their entire drug tab themselves once they spend $2,250 out of pocket.

Critics said a lot of seniors simply wouldn't sign up, a vexing problem for any voluntary insurance program. Back in 2002, 45% of Medicare beneficiaries lacked prescription-drug coverage for all (18%) or some (27%) of the year. Now, more than 90% of Medicare beneficiaries have drug coverage. In all, 22.5 million people are enrolled in what is known as Medicare Part D, including 6.1 million people on the Medicaid health-insurance program for the poor who were assigned -- with some highly publicized glitches -- to insurance plans by the government if they didn't choose one. Another 16 million have Veterans Administration or employer-provided coverage, often subsidized by the government.

Still, more than one in 10 of Medicare's 43 millions beneficiaries have failed to sign up for drug coverage, including more than three million seniors whose incomes are so low that they would have to pay little or nothing for it. "Everyone agrees that's a big concern," says Mark McClellan, who recently stepped down as Medicare's administrator.

An enthusiastic defender of Medicare Part D, Dr. McClellan says the past year demonstrates consumers "can be a powerful force in health care as they are in the rest of the economy, but they do need support." The government, he cautions, cannot skimp on telephone operators, easy-to-use software and the like if it wants patients to be more involved in managing their own care, as it says it does.

Critics said the drug plans would offer enticingly low premiums the first year, and jack them up the second year. Premiums for many are going to rise in 2007 -- but not sharply. An analysis by Georgetown University's Health Policy Institute of 10 plans that have enrolled nearly 70% of Part D beneficiaries estimated that average premiums in 2007 will be $3.10 a month higher (12%) for those who stick with the same plan.

Critics said the complexity of matching tens of millions of elderly Americans with private-insurance plans would overwhelm the government's bureaucracy, and it has proved to be challenging. More problems are likely to surface on Jan. 1 for seniors who switch plans. Robert Reischauer, director of the Urban Institute think tank, says, "For a highly complex new program, the government and the prescription-drug plans did a remarkable job of implementation. Did it work perfectly? No. Were there little inequities here and there? Yes. But they did an immense amount to make this program work."

Critics said the program would be expensive, so expensive that the Bush administration hid internal estimates before Congress voted, and that it would be a heavy burden on the federal budget for decades to come. It will be. The latest official price tag is $729.1 billion over 10 years, and Congress and the Bush administration didn't offset that with spending cuts or tax increases.

Partly because fewer seniors enrolled than Medicare actuaries projected, Part D will cost taxpayers about $30 billion this year, below the $43 billion originally estimated. Dr. McClellan predicts the official $48 billion estimate for 2007 will be marked down. That isn't only because enrollment is below projections but because prescription-drug plans are pressuring drug makers to hold the line on prices and prodding consumers to use cheaper generic drugs or brand-name drugs for which plans have negotiated discounts.

Democrats argue the program could be even cheaper if the government, rather than private insurance plans, used its clout to negotiate with drug makers. They have vowed to change the law to allow that soon after they take control of Congress next year. They talk about using the hoped-for saving to sweeten the benefit, perhaps eliminate the infamous doughnut hole.

They may have trouble delivering: The official congressional scorekeepers aren't persuaded that the government would actually save money if Congress repeals a provision that bans the Department of Health and Human Services from interfering in price negotiations between drug plans and drug makers. Unless Democrats can take credit for saving money, it will be hard to make the benefit more generous.

Moon Shot (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0103400

NASA announced this week that it plans to establish a permanent moon base by 2024, a mere generation from now. Intriguingly, the plan, which is still short on details, calls for an open-standard, modular design that would allow private enterprises to plug into the permanent station by building their own extensions to the base.

As good as this sounds, we're left to wonder why NASA shouldn't go further. It did not release a budget estimate for the project -- perhaps because the experience with the space station, which was supposed to cost $40 billion but will now likely go above $100 billion, was chastening. But whatever the estimate is, here's a counteroffer.

Say NASA believes it can build a permanent moonbase for $100 billion in today's dollars. Why not take half of that and offer it as a bounty to the first private company to build the station and man it. A prize in the neighborhood of $50 billion is bound to attract plenty of interest -- and that number is probably much less than a realistic guess of what it would cost NASA in the end. The taxpayer would save 50% of NASA's cost to build the base, and the result would be much more likely to be attractive to the private interests that NASA wants to draw to the project.

It's an open question whether a moon base is most valuable for mining, tourism, science or some combination of the three. A private competition along the lines of the Ansari X prize for private space travel would have the added benefit of helping to sort those questions out without prejudging the outcome. So back to the moon. But let private speculators figure out the best way to get it done.

Gas Prices Likely To Go Higher (USA Today)

By Barbaraj Hagenbaugh

USA Today, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON - The recent rise in gasoline prices will likely continue until Christmas, making the trip home for the holidays more costly than at Thanksgiving.

The nationwide average retail price of a gallon of regular gasoline has risen 8 cents since the end of October. On Monday, the average price was $2.297 a gallon, the highest in two months and 15 cents higher than a year ago, according to weekly Energy Department data.

A number of analysts, including those at Wachovia and Moody's Economy.com, say prices will likely inch higher through December.

advertisement

"With supplies going down and demand going up, we should still see the price go up," Alaron Trading analyst Phil Flynn says. But that doesn't mean prices will skyrocket. Flynn expects the price at the pump will go up another 5 to 10 cents by Christmas.

"It doesn't mean we are going to see $3 gasoline this week," Wachovia economist Jason Schenker says.

Still, it's rare for gasoline prices to go up this time of year. From 1990 through 2005, retail gas prices have risen only five times from the end of October through the beginning of December, according to government data. What's happening:

- Oil. Oil prices have risen 6 percent since the end of October as a tight supply and demand balance has propped up prices. Oil costs account for more than half the retail gasoline price.

- Supply. Gasoline inventories have declined as refiners produce other, more profitable fuels and close plants for maintenance. Gasoline inventories were down 2.6 percent last week from a year ago, the Energy Department said Wednesday.

"This is the part of the year where you usually see inventory accumulation ... and we're running a little behind," says Bill O'Grady, assistant director of market analysis at A.G. Edwards.

- Demand. A drop in prices from earlier this year appears to be propping up demand for gasoline. In the four weeks ended Dec. 1, average gasoline demand was up 1.6 percent from a year ago. Gas demand is up 1 percent in 2006 from 2005.

That's "pretty incredible demand considering half the roads (in the United States) are icy," Flynn says.

Survey: Fewer Affordable Homes Available (USAT)

DOJ_NMG_0103401

By Haya El Nasser

USA Today, December 7, 2006

The supply of affordable housing continued to dwindle this year despite weakening home prices, according to one-third of local housing officials who responded to a survey by the National League of Cities.

Three-fourths of those surveyed say housing costs are significantly limiting home ownership opportunities for lower-income residents and young families. The survey was sent to officials in 1,167 cities.

"People don't recognize the social costs of that," says James Hunt, president of the National League of Cities and a councilman in Clarksburg, W.Va. "In a lot of areas, people who can't find affordable housing are (commuting) two hours in their cars." He says cities are under pressure to address the shortage as federal aid declines, cutting into such programs as housing vouchers and community development grants.

Housing prices in many areas skyrocketed in recent years as interest rates dropped. Demand fueled teardowns and rehabilitation of older homes. That took cheaper housing off the market. Thousands of apartments were converted to condominiums, squeezing renters. A recent downturn in home prices in some areas hasn't offset those pressures.

Lower-income and middle-income working families — including teachers and firefighters — along with the elderly, the disabled and single parents face the most critical housing needs, according to local officials who responded to the League of Cities survey. The report is being released today at a conference in Reno.

Federal money for housing "has declined every single year that I've been in office," says Indianapolis Mayor Bart Peterson, who took office in 2000. "Tight funds have forced us to do creative things."

Indianapolis' Fall Creek Place district once was so downtrodden it was nicknamed Dodge City. About 75% of its housing was abandoned or torn down. In the late 1990s, the neighborhood got a $4 million federal grant to boost home ownership. The city leveraged the money to attract private investment and pitched in almost $20 million to help homebuyers make down payments. Fifty homes were rehabilitated and more than 400 built. Most were sold below market rates and are owned by low-income, first-time buyers.

"We can now do this without the assistance of the federal government," Peterson says. "We'd love to have it, but we're not getting it, so we have to figure out a way to do it ourselves."

Some cities are devoting tax revenue to housing. Others require that developments include affordable units. "If we're … going to make a difference, we can't look to outside help," Hunt says. "We need to make a substantial investment of city dollars."

Stock Investors Catch Their Breath As Crude-Oil Prices Continue To Slide (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, December 7, 2006

The stock market's two-day rally ended with a whimper, as crude-oil prices declined for the third straight day.

With no major economic reports to drive the market, investors seemed to pause and catch their collective breath after watching the Dow Jones Industrial Average near another record on Tuesday. Some took an opportunity to sell and book profits, while others traded on company-specific news at a few big names rather than any broad view about the economy or corporate profits.

The Dow fell 22.35 points, or 0.2%, to 12309.25, erasing some of the previous two sessions' 137.47-point gain. The blue-chip average is up 15% on the year. Its weakest component companies yesterday included Exxon Mobil, which suffered because of the pullback in oil prices. General Motors and 3M also were both down sharply.

Crude-oil futures slipped 24 cents, or 0.4%, to $62.19 a barrel, up 1.9% on the year at the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Data from the federal Energy Information Administration showing a weekly drawdown in crude-oil inventories caused prices to jump as high as $63 early in the session. But the federal agency also reported that oil refineries are operating closer to capacity, a sign that supplies of refined fuels like gasoline and heating oil are likely to rise in the weeks ahead, pushing prices lower.

DOJ_NMG_0103402

The tech-stock-led Nasdaq Composite Index fell 0.3%, or 6.52 points, to 2445.86, up 11% on the year. One of its bellwether components, the search engine Yahoo, announced a reshuffling of top management to increase accountability and enable more-nimble decision-making. But company's shares fell more than 2%.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index slipped 0.1%, or 1.86 points, to 1412.90, up 13% on the year.

Despite the daily pullback, portfolio manager Jim Polk, of Putnam Investment Management, said the market could still rally as the new year approaches. In particular, he said many Wall Street pros may buy stocks that have done well for the year to impress clients in annual financial statements, a phenomenon known as "window dressing."

"This has been a tough year for active managers," Mr. Polk said, referring to investing pros who pick individual stocks rather than using pre-set criteria or indexes to determine their portfolios. "People are having an especially difficult time beating the indexes."

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks fell1. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.69 billion shares, as 1,506 stocks advanced and 1,832 fell.

Bond prices fell2. The 10-year note fell 9/32 point, or $2.8125 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.483%. The 30-year bond declined 11/32 to yield 4.596%.

The dollar strengthened3. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar rose to 115.23 yen from 114.82. The euro fell to $1.3287 from $1.3326.

What To Do If Your Class-Action Suit Dies (WSJ)

By Nathan Koppel And Paul Davies

The Wall Street Journal, December 7, 2006

Is there life after your class-action lawsuit dies?

A ruling earlier this week undercut a class action against 55 Wall Street investment banks, and dashed hopes for small investors who bought hot stocks that went public during the dot-com bubble and then plummeted as it burst.

The decision likely means that thousands of investors would have to file individual suits to try to recover billions lawyers claim they lost by investing in initial public offerings, mostly of technology companies, in the late 1990s and 2000.

Class-action suits let individuals band together to pursue big defendants with more power than they could on their own. But the Second U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New York ruled that this case in its current form couldn't proceed as a class action, in part because plaintiffs' individual claims were not sufficiently similar to be grouped together.

Attorneys say it will be difficult, if not impossible, for small investors to find lawyers who will pursue such suits for them on an individual basis. Claims, they estimate, would need to be worth anywhere from a hundred thousand to several million dollars to make pursuing them worth a lawyer's time. Christine Hurt, a professor at the University of Illinois College of Law who has written about the IPO case, estimates that the average retail plaintiff suffered losses of less than $20,000.

"Very few plaintiffs could possibly have sufficient economic resources to warrant continuing" the litigation on an individual basis, says Howard Sirota, one of the plaintiffs' lawyers in the IPO litigation. Of course, many plaintiffs might have earned little, even if the suit had been successful. That fact, combined with the millions of dollars plaintiffs' lawyers stood to earn from a successful case, is the reason critics of class actions say many of them shouldn't be allowed to go forward.

Benson W. Campbell III is one of many small investors involved in the IPO case, stemming from his purchase several years ago of about 1,000 shares of Bottomline Technologies Inc., an electronic billing and invoice software provider. He says the loss of class-action status prevents him from pursuing litigation individually. "It's a big hit to small shareholders like myself," says Mr. Campbell, an accountant in Henderson, Ky. "I don't own enough shares to make it worth pursuing a case." He said any proceeds from the case wouldn't be enough to "buy Christmas presents."

Meanwhile, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce says the appeals-court decision was a major victory for any businesses that face dubious class-action claims. "We applaud this decision," says Robin Conrad, senior vice president of the chamber's litigation center, in Washington, which filed an amicus brief with the appeals court opposing the class action. Ms. Conrad says that any individuals who were "truly harmed" can still bring individual lawsuits.

The decision marks the latest win for institutions and individuals fighting regulatory and legal action in the wake of massive stock-market losses earlier in this decade. Last year, an obstruction-of-justice verdict against former accounting giant Arthur Andersen LLP was voided by the Supreme Court. Earlier this year, Wall Street executive Ken Langone defeated regulatory charges that his firm improperly collected oversize commissions from customers who got sought-after IPO shares. Also earlier this year, a federal appeals court reversed the May 2004 criminal obstruction-of-justice conviction of former star investment banker Frank Quattrone, citing faulty jury instructions and other errors by the trial judge. In August, Mr. Quattrone entered into a deferred-prosecution agreement.

Still, investors have won some victories against Wall Street banks in bubble-era disputes. In 2003, for example, investors scored a settlement of about $440 million against Wall Street firms that allegedly issued overly optimistic stock research during the dot-com boom with the aim of winning lucrative investment-banking business.

The IPO litigation that was the subject of this week's ruling accuses banks that underwrote stock offerings of improperly pumping air into the stock-market bubble in the late 1990s and 2000 by requiring investors who got shares of hot tech IPOs to buy more shares at higher prices once trading began. The practice allegedly inflated the share prices of companies such as PlanetRX.com Inc., Buy.com Inc. and Razorfish Inc. and cost investors billions, according to plaintiffs' attorneys in the lawsuit.

Lawyers on both sides say it may be possible for the plaintiffs to somehow recast the case so that it could pass muster as a class action, but that that would be difficult to achieve. "There is no question the court made it hard for us," says Melvyn Weiss, chairman of the plaintiffs' executive committee in the litigation. Mr. Weiss, a partner at Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman LLP, says he plans to appeal the ruling.

It is unclear, lawyers say, whether most plaintiffs will even learn about the Second Circuit ruling, because lawyers typically communicate with class members only when there are settlement proceeds to distribute. But informed plaintiffs, they say, should first try to assess their damages.

The typical retail plaintiff in this case is an investor who bought IPO shares and subsequently suffered a loss, says Ms. Hurt. It wouldn't be enough, Ms. Hurt says, if investors merely assert they could have earned greater profits but for the defendants' alleged fraud. After ascertaining their losses, she says, investors next need to determine whether their brokerage firm requires that some or all of the investors' claims be arbitrated, rather than pursued in court. If arbitration is required, Ms. Hurt advises people to visit www.nasd.com -- the Web site of the National Association of Securities Dealers, a self-regulatory industry group -- which contains information about arbitrating securities claims. One upside: Arbitration can cost less than pursuing a civil lawsuit.

If individuals determine that they can bring cases in court, they should first check with the lawyers who are handling the case to date to see whether the class action can be resuscitated. One place to start is iposecuritieslitigation.com, which includes contact information for the lead plaintiffs' lawyers in the case. Otherwise, Ms. Hurt says, plaintiffs may be faced with the difficult task of finding their own attorney. Either way, investors should move quickly, as laws could limit the time in which claims may be filed.

Fred Isquith, one of the plaintiffs' lawyers in the IPO case, says that some of the plaintiffs could also try to band together in what is called a "mass action." In this sort of litigation, thousands of individually-filed lawsuits are aggregated before a single judge, who then tries certain test cases and applies the results to all of the other suits. Yet mass actions are costlier than class actions because they require investors to file their own lawsuits. And Mr. Isquith says that he has never seen a securities-fraud mass action. The plaintiffs "were better off Monday," before the Second Circuit's ruling, he says.

Lawyers say the ruling also casts doubt on an earlier settlement in the case. In 2003 insurers for the corporate defendants, mostly technology companies that issued more than 300 IPOs, agreed to pay a $1 billion settlement, an amount that was to be offset in part by any settlement payments from the banks. The settlement hasn't been approved by the court. Insurer American International Group Inc., which is responsible for an estimated 44% of the issuers' liability in the litigation, declined to comment. "In a world in which a class can't be certified, no one really knows if that settlement will be binding or not," says a defense lawyer in the case.

In April J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. agreed to pay $425 million in a settlement that is awaiting court approval, but the company never signed the agreement and, especially in light of this week's news, might be able to avoid paying.

DOJ_NMG_0103404

Mr. Sirota estimates that the plaintiffs' lawyers have invested $250 million in time and expenses mounting the case. The lawyers have rented a floor in midtown Manhattan, he says, which has at times been staffed with about 100 lawyers, paralegals and computer technicians who work full time on the litigation. "It's all apparently come to naught," says Mr. Sirota.

Got Lawsuit? Milk Dieter's Is Thrown Out (WP)

By Jerry Markon, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, December 7, 2006

Catherine Holmes saw the ads for the so-called "dairy diet" and thought it would be a tasty way to lose a few pounds. After all, she loves buttermilk, yogurt and cheese.

Instead, the Arlington woman says, she gained three pounds on the diet, which dairy companies have spent hundreds of millions of dollars promoting. She sued the industry.

But a federal judge has ruled that under Virginia law, Holmes and other people can't take on the industry in court -- only a government entity such as the Virginia attorney general's office can. The decision last week by U.S. District Judge Leonie M. Brinkema in Alexandria threw out the lawsuit Holmes filed last year.

In her ruling last Thursday, Brinkema said Virginia consumer protection law allows people to seek monetary damages but not a broad injunction regulating an industry. She did not address the science of the debate, writing that such federal agencies as the Food and Drug Administration and the Federal Trade Commission are better equipped to do so.

An attorney for Holmes vowed yesterday to appeal and file a similar lawsuit in a more consumer-friendly state. "We're very disappointed," said Dan Kinburn, general counsel for the Physicians Committee for Responsible Medicine, which filed the Virginia case on Holmes's behalf. "This will encourage and assist the dairy industry in making this country fatter and sicker."

Dairy industry representatives said the ruling validated their view that consuming dairy products helps with weight loss when coupled with calorie restriction and exercise. They vowed to continue the advertising campaign.

"The dairy/weight loss connection is grounded in sound science and has proven to be another compelling reason for the public to consume the recommended three servings of dairy a day," said Gregory D. Miller, executive vice president of science and innovation at the National Dairy Council.

Underlying the debate is growing concern nationally about increasing obesity among children. Researchers have split over the role of dairy products in the trend; some studies have found that children who drink too much milk are prone to becoming overweight, and others have found a weight-loss benefit from drinking milk.

In the lawsuit, filed in Alexandria Circuit Court and moved to federal court, the physicians committee accused the dairy industry of promoting the weight-loss notion through a "massive, deceptive advertising campaign." The committee says overwhelming scientific evidence shows that dairy products cause weight gain or have no effect. The only studies showing otherwise, the committee contends, are industry-funded.

Holmes is the sole plaintiff in the lawsuit, filed against such companies as General Mills Inc. and the Dannon Co. Inc. and three dairy industry trade groups. In addition to damages for Holmes, the suit seeks an order halting the dairy industry campaign.

The physicians committee has filed administrative petitions with the FDA and the FTC making similar allegations. Spokespeople for both agencies did not return telephone calls and e-mails yesterday.

The dairy industry has criticized the physicians committee, which has about 6,000 doctors among its 100,000 members and advocates a plant-based diet, as anti-meat and anti-dairy. In a footnote on the first page of her ruling, Brinkema quotes from a Web site that accuses the committee of being an animal rights organization "interested in perverting medical science."

"That suggests she was influenced by propaganda put out by the dairy industry," Kinburn said.

Dem. Governors Meet To Discuss Policy (AP)

By Robert Tanner

AP, December 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — With election victories behind them, Democratic governors gathered Wednesday to celebrate their first majority in 12 years, talk political strategy and share notes on the issues driving voters back at home.

DOJ_NMG_0103405

Governor after governor at their winter meeting turned to the backbone of modern Democratic politics — education, health care and jobs, with many also promising a concerted effort to tackle energy policy.

"Do things about things that are important in people's lives," Pennsylvania Gov. Ed Rendell urged his fellow governors, suggesting work on heating oil prices, expanded kindergarten programs and high college costs.

Democrats emerged from Election Day with a 28-22 majority, reversing the current GOP majority and taking six seats from GOP control. Republicans had held a majority since the 1994 elections.

Governors don't enact national policy, but their role gives them a chance to experiment individually with ideas in a way that often eludes a gridlocked Congress. They can also help build party strength at the grass roots, encourage future leaders and turn out votes for a White House race.

Democrats have an opportunity to prove themselves and build on the successes of the past few years, said Kansas Gov. Kathleen Sebelius, who officially became the new chairwoman of the Democratic Governors Association at the meeting.

Governors can't just argue indefinitely — they must find a pragmatic middle ground to solve problems, she said.

"There are wonderful lessons to be learned," said Sebelius, who has been steeped for the past four years in bipartisan politics because of a legislature that is controlled by Republicans. "Saying to the American people that this is what Democrats do when they're in charge is the way to stay in charge."

While the new Democratic majorities in Congress are getting a lot of attention, political analysts are closely watching the Democratic majority among governors, particularly in states that in recent years have been more likely to vote Republican, like Arkansas, Kansas, Ohio and more.

"Most Democrats have to figure out the solution to the problem that they cannot become tax and spend Democrats," said Charles Franklin, a political science professor at the University of Wisconsin. "And yet still accomplish broadly progressive policies, whether that's education, welfare, environmental protection — all of those things on the Democratic agenda."

Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, who did not run for re-election and has announced plans to seek the presidency, said Democratic governors will make their mark with three elements: responsible budgets, stronger education programs and an effort to promote energy independence.

New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, another potential presidential candidate, also said many governors are talking about energy independence, and predicted that several also will launch experiments on health care along the lines of Massachusetts, where GOP Gov. Mitt Romney and a Democratic legislature agreed on a sweeping new program that mandates insurance for all.

Rendell said bipartisan ideas like that are the strongest, but that what Democratic governors bring to the states is an overall approach that government itself can find a solution.

"Other than the philosophy that government can make a difference, I don't think there are particularly Democratic ideas or Republican ideas," he said. "A lot of Republicans believe that government should get out of the way. After Katrina, did anyone want government to get out of the way? Of course not."

DCCC Senses Another Pickup In Texas Runoff (RC)

By David M. Drucker

Roll Call, December 7, 2006

Although they were initially hesitant to lend a hand, national Democrats have since gone all out to aid former Rep. Ciro Rodriguez (D) as he seeks to oust Rep. Henry Bonilla (R) in Texas' 23rd district runoff set for Tuesday.

With the Republican National Committee and the National Republican Congressional Committee mostly absent from Bonilla's better-funded campaign, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee has plunked down nearly $300,000 since Nov. 7 in independent expenditure advertising, hoping that Rodriguez can add to the party's House-takeover total.

"Given the new dynamics in that district, given Bonilla's weakness among the Hispanic community and Ciro's solid base of support, the district is extremely competitive," Texas Democratic Party spokeswoman Amber Moon said Wednesday. "We are very confident in Ciro and the campaign he's running."

DOJ_NMG_0103406

That confidence is an outgrowth of the DCCC's heavy strategic involvement in the Rodriguez campaign, from the ground up, as well as the 23rd district's new boundaries that were drawn over the summer courtesy of a Supreme Court decision mandating that the seat be brought into compliance with the Voting Rights Act.

The Bonilla campaign isn't worried.

The Republican, who was forced to trade his safe seat for a new, competitive district that stretches from Democratic portions of San Antonio 700 miles west to just outside El Paso, had $1.3 million in the bank as of Nov. 7 and has raised $300,000 since.

Bonilla campaign spokesman Phil Ricks on Wednesday claimed a strong volunteer effort and touted the help the Congressman is receiving from the state GOP. Ricks sounded particularly pleased with a new television ad released this week that features retired FBI agent Al Ortiz accusing Rodriguez of sympathizing with "Islamic Radicals."

"The credibility of this 22-year former FBI agent we think is resonating well throughout the district," Ricks said. "We're going to win. We're peaking at the right time."

The Rodriguez campaign dismissed the ad as Bonilla's desperate attempt to salvage his job. Hector Nieto, the Democrat's spokesman, said Bonilla's decision to go negative proves that the race is competitive.

Perennially a poor fundraiser, Rodriguez has been working the phones daily in pursuit of campaign cash, and he has seen a decent influx of Member and political action committee donations since the Nov. 7 special general election, though he still trails Bonilla substantially in overall contributions received.

"I believe the money we have, if used strategically, will be able to get our message out across the district," Nieto said.

This week, Rodriguez has reported receipts of $1,000 each from Democratic Reps. Mark Udall (Colo.), Diana DeGette (Colo.), Mike Ross (Ark.), David Wu (Ore.), Peter DeFazio (Ore.), Betty McCollum (Minn.) and John Spratt (S.C.).

Those giving $2,000 included Democratic Reps. Martin Sabo (Minn.), Carolyn Cheeks Kilpatrick (Mich.), Joe Baca (Calif.), George Miller (Calif.), Hilda Solis (Calif.), Barney Frank (Mass.), Marty Meehan (Mass.), Lincoln Davis (Tenn.), Nita Lowey (N.Y.), Mike McNulty (N.Y.), Silvestre Reyes (Texas) and Jay Inslee (Wash.).

A campaign account in the name of the late Rep. Robert Matsui (D-Calif.) also contributed $2,000. Meanwhile, six political action committees funneled $5,000 each to Rodriguez, among them the Congressional Hispanic Caucus and the International Association of Machinists.

The Dec. 12 runoff was scheduled when Bonilla came up 1.4 points short of securing 50 percent of the vote in the Nov. 7 special general election.

The Nov. 7 contest in the new 23rd turned into a "special general" after a U.S. district court redrew the seat's lines pursuant to a Supreme Court ruling that came down as part of the decision from a Democratic challenge to the mid-decade redistricting of Texas House seats engineered by former Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas).

The ruling, which upheld mid-decade redistricting in principal and also found no problem with redrawing a map for blatantly partisan purposes, nonetheless found Bonilla's old district to be in violation of the VRA. The Supreme Court found that Hispanic voters — who increasingly have voted against Bonilla in recent years — were spread among multiple districts to diminish their voting power.

Although an analysis of how the new 23rd district would have voted in previous elections found a propensity to elect Republicans, the addition of around 100,000 more Hispanics than existed under the old boundaries should make the seat more friendly for Democrats.

Despite this boost in potential Democratic voters, Rodriguez was disappointed that the state scheduled the election so soon after Nov. 7. Hispanic interest groups went to court in an attempt to push the contest back, claiming it falls on the feast of the Virgin of Guadalupe, a Catholic holiday popular with Hispanics, and would depress voting in that community.

That effort failed, although the Hispanic groups did succeed in authorizing early voting, which began on Saturday and runs through tomorrow.

Ricks, taking issue with the Rodriguez campaign, said holding the election as soon as possible is the only way to ensure the maximum possible turnout, arguing that the closer the contest is to Christmas the lower turnout is likely to be. Ricks also took umbrage with the contention that it is Rodriguez's supporters who would be less likely to vote if the contest is held on the Virgin of Guadalupe holiday.

They "implied that only Democrats are Catholic," Ricks said.

Jefferson Finding Religion (RC)

By Lauren W. Whittington

Roll Call, December 7, 2006

The contest to decide who will represent hurricane-ravaged New Orleans and Louisiana's 2nd district will be decided Saturday, as the clock winds down on the increasingly bitter runoff fight between Rep. William Jefferson (D) and state Rep. Karen Carter (D).

Jefferson is the subject of an ongoing federal bribery investigation, although no formal charges have been filed and the eight-term Congressman denies any wrongdoing.

While Carter has sought to keep Jefferson's ethics woes front and center in the campaign, the 59-year-old Congressman has turned to social issues in an effort to paint Carter as out of touch with the values of the largely black electorate.

Although Jefferson has been significantly outraised in the runoff, his campaign maintains that he is in a strong position heading into Saturday's vote.

"The buzz on the ground and the support we've been getting in the street every day is really good, and we feel really good about what's going to happen on Saturday," said Jefferson spokeswoman Melanie Roussell.

In one of his latest TV ads, Jefferson informs voters that Carter has voted in favor of same-sex marriage and late-term abortions and against making human cloning a crime.

"Karen Carter says there's a big difference between her and Congressman Jefferson," an announcer says in the ad. "Especially when it comes to family values."

Jefferson also has assailed Carter's record on education, her ties to the insurance industry and her tenure as chairwoman of the state House Insurance Committee.

But a Carter spokeswoman charged that voters won't be swayed by Jefferson's "claims he's found religion" and attempts to divert attention from the corruption issue.

"We don't think that that [social] issue is one that has resonated well with voters," said spokeswoman Cheron Brylski.

Carter's campaign has done polling for the runoff but has not released any results. Still, Brylski said that despite Jefferson's skills as a campaigner and his incumbent status, the numbers are good for Carter and her support continues to be strong among Catholic women and women in general.

She predicted that, at best, Jefferson might be able to get to 48 percent in the runoff.

Jefferson was forced to directly address the corruption issue after Carter ran ads that raised the specter of his legal woes.

"I have never taken a bribe from anyone," Jefferson declared in one ad that also accused Carter of shameful exploitation of children to attack him. That was in response to a Carter ad that featured schoolchildren in a spelling bee spelling out the words "hypocrite," "unscrupulous" and "corruption" to describe Jefferson.

Another Carter ad pointed out that Jefferson was stripped of his seat on the Ways and Means Committee because of the ongoing FBI probe.

Both Jefferson and Carter have focused on winning support in Jefferson Parish and the hurricane-ravaged city's West Bank since the Nov. 7 all-party primary.

Jefferson has been endorsed by state Sen. Derrick Shepherd (D), who finished third behind Carter in the first round of balloting. Shepherd is from Jefferson Parish, and Roussell said that the Congressman has been campaigning often with Shepherd there since the endorsement.

But Carter also has won endorsements from Jefferson Parish officials and is counting on the support of Republicans and white voters in the runoff.

Although Jefferson began the contest with a larger war chest and higher name recognition, Carter has far outpaced Jefferson in the money chase since the primary.

DOJ_NMG_0103408

In the pre-runoff period covering Oct. 19 to Nov. 19, Carter raised $321,000 compared with $72,000 for Jefferson. Carter has raised an additional $130,000 since that time.

Jefferson's money largely has come from old friends and family members as well as support from the Congressional Black Caucus.

Carter has gotten a financial boost from an EMILY's List endorsement and the help of national liberal Internet-based forces such as ActBlue. She also received contributions from the owners of the New Orleans Hornets, former Health and Human Services Secretary Donna Shalala and filmmaker Spike Lee.

Carter's appearance in the filmmaker's documentary about the government response to Hurricane Katrina has been an issue in the race, as West Bank law enforcement officials have vented their anger at her comments about their decision to not let evacuees cross a bridge to the West Bank to flee rising floodwater.

Chief among them has been Jefferson Parish Sheriff Harry Lee, who is paying for and distributing a flier that urges voters to "Just Say No!" to Carter, though he has not endorsed Jefferson.

Allen Ponders 2008 Senate Race (RC)

By Nicole Duran

Roll Call, December 7, 2006

Rep. Tom Allen (D-Maine) said Wednesday that he is "seriously considering" running for Senate in 2008, and political watchers in the Pine Tree State say he looks and acts like someone preparing for a Senate bid.

Allen raised more than $930,000 in the previous cycle but spent only about half of it dispensing with two challengers on his way to securing a sixth term with 61 percent of the vote.

He also has been spending more time outside of his Portland-based 1st district and is "mending fences" with sportsmen's groups, according to Christian Potholm, a political consultant and government professor at Maine's Bowdoin College.

"Tom Allen is already raising money for a Senate run," Potholm said. "He certainly is off and running from all the things people tell me."

Allen presumably would square off with the state's junior Senator, Susan Collins (R), who has said she intends to seek a third term.

"I'm seriously considering a Senate race in 2008," Allen said.

Democrats, eager to build on the gains they made in the Northeast in the midterm elections, would like to seriously challenge Collins, one of the few Republican moderates left in Congress.

"I think it's clear [that] unless Republicans and the president are going to show a change in the way they are leading, which I don't think we're seeing clear indications of so far ... Republican incumbents are going to have problems in 2008," said Ben Dudley, chairman of the Maine Democratic Party.

"I think [Allen] would be a terrific candidate," Dudley continued. "We would love to see someone of Tom's accomplishments and skill step forward for something like this."

By all accounts, other would-be Democratic challengers to Collins are waiting to see what Allen will do. Dudley said no other possible contenders have discussed a Senate bid with him.

If Allen decides not to run, speculation has centered on state Senate Majority Leader Michael Brennan (D) and state Attorney General Steven Rowe (D).

Allen said he has "had conversations with a number of people" about running, though he would not say if Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee Chairman Charles Schumer (N.Y.) was one of them. However, he said he will "make decisions later."

He did not elaborate on when later would be and has not set a deadline for making a decision.

The DSCC did not respond to a request for comment on this story.

Allen and Dudley both believe that Collins could be hurt by breaking the pledge she made to serve no more than two terms when she was first elected in 1996.

DOJ_NMG_0103409

"I'd like to take Senator Collins at her word that she only intends to serve two terms," Dudley said. "However, if she's going to break her promise to the people of Maine, I have a very strong feeling we can mount a very credible opposition to returning her to her minority position in the U.S. Senate."

Allen said beyond breaking a pledge, Collins will be hurt by her affiliation with the national GOP.

"Susan Collins promised to only serve two terms, we've been in our respective offices for 10 years, and this is really about leadership for me," he said. "We have very different voting records."

As a result of Democrats winning control of Congress on Nov. 7, Collins will lose her chairmanship of the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee come January.

Dudley said that also hurts her.

"She lost her chairmanship; she's in a minority position," he said. "She won't be able to perform for Maine the way she has been able to."

Steve Abbott, Collins' chief of staff, said none of those factors will affect Collins' re-election bid.

"It's not going to hurt her at all," he said of the term-limit pledge. "I think people are very happy to have her as their Senator."

As for her party affiliation, "you just have to look at her record," he said, noting her reputation as a moderate and consensus-builder in Maine.

Potholm agreed that Maine voters have a positive perception of Collins.

"She's obviously, extremely highly thought of," he said. "She projects the kind of moderate stance voters like."

That said, the midterm elections, during which Democrats picked up 29 seats in the Maine House to take control of the chamber (while losing one seat in the state Senate, which they already controlled), demonstrated how unhappy voters were with Republican control nationally and locally, Maine Democrats say.

A few months ago, Potholm said he thought Collins' re-election would be a "slam-dunk." Now, he says is not so sure.

Allen faces some hurdles, too, should he decide to run.

He is barely known in the sprawling 2nd district, which geographically is the biggest Congressional district east of the Mississippi River. He also did not run any television ads in the previous cycle. That saved him money but also prevented him from introducing himself to 2nd district voters, said one Maine Republican operative who did not want to be named.

To reach some parts of Allen's district by television, he would have had to buy airtime in the Bangor market, which also serves the vast northern 2nd district. He had $440,000 in his campaign account as of Oct. 18; Collins had $392,000 in the bank on Sept. 30.

"Tom Allen is a strong Congressman, but can he translate his strengths from the southern part to the northern part of the state?" Potholm asked.

Nonetheless, Potholm said Allen probably is the strongest candidate Democrats can find.

"Susan could get close to a pass or a very weak [opponent] if Tom Allen doesn't run," he observed.

Candidates Set Record '08 Pace (RC)

By Paul Kane

Roll Call, December 7, 2006

Shattering the pace of any previous presidential campaign, a half-dozen White House candidates already have leapt out of the gates for 2008, either formally signaling their entry into what is shaping up to be a packed field or filing paperwork freeing them to begin fundraising.

The first wave of candidates — three Senators, one House Member, an ex-mayor and an outgoing governor — have eschewed traditions of waiting until at least the end of the preceding midterm year before officially opening their campaign committees.

With fundraising expectations higher than ever and the caucus and primary schedule so compacted in early 2008, the candidates, former candidates, and current and former campaign aides see nothing unusual about so many declarations for a general election that's still almost two years away.

"A lot of times the early bird gets the worm," said Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.), who announced earlier this week that he was filing his paperwork with the Federal Election Commission to open a campaign committee.

"Most importantly, it's the demand for fundraising," said Steve Elmendorf, a strategist for former Rep. Richard Gephardt's (D-Mo.) 2004 bid and deputy presidential campaign manager to Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) after Gephardt withdrew.

Calling their committees "exploratory" vehicles, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) officially filed with the FEC in mid-November and Brownback and Sen. Evan Bayh (D-Ind.) followed earlier this week, although each deferred an "official" announcement and the accompanying hoopla.

As far as the FEC is concerned, however, there is no real distinction between an exploratory committee and a formal presidential committee.

Former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani (R) also opened an exploratory committee in mid-November, and Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.) announced he would run just before the midterm elections, although he avoided the official legal tripwires involved in formally launching his campaign. An aide said a formal filing with the FEC would come in the near future.

Then there's Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack (D), who officially launched his campaign committee and formally kicked off his campaign just days after the Nov. 7 elections.

In doing so, Vilsack became just the fifth candidate to file FEC paperwork and hold his formal announcement ceremony in the same year as the midterm elections in the modern presidential campaign era since 1968. And the comparison is not an auspicious one: Then-Rep. Phil Crane (R-Ill.) formally announced his 1980 presidential campaign in the summer of 1978, former Delaware Gov. Pierre du Pont (R) announced his 1988 bid roughly a month before the 1986 midterms and then-Rep. Mo Udall (D-Ariz.) filed in late 1974 for the 1976 election. Only former President Jimmy Carter filed in the midterm year, 1974, and went on to win his nomination.

In the 2004 White House campaign, the first candidates to open campaign committees were former Vermont Gov. Howard Dean (D), who did so in May 2002, and Kerry, who opened his fundraising operation just after Thanksgiving 2002. Neither man made their formal announcement until 2003.

In the 2000 campaign, former Sen. Bill Bradley (D-N.J.) was the only candidate to open a campaign committee in 1998 — on Dec. 4, 1998. The eventual winner, then-Texas Gov. George Bush (R), didn't open a campaign committee until March 8, 1999.

At least one former presidential candidate warned those still officially undecided on whether to jump into the '08 race that the game might be getting away from them.

"Now is almost too late. There's too much to do in too short a period of time," said Sen. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.), who sought the GOP nomination in both 1996 and 2000.

Alexander predicted that the dramatically accelerated pace of the 2008 season is going to force some candidates to abandon their campaigns as soon as the spring of '07, earlier than any previous White House campaigns.

"There will probably be a weeding out process beginning with the first quarter report," Alexander said, referring to the March 31, 2007, fundraising report that declares contenders must file with the FEC.

Elmendorf predicted that the media will pay "a little attention" to the year-end reports that the six candidates with formal campaign committees must file in mid-January. But he agreed with Alexander, saying that among Democrats, the second-tier candidates will have to demonstrate financial viability or simply get out of the way of big money campaigns such as that of likely contender Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.).

"Are you in this game or not?" Elmendorf said Democratic activists and donors will ask candidates after March 31. "All these other candidates are going to have to show that they can produce."

In the case of Giuliani and Vilsack, opening presidential committees this early allows them to finally jump-start a federal campaign committee, something Senators already have at their disposal and are allowed to transfer funds from into their White House committees.

In Bayh's case, the next few weeks will truly represent an exploratory phase and almost no money will be raised into the presidential committee, according to spokesman Dan Pfeiffer. Any expenditures made to directly impact the presidential election must be paid for by a White House campaign committee, and not a leadership political action committee, which Bayh and most other contenders used to make contributions to key campaigns and pay for travels to early primary and caucus states in the midterms.

Only a small amount of money will be raised, or a sliver of the more than $10 million in his Senate campaign account will be shifted into his presidential account, Pfeiffer said, allowing the Bayh team to officially put fundraisers on staff, build a campaign Web site and reserve office space in key states.

Bayh then expects to make his formal decision about a bid over the Christmas holiday.

"When he does decide, we want to be able to flip a switch and be off to the races," Pfeiffer said.

Some potential candidates who haven't opened campaign committees aren't wasting time either, making provisional hires of staff who will be brought on board once they decide to open their committees. Clinton, for example, hired Phil Singer, a top Democratic communications expert, this week to be a press adviser to her all-but-certain campaign, a move similar to Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney's (R) decision to bring on Kevin Madden, the press-savvy outgoing spokesman for incoming House Minority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio).

Clinton, however, faces no legal requirement or rush to open a campaign committee until early next year. Because she won re-election this year, every dollar Clinton raises before Dec. 31 is counted toward the 2006 Senatorial campaign cycle.

All remaining funds can then be transferred directly into a presidential account, and every previous donor to her Senate re-election bid can once again give up to $2,100 into the presidential account with no fear of exceeding the contribution limits because of past donations.

Do '08 Presidential Contenders Need A Great Story? (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg, Roll Call Contributing Writer

Roll Call, December 7, 2006

Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack (D) was an orphan before being adopted by a couple in Pittsburgh. His adoptive mother struggled with alcoholism.

Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) was born in Hawaii to a Kenyan-born economist who was educated at Harvard and a white woman from Kansas. He grew up in Indonesia before returning to the United States and eventually graduated from Columbia University and Harvard Law School.

After graduating from the Naval Academy, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) served in the Navy. He was shot down and endured five years of torture as a prisoner of war in the "Hanoi Hilton" in Vietnam.

Everybody loves a good story, don't they? Why do you think people pay money to go to the movies? But it is reporters and editors who get particularly excited about a good story (which probably is one reason why Janet Cooke, Jayson Blair and Stephen Glass got as far as they did with major print organizations).

And media consultants? They get downright misty-eyed when thinking about what they can do with a candidate with a personal story that pulls at the heartstrings. What could be better than being raised in a broken home or coming from a town called Hope, Ark. (as Bill Clinton and likely '08 GOP presidential hopeful Gov. Mike Huckabee did)?

Writing about Vilsack, who recently announced that he's running for the Democratic presidential nomination, Washingtonpost.com's Chris Cillizza wrote that "any argument for Vilsack starts with his life story — perhaps the most compelling of any candidate on either side considering the 2008 race."

Vilsack does have an interesting story, but if he is counting on that to get him a long, hard look from Democratic activists, donors and the national media, I hope he has a backup plan. While a great story may get you elected mayor of Mt. Pleasant, Iowa, or to the Iowa state Senate, count me as skeptical that it's enough to get you the campaign war chest necessary to make a decent run at the White House.

Many presidential hopefuls have something in their life stories that can paint as a personal test or a hurdle that they overcome. The old "born in a log cabin" chestnut is about as old as the country.

Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) had his Vietnam service. President George H.W. Bush was shot down over the Pacific in World War II. Even George W. Bush, who didn't exactly grow up in a log cabin, could talk during his White House bid about how he changed from a hard-drinking, fun-loving guy to a mature adult.

But let's not go overboard about the value of a personal story. Democratic House candidate Tammy Duckworth, who lost both legs as a helicopter pilot in Iraq, had a great one; Democratic political operatives were so smitten with her candidacy that they told me they were absolutely certain that she would win the Congressional race in Illinois' 6th district. Yet she lost to Republican Peter Roskam at the same time that Democrats with far less appealing stories were winning contests in New Hampshire, Wisconsin, Iowa and Pennsylvania.

A candidate's "story" may get voters' attention, but a story is by its very nature backward-looking, while presidential contests are about the future. Ultimately, a candidate must offer more compelling reasons than a résumé to justify why he or she deserves to be nominated and elected. Remember: No matter his personal history, which included great hardships and great courage, McCain's incredible personal story didn't win him the GOP presidential nomination in 2000.

What matters most to voters in selecting a nominee for the White House? Lots of things, of course, but the most important question is whether, after months of campaigning, enough primary voters and caucus attendees in the early states think that a particular hopeful has passed the smell test. Does he or she have the experience, leadership ability and stature to be president and commander in chief? Can you envision so-and-so in the Oval Office, keeping the nation safe and prosperous?

Last time, Iowans decided that the answer was "no" when they were offered then-frontrunner Howard Dean (D).

It's far too early to rule out anyone from either party's presidential mix. Obviously, a handful of candidates begin with considerable assets, from name recognition to undisputed fundraising ability to early institutional support. Some already seem to have the stature of a future president of the United States. Having an interesting story to tell is nice, but starting off with real advantages is a whole lot better.

The GOP's Southern Exposure (WP)

By Harold Meyerson

The Washington Post, December 7, 2006

You've seen the numbers and understand that America is growing steadily less white. You try to push your party, the Grand Old Party, ahead of this curve by taking a tolerant stance on immigration and making common cause with some black churches. Then you go and blow it all in a desperate attempt to turn out your base by demonizing immigrants and running racist ads against Harold Ford. On Election Day, black support for Democrats remains high; Hispanic support for Democrats surges. So what do you do next?

What else? Elect Trent Lott your deputy leader in the Senate. Sure locks in the support of any stray voters who went for Strom in '48.

In case you haven't noticed, a fundamental axiom of modern American politics has been altered in recent weeks. For four decades, it's been the Democrats who've had a Southern problem. Couldn't get any votes for their presidential candidates there; couldn't elect any senators, then any House members, then any dogcatchers. They still can't, but the Southern problem, it turns out, is really the Republicans'. They've become too Southern -- too suffused with the knee-jerk militaristic, anti-scientific, dogmatically religious, and culturally, sexually and racially phobic attitudes of Dixie -- to win friends and influence elections outside the South. Worse yet, they became more Southern still on Election Day last month, when the Democrats decimated the GOP in the North and West. Twenty-seven of the Democrats' 30 House pickups came outside the South.

The Democrats won control of five state legislatures, all outside the South, and took more than 300 state legislative seats away from Republicans, 93 percent of them outside the South. As for the new Senate Republican caucus that chose Mississippi's Lott over Tennessee's Lamar Alexander to be deputy to Kentucky's Mitch McConnell, 17 of its 49 members come from the Confederacy proper, with another three from the old border states of Kentucky and Missouri, and two more from Oklahoma, which is Southern but with more dust. In all, 45 percent of Republican senators come from the Greater South.

More problematic, so does most of the Republican message. Following the gospel according to Rove (fear not swing voters but pander to and mobilize thy base), George W. Bush and the Republican Congress, together or separately, had already blocked stem cell research, disparaged nonmilitary statecraft, exalted executive wartime power over constitutional niceties, campaigned repeatedly against gay rights, thrown public money at conservative churches and investigated the tax status of liberal ones. In the process, they alienated not just moderates but Western-state libertarians.

The one strategist who fundamentally predicted the new geography of partisan American politics is Tom Schaller, a University of Maryland political scientist whose book "Whistling Past Dixie: How Democrats Can Win Without the South" appeared several months before November's elections. Schaller argued that the Democrats' growth would occur in the Northeast, the industrial Midwest, the Mountain West and the Southwest -- areas where professionals, appalled by Republican Bible Beltery, were trending Democratic and where working-class whites voted their pocketbooks in a way that their Southern counterparts did not. Al Gore carried white voters outside the South, Schaller reminded us; even hapless John Kerry came close.

The challenge for Republicans -- and for such presidential aspirants as John McCain, Rudy Giuliani and Mitt Romney in particular -- is how to bridge the widening gap between their Southern base and the rest of the nation. The persistence of Southern exceptionalism is clear in the networks' exit polls, in which fully half of Southern voters identified themselves as born-again or evangelical Christians, while just one-third of the entire nation's voters did so. It's clear from the fact that in a period of broad economic stagnation, the populism of working-class Southern whites, like a record stuck in a groove, remains targeted more against cultural than economic elites.

Indeed, scratch the surface of some of our current hot-button issues and you find age-old regional conflicts. Wal-Mart's practice, for instance, of offering low wages and no benefits to its employees begins in the rural South, where it's no deviation from the norm. Only when Wal-Mart expands this practice to the metropolises of the North and West, threatening the living standards of unionized retail workers, does it encounter roadblocks, usually statutory, to its entry into new markets.

So: A Southern low-wage labor system is cruising along until it seeks to expand outside its region and meets fierce opposition from higher-paid workers in the North. Does that suggest any earlier episode in American history? The past, as William Faulkner once wrote of the South, isn't even past. And now the persistence of Southern identity has become a bigger problem for Republicans than it is for Democrats.

Democrats' Challenge: Keeping The Egos In Harmony (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, December 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 6 — In a Democratic Party full of egos, few are as big as the ones from New York. Big enough that no last names are necessary for the tabloid headline writers: Chuck, Hillary, Eliot, Charlie (as in Rangel) and Andrew (as in Cuomo). And big enough that New York's ability to get things done now hangs partly on their approach to the question, can we all get along?

Everyone gets along splendidly in public, and the private rivalries — Chuck vs. Hillary, Chuck vs. Eliot, Eliot vs. Andrew — have evolved and in some cases softened with time. But with all of them ascending to new heights — two as leaders in Albany, the other three as movers and shakers in Congress, including one as a possible presidential candidate — those relationships will be tested.

This constellation of New York power coalesced in one place on Wednesday: Governor-elect Eliot Spitzer came to Washington as the humble outsider seeking aid from Senator Charles E. Schumer, the new Democratic kingmaker. No slouch himself, Representative Charles B. Rangel, the dean of the state Congressional delegation, arranged last-minute face time between Mr. Spitzer and the incoming House speaker, Nancy Pelosi. And members of the New York delegation jockeyed for bragging rights about who had heard personally from Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton about her 2008 plans.

A back-slapping 8 a.m. meeting of Mr. Spitzer, Mr. Schumer and other members of the Democratic delegation reflected, in bits and pieces, this complicated coexistence.

Mr. Schumer and Mr. Spitzer have a younger brother-older brother sort of rivalry. Mr. Spitzer sometimes remarks that he was still in high school when Mr. Schumer was an assemblyman. (Zing!) Mr. Schumer arrived at the meeting and instantly teased Mr. Rangel for not serving a lavish breakfast. Then he needled Mr. Spitzer, saying that power is nothing without a fancy spread of food.

"I should've asked you — where are the bacon and eggs?" Mr. Schumer bellowed at Mr. Spitzer, who cracked up.

Mr. Spitzer, whose ego Mr. Rangel used to deflate by mockingly calling him "the world's smartest man," said that he is well aware of the egos at play, including his own. But he said common goals were overriding factors. "I've said to Chuck, 'I'd like to do nothing more than heap glory on you as you bring things back to New York,' " Mr. Spitzer said. "It's O.K. if I don't hold the press conferences."

DOJ_NMG_0103414

In spite of the Democratic gains on Election Day, the challenges are just beginning for these politicians.

Mr. Spitzer faces a billion-dollar budget deficit and hopes to "organize the delegation," he said, to get more funds from Washington for Medicaid and transportation projects like the Second Avenue subway, among other priorities. Mr. Schumer and Mr. Rangel want to convert their political capital into major power brokering and build legacies. And Mrs. Clinton is eyeing the biggest prize of all.

"They all have a common denominator — they are all popular and they all have overlapping concerns, and they can't afford to confront each other much," said George Arzt, a New York political communications consultant.

Mr. Arzt, who was a consultant and press secretary for Mayor Edward I. Koch, reveled in the history of powerful political personalities in New York, which has a formidable stable of Republicans, too: Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg, former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani and Gov. George E. Pataki. Mr. Arzt remembered a time in the 1980s when Daniel Patrick Moynihan, a Democrat, and Alfonse M. D'Amato, a Republican, were the two United States senators from New York.

"When I went down to Washington with Koch, Senator Moynihan would lecture us about the history of New York State," Mr. Arzt said. "We couldn't wait to get out of his office and go down the hall to Senator D'Amato, who would just say, 'What do you want?' "

Senator Clinton works well with everyone, her advisers say, and is close to one of her earliest political supporters, Mr. Rangel. She is a bit more formal than the others — a reflection, perhaps, of her Midwestern roots, or of the fact that she has always kept her cards close.

Allies of Mr. Spitzer say that he is closer to Mrs. Clinton than to Mr. Schumer, yet he has a better handle on Mr. Schumer's motives and agenda because he is more open.

A spirit of competitiveness has always existed between Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Schumer and their staffs. Mr. Schumer, a man of many words, had New York political circles buzzing this week when he refused to comment at length on Mrs. Clinton's presidential prospects. The two talk regularly, but they are not close, Democrats close to both of them say. Yet these and other Democrats say that, in this era of new party power, there is enough limelight to go around.

"The big thing that could've been a problem is Schumer-Clinton, but he now has a wonderful job on his own track in the Senate, and Hillary has her own thing going on," said Mr. Rangel, who is the incoming chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. Schumer dismissed any notion that rising power augurs renewed rivalries. "We're all a team; we get along great," Mr. Schumer said.

A moment later, though, the senator noted that he had told both Mr. Spitzer and Assembly Speaker Sheldon Silver that the two of them had to work together. Mr. Spitzer ran on a reform platform, and Mr. Silver is a defender of his members' needs and the Democratic status quo.

"I believe and hope that we as Democrats have learned the lessons of the past," Mr. Schumer said, referring to earlier squabbling that bogged down progress.

Mr. Schumer, whose new stature comes from his role as chief strategist for the Democratic takeover of the Senate, was in full bloom during the delegation meeting with Mr. Spitzer, 47. Mr. Schumer asked Mr. Rangel to hurry up with the meeting, and Mr. Rangel, 76, returned the poke by paying homage to "our very, very senior" senator, which prompted an eye roll from Mr. Schumer, 56.

Mr. Rangel also sent regards from Senator Clinton, 59. The two had breakfast recently to discuss her presidential ambitions, and Mr. Rangel cracked up the room by saying that he was available to talk with those present about their career aspirations, too.

Cheney Pregnancy Stirs Debate On Gay Rights (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, December 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0103415

WASHINGTON, Dec. 6 — Mary Cheney, a daughter of Vice President Dick Cheney, is expecting a baby with her partner of 15 years, Heather Poe, Mr. Cheney's office said Wednesday.

Lea Anne McBride, a spokeswoman for Mr. Cheney, said the vice president and his wife, Lynne Cheney, were "looking forward with eager anticipation" to the baby's birth, which is expected this spring and will bring to six the number of grandchildren the Cheneys have.

Mr. Cheney's office would not provide details about how Mary Cheney became pregnant or by whom, and Ms. Cheney did not respond to messages left at her office and with her book publisher, Simon & Schuster.

The announcement of the pregnancy, which was first reported Wednesday by The Washington Post, and Ms. Cheney's future status as a same-sex parent, prompted new debate over the administration's opposition to gay marriage.

Family Pride, a gay rights group, noted that Ms. Cheney's home state, Virginia, does not recognize same-sex civil unions or marriages.

"The news of Mary Cheney's pregnancy exemplifies, once again, how the best interests of children are denied when lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender citizens are treated unfairly and accorded different and unequal rights and responsibilities than other parents," said the group's executive director, Jennifer Chrisler.

Focus on the Family, a Christian group that has provided crucial political support to President Bush, released a statement that criticized child rearing by same-sex couples.

"Mary Cheney's pregnancy raises the question of what's best for children," said Carrie Gordon Earll, the group's director of issues analysis. "Just because it's possible to conceive a child outside of the relationship of a married mother and father doesn't mean it's the best for the child."

In 2004, Ms. Cheney worked on the Bush-Cheney re-election campaign, which won in part because of the so-called values voters who were drawn to the polls by ballot measures seeking to ban same-sex marriage.

Mr. Bush voiced strong approval that year for a constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage, as he did this year, too. While gay rights groups called on Ms. Cheney to speak out against the proposed ban in 2004, she remained silent.

But Ms. Cheney wrote in a book published this year that she had considered resigning from the campaign after learning that Mr. Bush would endorse the proposed amendment. She said that she decided to stay because other important issues were at stake in the 2004 campaign.

As she promoted her book last spring, she said a federal ban on same-sex marriage would "write discrimination into the Constitution." The vice president has hinted at disapproval of the proposed amendment. Asked where he stood on the issue during a campaign stop in Iowa in 2004, Mr. Cheney said, "Freedom means freedom for everyone."

Dana Perino, a spokeswoman for Mr. Bush, said that Mr. Cheney had recently told the president about the pregnancy and that "the president said he was happy for him." The Cheneys have five grandchildren by their other daughter, Elizabeth.

Mary Cheney, 37, is a vice president at AOL; Ms. Poe, a former park ranger, is 45.

The Washington Post, December 7, 2006

So the vice president's daughter is having a baby next spring with partner Heather Poe .

Are they married? No, but they've been a couple for 15 years.

Who's the father? The circumstances of the pregnancy are super-secret.

What's their legal status? Cheney, 37, and Poe, 45, live in Great Falls, and under Virginia law only the biological parent has full legal status. "Virginia is sort of at the bottom of the pile in terms of rights and protections," said Jennifer Chrisler, executive director of Family Pride, a national advocacy organization for gay parents. "Mary will be a full legal parent to her child. And Heather will be a stranger in the eyes of the law."

Can Poe adopt the baby? Not in Virginia -- no same-sex partner has ever been allowed to adopt his or her partner's child -- but yes, if they move to the District, Maryland or any other state that allows second-parent adoptions, said Brad Luna, spokesman for the Human Rights Campaign, which tracks state and federal law in this area.

What happens if they split up? Unless state law changes, Cheney could prevent Poe from any visitation or custody; conversely, Poe could walk away without providing child support.

Can Poe sign school report cards? Depends on the school. Technically, only Cheney would be authorized to fill out all those school forms.

What about diapers? There are no prohibitions on second-parent diaper duty.HEY, ISN'T THAT . . .

Conservative Jews Allow Gay Rabbis And Unions (NYT)

By Laurie Goodstein

The New York Times, December 7, 2006

The highest legal body in Conservative Judaism, the centrist movement in worldwide Jewry, voted yesterday to allow the ordination of gay rabbis and the celebration of same-sex commitment ceremonies.

The decision, which followed years of debate, was denounced by traditionalists in the movement as an indication that Conservative Judaism had abandoned its commitment to adhere to Jewish law, but celebrated by others as a long-awaited move toward full equality for gay people.

“We see this as a giant step forward,” said Sarah Freidson, a rabbinical student and co-chairwoman of Keshet, a student group at the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York that has been pushing for change.

But in a reflection of the divisions in the movement, the 25 rabbis on the law committee passed three conflicting legal opinions — one in favor of gay rabbis and unions, and two against.

In doing so, the committee left it up to individual synagogues to decide whether to accept or reject gay rabbis and commitment ceremonies, saying that either course is justified according to Jewish law.

“We believe in pluralism,” said Rabbi Kassel Abelson, chairman of the panel, the Committee on Jewish Law and Standards of the Rabbinical Assembly, at a news conference after the meeting at the Park Avenue Synagogue in New York. “We recognized from the very beginnings of the movement that no single position could speak for all members” on the law committee or in the Conservative movement.

In protest, four conservative rabbis resigned from the law committee, saying that the decision to allow gay ordination violated Jewish law, or halacha. Among them were the authors of the two legal opinions the committee adopted that opposed gay rabbis and same-sex unions.

One rabbi, Joel Roth, said he resigned because the measure allowing gay rabbis and unions was "outside the pale of halachic reasoning."

With many Protestant denominations divided over homosexuality in recent years, the decision by Conservative Judaism's leading committee of legal scholars will be read closely by many outside the movement because Conservative Jews say they uphold Jewish law and tradition, which includes biblical injunctions against homosexuality.

The decision is also significant because Conservative Judaism is considered the centrist movement in Judaism, wedged between the liberal Reform and Reconstructionist movements, which have accepted an openly gay clergy for more than 10 years, and the more traditional Orthodox, which rejects it.

The move could create confusion in congregations that are divided over the issue, said Rabbi Jerome Epstein, executive director of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, which represents the movement's more than 750 synagogues with 1.5 million members in North America.

"Most of our congregations will not be of one mind, the same way that we were not of one mind," said Rabbi Epstein, also a law committee member. "Our mandate is to help congregations deal with this pluralism."

Some synagogues and rabbis could leave the Conservative movement, but many rabbis and experts cautioned that the law committee's decision was unlikely to cause a widespread schism.

Before the vote, some rabbis in Canada, where many Conservative synagogues lean closer to Orthodoxy than in the United States, threatened to break with the movement.

But Jonathan D. Sarna, a professor of American Jewish history at Brandeis University, said: "I find it hard to buy the idea that this change, which has been widely expected, will lead anybody to leave, because synagogues that don't want to make changes will simply point to the rulings that will allow them not to make any changes. This is not like a papal edict."

The question of whether to admit and ordain openly gay rabbinic students will now be taken up by the movement's seminaries. The University of Judaism, in Los Angeles, has already signaled its support, said Rabbi Elliot Dorff, its rector and the vice chairman of the law committee. He co-wrote the legal opinion allowing gay ordination and unions that passed on Wednesday.

The Jewish Theological Seminary in New York, the flagship school in Conservative Judaism, will take up the issue in meetings of the faculty, the students and the trustees in the next few months, Chancellor-elect Arnold Eisen said in an interview. Mr. Eisen said he personally favored ordaining gay rabbis as long as it was permissible according to Jewish law and the faculty approved.

"I've been asking the faculty, and time and again I got the same answer," Mr. Eisen said. "People don't know what they themselves think, and they don't know what their colleagues are thinking. There's never been a discussion like this before about this issue."

The law committee has passed contradictory rulings before, on issues like whether it is permissible to drive to synagogue on the Sabbath. But the opinions it approved on Wednesday reflect the law committee's split on homosexuality.

The one written by Rabbi Roth upholds the prohibition on gay rabbis that the committee passed overwhelmingly in 1992. Another rebuts the idea that homosexuality is biologically ingrained in every case, and suggests that some gay people could undergo "reparative therapy" to change their sexuality.

The ruling accepting gay rabbis is itself a compromise. It favors ordaining gay rabbis and blessing same-sex unions, as long as the men do not practice sodomy.

Committee members said that, in practice, it is a prohibition that will never be policed. The ruling was intended to open the door to gay people while conforming to rabbinic interpretations of the biblical passage in Leviticus which says, "Do not lie with a male as one lies with a woman; it is an abomination."

The committee also rejected two measures that argued for a complete lifting of the prohibition on homosexuality, after deciding that both amounted to a "fix" of existing Jewish law, a higher level of change that requires 13 votes to pass, which they did not receive.

Rabbi Gordon Tucker, the author of one of the rejected opinions, said he was satisfied with the compromise measure. "In effect, there isn't any real practical difference," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0103418

The Conservative movement was once the dominant stream in American Judaism but is now second in numbers to the Reform movement. Conservative Judaism has lost members in the last two decades to branches on the left and the right. Pamela S. Nadell, a professor of history and director of the Jewish Studies program at American University, said, "The conservative movement is wrestling with the whole question of how it defines itself, whether it still defines itself as a halachic movement, and that's why there was so much debate and angst over this."

Conservative Rabbis Allow Ordained Gays, Same-Sex Unions (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, December 7, 2006

NEW YORK, Dec. 6 -- A panel of rabbis gave permission Wednesday for same-sex commitment ceremonies and ordination of gays within Conservative Judaism, a wrenching change for a movement that occupies the middle ground between orthodoxy and liberalism in Judaism.

The complicated decision by the Conservatives Movement's Committee on Jewish Law and Standards leaves it up to individual seminaries whether to ordain gay rabbis and gives individual rabbis the option of sanctioning same-sex unions. Reform Judaism, the largest branch of the faith in the United States, has ordained openly gay men and lesbians since 1990 and has allowed its rabbis to perform same-sex commitment ceremonies since 2000. Orthodox Judaism does not countenance same-sex relationships or the ordination of gay rabbis.

Like many Protestant denominations, Conservative Jews are divided over homosexuality: torn between the Hebrew scriptures' condemnation of it as an "abomination" and a desire to encourage same-sex couples to form long-lasting, monogamous relationships.

Though stopping short of endorsing same-sex marriage, the rabbis wanted to allow commitment ceremonies "because in Jewish sexual ethics, promiscuity is not acceptable either by heterosexuals or by homosexuals, and we do in fact have both a Jewish and a social and a medical need to try to confirm those unions," said Rabbi Elliot Dorff of Los Angeles, one of the authors of the change.

After years of discussion and two days of intense debate behind closed doors at a synagogue on Park Avenue, the law committee accepted three teshuvot, or answers, to the question of whether Jewish law allows homosexual sex. Two answers uphold the status quo, forbidding homosexuality.

But a third answer allows same-sex ceremonies and ordination of gay men and lesbians, while maintaining a ban on anal sex. It argues that the verse in Leviticus saying "a man shall not lie with a man as with a woman" is unclear, but traditionally was understood to bar only one kind of sex between men. All other prohibitions were "added later on by the rabbis," Dorff told reporters.

Four of the law committee's 25 members resigned in protest of the decision.

It takes the votes of just six panel members to declare an answer to be valid -- meaning that it is a well-founded interpretation of Jewish law, not that it is the only legitimate position. Thirteen members voted in favor of allowing gay ordination and same-sex ceremonies, and 13 voted against -- meaning that at least one rabbi voted for both positions.

Rabbi Joel Meyers, executive vice president of the Rabbinical Assembly, an association of 1,600 Conservative rabbis, predicted that some rabbis will choose not to preside at same-sex ceremonies, and he said no rabbi would be required to perform them.

There are five seminaries that ordain Conservative rabbis. One of them, the University of Judaism in Los Angeles, is expected to begin ordaining gays in the near future. The movement's flagship seminary, the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York City, is likely to take more time. Its new chancellor, Arnold Eisen, has said he favors the change but will allow the faculty to debate the question, starting as soon as Thursday.

The other seminaries -- in Israel, Argentina and the Czech Republic -- are more traditional and may adopt the change slowly, if at all.

DOJ_NMG_0103419

The issue has been particularly difficult for the Conservative movement, which claims about 2 million members worldwide, because it does not lightly depart from traditional Jewish law, or halakha. Conservative Jews generally keep the kosher dietary rules and observe the Sabbath, though perhaps not as strictly as Orthodox Jews do.

Since the mid-1980s, however, the Conservative movement has departed from traditional law in several ways, including ordaining women, permitting Jews to drive to synagogue on the Sabbath, and eliminating special treatment of "illegitimate" children.

Some Conservative Jews argue that the reconsideration of homosexuality is no more significant, in terms of Jewish law, than these other changes. But Rabbi Joel Roth, a professor at the Jewish Theological Seminary who was among those who resigned from the law committee, said he considers the change to be "outside the pale of acceptable halakhic reasoning."

Rabbi Jerry Epstein, chief executive of the association of 700 Conservative synagogues in North America, said he did not know whether any of them would leave the movement in protest. He said he believes that they are about evenly divided for and against allowing same-sex ceremonies.

As the Conservative rabbis met in New York this week, they were conscious that they were not only deciding an important matter for their constituency but were also contributing to a national debate on the status of same-sex couples. Dorff said he hoped that the adoption of two optional, conflicting positions would serve as a model for other religious groups of how to handle deep disagreements, "so movements don't have to split up over these kinds of things."

If Castro Had A Talk Show, It Might Sound A Bit Like This (NYT)

By Andy Newman

The New York Times, December 7, 2006

MIAMI, Dec. 6 — At the far right end of the AM radio dial, a broadcast from a parallel universe emerges from the static:

Come-hither advertisements from Cuba's state travel agency. Reportage from last weekend's Fidel Castro birthday parade in Havana, complete with an admiring assessment of Soviet-era tanks. Excerpts from speeches by whichever Castro brother is running the country.

It is not a signal-jamming effort beamed from the Cuban coast like some kind of reverse Radio Martí. It is not, compadre, a joke of any sort.

It is Francisco Aruca, onetime Cuban political prisoner turned Castro admirer, speaking out from a little radio station on the industrial north side of Miami or, more often these days, from the comfort of his home office in the lush suburb of Pinecrest.

For 15 years, Mr. Aruca, founder of the first American company to run charter flights to Cuba, has doubled as on-air apologist for a man whom the vast majority of Cuban-Americans in Miami consider a despicable and murderous dictator.

In doing so, Mr. Aruca speaks to — and for — a tiny community of committed Cuban-American leftists who have endured years of public scorn, threats and, in the not-too-distant past, violence.

"I listen every day; it's the only way you can keep fairly informed in the Banana Republic of Miami," said Eddie Levy, chairman of the Cuban American Defense League, a civil rights group. "I consider him a hero. We come and go, but Aruca's there every day."

Mr. Aruca's legions of critics dismiss his show, "Ayer en Miami (Yesterday in Miami)," as a glorified infomercial for his business, Marazul Tours, which depends on good relations with the Cuban government and would benefit handsomely from the lifting of travel restrictions to Cuba, one of Mr. Aruca's many causes. Mr. Aruca buys his time slot, an hour every weekday morning, on the station, WOCN-AM (1450).

Whatever its means of support, the very persistence of the show has made it into something of an institution, however widely ridiculed. While it is anyone's guess how many of Miami-Dade County's 700,000 Cubans actually listen to the program, Mr. Aruca remains a perennial target on mainstream Spanish-language radio, the dominant medium of Cuban-American political discourse here. A popular song these days has a character impersonating Mr. Castro and discarding his customary fatigues in favor of "the Adidas outfit that Aruca bought me at Dolphin Mall," where much of Miami shops.

During the call-in segment of Mr. Aruca's show on Monday, all four phone lines were constantly busy. On the other end were at least as many foes as fans, which is how Mr. Aruca, 66, says he likes it.

DOJ_NMG_0103420

"I really believe that what I'm doing is useful for the Cubans in Cuba, for the Cuban-American community in Miami, that it is useful in the U.S., which has wrong relations with Cuba," said Mr. Aruca, a cheerful, box-shaped man with a face like a friendly bulldog. "And given the mediocrity and lack of freedom of expression and diversity that is in Miami, I have found that doing something I've always enjoyed, which is talking, I can be useful."

Mr. Aruca, born 60 miles west of Havana, was a student at a Jesuit school when Mr. Castro took power in 1959, and he became part of the counterrevolution soon after. He said he organized student strikes against the government's crackdown on free speech and was promptly arrested and sentenced to 30 years in jail. He escaped a few weeks later.

Mr. Aruca rethought his politics after he made his way to Georgetown University, where he earned degrees in economics. "I was in Washington during the Vietnam War and the civil rights movement, and came to realize that anti-Communism was not enough reason to go to war," he said. He now identifies himself as a "Christian socialist, not a Marxist," though he said he considered Mr. Castro a "political genius."

Mr. Aruca started Marazul Tours in 1979, soon after the American government began allowing family visits to Cuba. When he opened an office in Miami in 1986, he said, his windows were routinely smashed. His office was later firebombed, and a Human Rights Watch report on right-wing intimidation in South Florida singled out Mr. Aruca as a leading victim.

Joe Garcia, the former executive director of the Cuban American National Foundation, the leading voice of the Cuban exile community, said Mr. Aruca was first and foremost "a man who does business with a loathsome regime." As for his on-air opinions, Mr. Garcia said, "He calls things as he says he sees it and as he benefits from seeing it."

Mr. Aruca's company and a few other tour operators are his show's only sponsors other than the Cuban travel agency. He said most businesses dared not advertise with him for fear of boycotts.

One segment on Monday was a report that Mr. Aruca recorded after birthday parade in Havana, which the ailing honoree did not attend. "Somebody sitting next to me said that the Cuban infantry is not supposed to be able to march," Mr. Aruca says on the tape. "Looks to me like they're marching pretty well."

After playing (and praising) an excerpt from a speech at the parade by Mr. Castro's brother, Raúl, inviting the United States to begin diplomatic discussions, Mr. Aruca opened the phones.

"Did Fidel give you sneakers, the sneakers he used there?" a man asked.

"If you're going to joke around, go to other shows," Mr. Aruca said, hanging up on the caller. "Besides, Fidel doesn't know my shoe size."

Partisan Fights Likely Over Health Care In '07, But There's Hope For '08 (RC)

By Morton M. Kondracke

Roll Call, December 7, 2006

Partisan wrangling over health care could be as raucous in the new Congress as the sparring over Iraq, but in the longer run, there's reason to hope for consensus.

The Bush administration and the new Democratic Congress almost certainly will be at odds over the Medicare prescription drug program, stem-cell research and funding for the State Children's Health Insurance Program.

The administration will get nowhere — once again — if it proposes medical malpractice award ceilings to a Congress in which the trial lawyer lobby has gained influence. And Democrats detest health savings accounts, the GOP device to make individuals responsible for controlling health care costs.

But it's possible — not likely, but possible — that an agreement could be reached to expand children's health coverage.

It's also possible that Congress could help accelerate impressive Bush administration initiatives on "value-driven" health care — based on computerizing all medical records and providing accurate data on treatment outcomes — and "pay-for-performance" medicine.

And because of leadership by presidential candidate and Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (R), the plight of 47 million uninsured Americans finally may get the attention they deserve in 2008.

DOJ_NMG_0103421

In April, Romney signed into law a bipartisan program that mandates that all Massachusetts residents have health insurance while providing subsidies for the low-income uninsured. The Democratic state Legislature also imposed a fee for employers who do not provide insurance for their workers.

The top item on the Democrats' 2007 health agenda — repeal of the noninterference clause that prevents the federal government from negotiating drug prices for Medicare recipients — will set off a furious partisan battle.

Democrats are ignoring polling evidence that seniors overwhelmingly approve of the Medicare Part D drug program and the fact that private health insurance plans have negotiated savings that make the program far less costly than expected.

Democratic leaders such as incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi (Calif.), Senate Majority Whip Dick Durbin (Ill.) and the prospective chairmen of health-related committees and subcommittees all favor expanded government authority.

On the administration side, Health and Human Services Secretary Michael Leavitt told The New York Times that "government negotiation of drug prices does not work unless you have a program completely run by the government. Democrats say they want the government to negotiate prices. What they really want is government-run health care."

Democrats often cite the Veterans Administration as a model for providing drastic drug savings. But Republicans counter that the VA provides what amounts to socialized medicine, requiring veterans to see only VA-employed doctors at VA facilities and using VA pharmacies to acquire VA-approved drugs, limiting choices in a way that Medicare beneficiaries would never accept.

Democrats might merely repeal the noninterference clause. But Leavitt has said he will not authorize negotiations. If the House was to pass a bill compelling negotiations, it likely would be filibustered in the Senate. And if it passed, it almost certainly would be vetoed.

One variation is a plan proposed by Durbin and Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) to create a government-run drug plan to compete with private insurance plans. Insurance lobbyists note that Durbin's bill set a premium ceiling at $35 a month — but that the actual average cost of private plans is just $27 a month.

As part of Democratic pressure on pharmaceutical companies, Rep. Henry Waxman (D-Calif.), the incoming chairman of the Government Reform Committee, can be expected to hold hearings on drug pricing, profits and marketing techniques. A move also will be mounted to create a generic market for biologic drugs to parallel the one that now exists for chemical pharmaceuticals.

Another priority for next year is reauthorization of SCHIP meant to benefit 12 million low-income children whose parents lack health insurance and are not enrolled in Medicaid. At current funding levels, however, only 6 million have SCHIP coverage and 600,000 children may lose coverage this year because Congress has not increased the budget. Covering all 6 million would cost from $30 billion to $40 billion over five years.

The Bush administration is not expected to recommend increases, but Democrats may. "I don't see it in their 'first 100 hours' agenda, though," said Bruce Lesley, president of First Focus, a children's advocacy group. "And," he added, "they have promised 'pay as you go' budgeting and have a lot of demands for money. So, we have a lot of work to do."

Some help is being offered by the health insurance lobby America's Health Insurance Plans, which is calling for full SCHIP funding and a tax credit designed to cover all 8.3 million uninsured children — a down payment on covering the nation's 47 million uninsured.

The Bush administration has been using Medicare and executive authority to advance the cause of pay-for-performance medicine, but Congress could advance it by pushing for a single standard — or interoperability — of health information technology systems.

A recent Gallup Poll showed that 71 percent of Americans think that U.S. health care either has "major problems" or is in "a state of crisis." And 69 percent think it's up to the federal government to fix it. That's a mandate.

U.S., N. Korea Talks Regard Obligations (AP)

By George Gedda

AP, December 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0103422

In discussions with North Korean officials, U.S. diplomats offered specific details on the kind of economic and energy assistance Pyongyang would receive in exchange for dismantling its nuclear weapons facilities, a State Department official said Wednesday.

Ambassador Christopher Hill discussed what the United States and other parties to the six-nation negotiation would do in response to a credible North Korean disarmament commitment, the official said.

The basic outlines of the next steps were spelled out in a statement of principles signed by the six nations in September 2005. There has been little headway since then but Hill's talks in Beijing raised hopes about the possibility of forward movement.

The official asked not to be identified because he was not authorized to speak on the record.

The purpose of Hill's discussions in Beijing was to prepare for the next meeting of the six nations — the United States, North and South Korea, China, Japan and Russia.

The New York Times reported in its Wednesday editions that Hill told the North Koreans that progress would hinge on their agreeing to dismantle some equipment they are using to expand its nuclear arsenal, even before returning to negotiations.

Hill said last week the talks could be held in mid-December but the department official who spoke Wednesday, while not ruling out that time frame, raised the possibility of an early January meeting.

In Beijing, Hill met with North Korean Vice Foreign Minister Kim Kye Gwan, who returned to Pyongyang to present the proposals to his government.

On Tuesday, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said the Beijing discussions took place in a positive atmosphere.

"In these meetings, the North Koreans have been very engaged," he said.

The administration wants the next round of talks to be as well prepared as they can possibly be to increase chances of success," McCormack added.

In addition to economic and energy benefits, the statement of principles signed in September 2005 also contains security guarantees for North Korea.

China, Japan, South Korea, Russia and the United States all expressed a willingness in the statement to provide energy assistance.

The six also agreed to promote economic cooperation in the fields of energy, trade and investment.

Japan's Former PM Weighing Nuke Talks In NKorea (AFP)

AFP, December 7, 2006

Japan's former prime minister Junichiro Koizumi is weighing a third visit to North Korea to persuade the communist regime to give up its nuclear ambitions, public NHK broadcaster reported.

"It's plausible to think about my visiting Pyongyang for the third time," Koizumi was quoted as telling fellow lawmakers late Wednesday.

"I want to realize the denuclearization of the Korean Peninsula, which is an absolute must, although I don't interfere with Prime Minister (Shinzo) Abe's policy management."

Koizumi, whom Abe succeeded as prime minister in September, visited North Korea in 2002 and again in 2004 for talks with its leader Kim Jong-Il.

Abe, who accompanied Koizumi on his first visit, rose to prominence as a hardliner on North Korea.

Abe's government slapped a sweeping ban on North Korean imports after Pyongyang tested a nuclear bomb on October 9.

Koizumi had resisted imposing sanctions on North Korea, warning against further isolating the impoverished regime.

In his remarks on a potential visit to Pyongyang, Koizumi said he stood by his two-front strategy of dialogue and pressure.

"We can't abandon dialogue," Koizumi said according to NHK, whose source was lawmaker Taku Yamasaki, a longtime confidante of the former premier.

The first Koizumi-Kim summit in 2002 produced the Pyongyang Declaration in which they agreed to "comply with all related international agreements aimed at an overall resolution of the nuclear issues on the Korean Peninsula."

DOJ_NMG_0103423

"It's necessary to ensure that the Declaration is valid, and it's plausible to think about my visiting North Korea for the third time," Koizumi said, as quoted by NHK.

"I want to revitalize the declaration, and I don't mind visiting Pyongyang for this end," he added.

But Koizumi, Japan's longest-serving premier in three decades, failed at his avowed goal to normalize relations with North Korea before leaving office, in part due to an emotionally charged row over kidnappings.

At the 2002 summit, Kim admitted that North Korea had abducted Japanese civilians in the past to train the regime's spies. He later allowed five kidnap victims and their families to return home.

Abe has led calls for tough action unless North Korea comes clean on other victims allegedly being kept under wraps.

North Korea has repeatedly demanded Japan's exclusion from six-nation talks which are slated to resume on ending Pyongyang's nuclear program.

"It is quite obvious that Japan will do nothing but bad at the talks even if it is allowed to attend them," the North's official Korean Central News Agency said Wednesday.

U.S.-Indian Nuclear Bill Bogged Down (AP)

By Foster Klug

AP, December 7, 2006

A bill to allow U.S. shipment of civilian nuclear fuel to India has bogged down as lawmakers try to reconcile differences in the waning days of the congressional session.

The second-ranking House Republican stalled a preliminary settlement on the text after an agreement was reached Wednesday morning, according to congressional aides.

The aides, who declined to be identified because of the sensitivity of negotiations over the bill, said Rep. John Boehner, R-Ohio, appeared to be interested in attaching unrelated legislation, though they did not know what that might be.

The majority leader's office denied that he was holding up the bill and said talks were under way.

Negotiations were expected to resume Thursday.

The Indian plan is a foreign policy priority for President Bush, whose Republican majority in Congress ends in January when Democrats take control.

Both the House and Senate have endorsed the proposal, which would overturn three decades of U.S. anti-proliferation policy.

The Senate version would require that Bush determine that India is "fully and actively" cooperating with U.S.-led efforts to confront Iran's nuclear ambitions before he could allow nuclear cooperation with India. The House on Tuesday approved a nonbinding motion to instruct its negotiators to retain the Senate's language on Iran.

The Bush administration and the Indian government have urged lawmakers to remove the condition.

Critics of the agreement say U.S.-Indian cooperation could boost India's nuclear arsenal and spark a nuclear arms race with rival Pakistan. Proponents say the plan strengthens a key relationship with a friendly Asian power that has long maintained what the United States considers a responsible nuclear program.

U.N. Seeks $450M In Aid For Palestinians (AP)

By Ravi Nessman

AP, December 7, 2006

U.N. aid groups are asking for a record $450 million to staunch a deepening Palestinian humanitarian crisis, saying Wednesday that international sanctions and Israeli limits on Gaza exports have devastated the Palestinian economy.

Despite that gloomy assessment, a top minister in the Hamas-led government offered a rare upbeat economic picture, saying increased aid from Arab countries had allowed the government to stay afloat. But independent economists and analysts said the government was still deep in crisis.

The U.N.'s huge aid appeal came as poverty was worsening throughout Gaza and the West Bank. The U.N. will officially launch its appeal Thursday, but The Associated Press obtained an advance copy of the report.

DOJ_NMG_0103424

According to the U.N., 65 percent of Palestinians were living in poverty and 29 percent were unemployed. The Palestinian health care system was running out of medicine and on the verge of collapse, and nearly 50 percent of Palestinians did not have reliable access to food.

"Under the current circumstances, poverty levels keep continuing to rise," said David Shearer, Gaza and West Bank head of the U.N.'s Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs.

About three-quarters of the $453 million being requested is earmarked for job creation, cash assistance and food aid, Shearer said. The U.N. is also asking for money to support the faltering health and education systems.

Much of the economic damage stems from the international boycott that Israel and Western nations imposed on the Palestinian Authority after the militant Islamic Hamas group won parliamentary elections and took office in March.

The boycott has left the Palestinian government unable to pay full salaries to its 165,000 workers, who make up the backbone of the Palestinian economy.

Israeli limits on exports from the impoverished Gaza Strip and increased restrictions on movement across the West Bank have also damaged the economy, Shearer said.

"Coming on top of the problems with access of movement, (the economic boycott) has had a massive impact on poverty levels within the West Bank and Gaza," he said, explaining that the 165,000 workers support around 1 million people.

Many had expected the international sanctions to force the government to moderate its views toward Israel. But nine months after taking power, Hamas refuses to accept international demands that it recognize Israel and renounce violence, and negotiations over the formation of a national unity government that could sidestep the sanctions have stalled.

"While humanitarian aid can slow the deterioration, what is really needed is a political settlement to the issue," Shearer said.

Acting Palestinian Finance Minister Samir Abu Aisha said Wednesday that his government had managed to remain afloat because Arab and European countries increased their donations to the Palestinians — though not necessarily to the Hamas government — to make up for the aid cut.

European countries have stepped up humanitarian aid, channeled through an international fund that bypasses Hamas. Arab countries, meanwhile, have sent hundreds of millions of dollars in aid, in most cases through the office of moderate President Mahmoud Abbas of the Fatah Party.

Abu Aisha said Arab governments had increased their direct payments to the government from $20 million a month before Hamas came to power to $45 million. He said that $60.5 million in cash had been carried into Gaza by Hamas officials returning from Egypt, and the government would continue using this tactic to circumvent the boycott.

Hamas was also optimistic after Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh received new pledges of aid during his current trip abroad, including a promise from Qatar for $30 million a month to cover the salaries of teachers and some health workers.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice questioned Qatar's Foreign Minister Sheik Hamad bin Jassim bin Jabir al-Thani about the aid package on Wednesday, but the Qatari diplomat said "the salaries will go in the proper channel" and skirt Hamas.

There was no immediate account of the meeting by the State Department. On Tuesday, spokesman Sean McCormack said if the money was used to pay the salaries of Hamas members or was funneled through Hamas, "that would cross a line of the existing international understanding."

Abu Aisha said the government has managed to give civil servants 59 percent of their back pay. He blamed the financial hardship still afflicting Palestinians not on the international boycott, but on Israel's seizure of hundreds of millions of dollars in tax revenues.

That sum now equals $550 million, he said at a news conference in the West Bank city of Ramallah, "and could immediately solve the financial crisis if we receive it."

Miri Eisin, an Israeli spokeswoman, said Israel would be willing to rethink its seizure of the tax funds once the Palestinian government accepts the international demands and releases Cpl. Gilad Shalit, an Israeli soldier captured by Hamas-linked militants in June.

The increased aid has blunted the pressure on Hamas and given the Islamic group some breathing room, said Naser Abdel Karim, an economics professor at Bir Zeit University outside Ramallah.

DOJ_NMG_0103425

"(But) we shouldn't fool ourselves, as Palestinians, that the situation will get better, and then not go ahead with our plan to form a government that will lift the boycott and the siege," he said.

"Otherwise, we will continue to live like a sick person in an intensive care unit."

Report Says 2 Israelis Held By Hezbollah Were Wounded (NYT)

By Dina Kraft

The New York Times, December 7, 2006

TEL AVIV, Dec. 6 — The two Israeli Army reservists whose capture in a cross-border raid set off Israel's war with Hezbollah last summer were seriously wounded in the attack, an Israeli military report that emerged on Wednesday was quoted as saying.

According to accounts in the Israeli news media about the previously secret Israeli Army report, portions of which were leaked to the Israeli media, one of the soldiers was critically wounded in the attack, on July 12, and the other was seriously wounded.

Hezbollah has refused to offer proof that the pair, Ehud Goldwasser, 31, and Eldad Regev, 26, are alive. Instead they have demanded that Israel hand over several Arab prisoners in exchange for them.

The information about the two reservists, along with recent comments by Prime Minister Ehud Olmert that he wanted proof that the two soldiers were alive before making any decision on an exchange, raised speculation here that the two could be dead. The newly revealed information was the first official word since the capture on what may have happened to the two reservists.

It was not clear who had leaked the details of the report or why. But after the news reports on Wednesday, the military censor agreed to lift a ban on revealing the existence of the report, a medical and forensics study produced by the army.

The Israeli Army spokesman's office issued a statement confirming that such a report existed and that the army was continuing to work on the assumption that the two were alive. It also said the report "includes the results of different tests and experiments intended to produce an accurate assessment of the abducted soldiers' current status."

Mr. Olmert, whose credibility was badly damaged by the war, has been under intense pressure, especially from the families of the captives, to make a deal for their release. Speculation that they might not have survived long in Hezbollah captivity may decrease that pressure and alter the way Israel negotiates with Hezbollah.

The accounts said the loss of blood and evidence on the scene suggested that the two soldiers would, at the very least, have required urgent medical attention.

But details about what happened to the two men remained unclear. It was not known which of the two suffered critical injuries or what kind of injuries they were believed to have suffered.

Benny Regev, 35, a brother of Eldad Regev, said he had seen the report but said the extent of the possible injuries had been worded "more softly" than the descriptions reported in the Israeli press. He said the report, which the families of the captives first saw in mid-August, strengthened their belief that their loved ones were alive because they were apparently taken wounded — but not dead — from the scene of the attack, the Western border road between Israel and Lebanon.

"We think that Israel needs to make every effort to release them and bring them back to Israel," Mr. Regev said in a telephone interview. "This cannot be allowed to pass quietly."

He said he considered it a war crime for Hezbollah to refuse to let the Red Cross visit the captured soldiers or to provide any solid information about their well-being.

Israeli Official Discusses Iran And His Controversial Agenda (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, December 7, 2006

JERUSALEM, Dec. 6 — The newest member of Israel's center-left government seems out of place. Avigdor Lieberman is a West Bank settler who has advocated killing the leaders of the Palestinian group Hamas and reducing the number of Arabs who are Israeli citizens.

Yet his portfolio is among the country's most sensitive — developing Israel's strategy on Iran.

Mr. Lieberman, who became Israel's minister for strategic affairs a month ago, is making his first visit to the United States in that capacity on Thursday and will meet with American officials, including Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

DOJ_NMG_0103426

In an interview on the eve of his trip, he said, "Our first task is to convince Western countries to adopt a tough approach to the Iranian problem," which he called "the biggest threat facing the Jewish people since the Second World War."

He added, "We must also be prepared to deal alone with this problem."

For now, Israel's policy is to remain relatively low-key and to work with the United States and Europe in search of a way to halt or contain Iran's nuclear program. Mr. Lieberman says he supports this position, while making clear he has no faith in the diplomatic efforts.

"The dialogue with Iran will be a 100-percent failure, just like it was with North Korea," said Mr. Lieberman, who came here from the Soviet Union in 1978, was first elected to Parliament in 1999 and served in the cabinet of the former prime minister, Ariel Sharon.

At the beginning of this year, Mr. Lieberman's Israel Beiteinu Party had only three parliamentary seats, and its appeal seemed limited to immigrants from the former Soviet Union. But the party won 11 seats in March, boosting Mr. Lieberman's stature considerably.

When Prime Minister Ehud Olmert wanted to broaden his coalition government, he invited Mr. Lieberman to join, making him a deputy prime minister and creating the new Ministry of Strategic Affairs. The move rankled the more liberal members of the coalition and drew sharp criticism from Arab lawmakers in Israel's Parliament.

"I've always been controversial because I offer new ideas," the bearded Mr. Lieberman, 48, said in his parliamentary office on Wednesday. "For me to be controversial, I think this is positive."

Mr. Lieberman's most provocative plan calls for dividing Jews and Arabs into two homogeneous states, a proposal his Arab critics often describe as racist.

Mr. Lieberman calls for a land and population exchange that would seek to reduce significantly the number of Arabs who are Israeli citizens. They currently account for more than a million of Israel's 7 million people.

Under the plan, several Arab towns in northern Israel would become part of the Palestinian areas in the West Bank. The major Jewish settlement blocs in the West Bank would become part of Israel.

In addition, Mr. Lieberman wants to revamp Israel's citizenship laws. All Israelis, Jews and Arabs would have to pledge loyalty to the state and recognize Israel as a Jewish state. Those who refuse could be permanent residents, but would no longer be citizens, he said.

"The best solution is separation between the nations and the creation of homogeneous states," he said.

The plan has no support within the current government, aside from Mr. Lieberman. When Mr. Lieberman mentioned it recently, Mr. Olmert immediately distanced himself, saying Israeli Arabs were an integral part of Israeli society.

"I think he expresses racist thinking," Mohammad Barakeh, an Arab member of Israel's Parliament, said of Mr. Lieberman. "He's dangerous for us, and dangerous for democracy in Israel. We were here before he arrived in this land, and we will be here after he has disappeared politically."

As a group, Israeli Arabs staunchly oppose moves to take away their Israeli citizenship, though most strongly support Palestinian aspirations of statehood. The Palestinians, meanwhile, say Jewish settlements in the West Bank are illegal and should be dismantled.

None of this keeps Mr. Lieberman from advocating his plan.

"I think the biggest problem of the 21st century is how to deal with minorities," Mr. Lieberman said. "Every country where you have two languages, two religions and two races, you have conflict."

He argues that his plan has been misunderstood, and while its tenets have not changed since its introduction two years ago, he now tends to use language that sounds less harsh.

"We won't be moving people, we will be moving the borders," Mr. Lieberman said. "It's not a transfer."

He is much better known for urging tough measures against Palestinian militants. Last month, before a cease-fire took effect in the Gaza Strip, he called for Israel to focus on the top members of Hamas, the radical Islamic group that leads the Palestinian government.

"We need to concentrate on those who have something to lose, the entire upper echelon of Hamas and Islamic Jihad," he said. "The leadership of Hamas needs to go to heaven."

Former Aide Parts With Carter Over Book (NYT)

By Brenda Goodman And Julie Bosman

The New York Times, December 7, 2006

ATLANTA, Ga., Dec. 6 — An adviser to former President Jimmy Carter and onetime executive director of the Carter Center has publicly parted ways with his former boss, citing concerns with the accuracy and integrity of Mr. Carter's latest book, "Palestine Peace Not Apartheid."

The adviser, Kenneth W. Stein, a professor of Middle Eastern history and political science at Emory University, resigned his position as a fellow with the Carter Center on Tuesday, ending a 23-year association with the institution.

In a two-page letter explaining his action, Mr. Stein called the book "replete with factual errors, copied materials not cited, superficialities, glaring omissions and simply invented segments." Mr. Stein said he had used similar language in a private letter he sent to Mr. Carter, but received no reply.

"In the letter to him, I told him, 'It's your prerogative to write anything you want when you want,' " Mr. Stein said in a telephone interview Wednesday. "That's not why I'm resigning."

Mr. Stein said that he admired the former president's accomplishments but that felt he had to distance himself from the Carter Center and the book, which was published by Simon & Schuster.

"It's an issue of how history should be written," Mr. Stein said. "I had to distance myself from something that was coming close to me professionally."

Deanna Congelio, spokeswoman for Mr. Carter, released a statement with his response: "Although Professor Kenneth Stein has not been actively involved with the Carter Center for more than 12 years, I regret his resignation from the titular position as a fellow." It did not address Mr. Stein's criticism of the book.

That criticism is the latest in a growing chorus of academics who have taken issue with the book, including Alan M. Dershowitz, professor of law at Harvard, who called the book "ahistorical," and David Makovsky, director of the Project on the Middle East Process at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy.

"I was just very saddened by it," Mr. Makovsky said. "I just found so many errors."

Mr. Carter's use of "apartheid" in the title has attracted much of the controversy. The Simon Wiesenthal Center in Los Angeles released a statement on Monday saying the former president harbors bias against Israel. "There is no Israeli apartheid policy, and President Carter knows it," the statement read.

But Mr. Stein's criticism of the book has been perhaps the sharpest cut.

Mr. Stein was executive director of the Carter Center from 1983 to 1986 and had continued to serve as a Middle East fellow until Tuesday. In 1985, he wrote a book with Mr. Carter, "The Blood of Abraham: Insights in the Middle East," which was published by Houghton-Mifflin.

Mr. Stein said the former president had come to speak to his class as recently as last month. Mr. Stein declined to detail all the inaccuracies he found, saying he was still documenting them for a planned review of the book; but he did offer a few examples.

Mr. Carter, he said, remembers White House staff members in 1990 being preoccupied by the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait when the former president tried to describe to them talks he had had with Middle Eastern leaders. But the White House briefings occurred in the spring, Mr. Stein said, and the invasion of Kuwait was not until August.

"You can't write history simply off the top of your head and expect it to be credible," he said.

Mr. Stein also said he had been struck by parts of Mr. Carter's book that seemed strikingly similar to a work by a different author, but he would not disclose the details.

"There are elements in the book that were lifted from another source," Mr. Stein said. "That other source is now acting on his or her own advice about what to do because of this."

David Rosenthal, the publisher of Simon & Schuster, dismissed Mr. Stein's claims. "We're confident in his work," Mr. Rosenthal said of Mr. Carter. "Do we check every line in every book? No, but that's not the issue here. I have no reason to doubt President Carter's research."

DOJ_NMG_0103428

Still other observers familiar with the sometimes contentious relationship between Mr. Carter and Mr. Stein said Mr. Stein might have been motivated by more than preserving academic integrity.

"He feels snubbed he wasn't given any kind of acknowledgment for the work he's done with Carter," said Douglas Brinkley, professor of history at Tulane University in New Orleans. "It's a bit of bruised ego and philosophical difference being displayed in public here."

Carter Book On Israel 'Apartheid' Sparks Bitter Debate (WP)

By Karen Deyoung

The Washington Post, December 7, 2006

A veteran Middle East scholar affiliated with the Carter Center in Atlanta resigned his position there Monday in an escalating controversy over former president Jimmy Carter's bestselling book on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

The book, "Palestine: Peace Not Apartheid," traces the ups and downs of the Israeli-Palestinian peace process beginning with Carter's 1977-1980 presidency and the historic peace accord he negotiated between Israel and Egypt and continuing to the present. Although it apportions blame to Israel, the Palestinians and outside parties -- including the United States -- for the failure of decades of peace efforts, it is sharply critical of Israeli policy and concludes that "Israel's continued control and colonization of Palestinian land have been the primary obstacles to a comprehensive peace agreement in the Holy Land."

Kenneth W. Stein, a professor at Emory University, accused Carter of factual errors, omissions and plagiarism in the book. "Being a former President does not give one a unique privilege to invent information," Stein wrote in a harshly worded e-mail to friends and colleagues explaining his resignation as the center's Middle East fellow.

Stein offered no specifics in his e-mail to back up the charges, writing only that "in due course, I shall detail these points and reflect on their origins."

A statement issued by the center yesterday in Carter's name said he regretted Stein's resignation "from the titular position as a Fellow" and noted that he had not been "actively involved" there for the past 12 years. Carter thanked Stein for his advice and assistance "during the early years of our Center" and wished him well.

While acknowledging that the word "apartheid" refers to the system of legal racial separation once used in South Africa, Carter says in his book that it is an appropriate term for Israeli policies devoted to "the acquisition of land" in Palestinian territories through Jewish settlements and Israel's incorporation of Palestinian land on its side of a separating wall it is erecting.

He criticizes suicide bombers and those who "consider the killing of Israelis as victories" but also notes that "some Israelis believe they have the right to confiscate and colonize Palestinian land and try to justify the sustained subjugation and persecution of increasingly hopeless and aggravated Palestinians."

Accusing the Bush administration of abandoning the effort to promote a lasting peace, he calls for renewed negotiations on the basis of security guarantees for Israel and Israel's recognition of U.N.-established borders.

Formally published three weeks ago, the book quickly became a bestseller. Carter has been prominently interviewed in the media and has been mobbed at book appearances around the country.

Speaking Sunday on NBC's "Meet the Press," he said he was glad the book had raised controversy. "If it provokes debate and assessment and disputes and arguments and maybe some action in the Middle East to get the peace process, which is now completely absent or dormant, rejuvenated, and brings peace ultimately to Israel, that's what I want," he said.

Criticism of the book, primarily from Jewish groups and leaders, began even before it was published, and it became an issue in the midterm elections last month. The New York-based Jewish Daily Forward noted in October that Democrats were trying to distance themselves from its reported contents as Republicans were seeking to widely disseminate Carter's views in an effort to win Jewish votes.

Speaking to the Forward about Carter, Republican Jewish Coalition executive director Matthew Brooks said the coalition had "not shied away from shining a light on some of his misguided and outrageous comments about Israel in the past. . . . So far, there's been nothing but silence on the part of the Democratic establishment in terms of holding Carter accountable."

Rep. Steve Israel, a Democrat from New York, told the Forward that the "book clearly does not reflect the direction of the party."

DOJ_NMG_0103429

Since then, the controversy has only grown. In a widely published commentary last weekend, Harvard law professor Alan Dershowitz wrote that Carter's "use of the loaded word 'apartheid,' suggesting an analogy to the hated policies of South Africa, is especially outrageous."

In a statement issued Monday, the Simon Wiesenthal Center in Los Angeles contended that Carter "abandons all objectivity and unabashedly acts as a virtual spokesman for the Palestinian cause."

In a telephone interview yesterday, Stein said that Carter had "taken [material] directly" from a published work written by a third party but that legal action was being contemplated and he was not yet at liberty to make the details public. He said accounts in the book about meetings he had attended with Carter between 1980 and 1990 had left out key facts in order to "make the Israelis look like they're the only ones responsible" for the failure of peace efforts.

Paulson Tempers Expectations For China Visit (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, December 7, 2006

As Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson prepares to lead a delegation to China, he is seeking to temper the expectations of lawmakers and business interests eager for action by Beijing.

Mr. Paulson is cautioning that he won't have any big announcement after the high-level visit next week, saying he views the meeting with Chinese leaders as the beginning of a "long term" discussion, and that simply sitting down to discuss economic issues with top Chinese officials should be seen as progress.

"This is the first session of a strategic dialogue where we're dealing with long-term issues," Mr. Paulson said in an interview in London last week. "Meaningful progress to me is being able to have a really substantive interchange where each side is not reading from a prearranged script and where there's listening and learning going on."

But Mr. Paulson is likely to come under increasing pressure from members of Congress and U.S. manufacturers, who want less talk and more action. They expect the secretary to press Beijing to move quickly with a number of economic overhauls, including adopting a more flexible currency.

While Mr. Paulson is just beginning to engage the Chinese in his role as Treasury secretary, the U.S. and China have long participated in bilateral relations, including two-way or multilateral commissions, dialogues, partnerships and forums addressing everything from trade policy to energy to health care.

"We've been having these conversations for quite some time and we'd better get going here," said John Engler, president of the National Association of Manufacturers.

The risk for Mr. Paulson is that if he doesn't deliver tangible results, protectionist urges in Congress could hamper his ability to negotiate with Beijing and complicate the efforts of U.S. business to compete globally.

In particular, manufacturing executives worry that unless China loosens its grip on the yuan and complies with international trade agreements, U.S. lawmakers will try to impose punitive measures that could limit access and trade. In the past few months, the Chinese have been allowing the yuan to rise against the dollar and the currency is now 5.7% stronger than it was in July 2005, when authorities initially allowed it to move. But that pace isn't fast enough to satisfy some critics.

Meanwhile, China's trade surplus in November reached $23.37 billion, just short of October's record, but high enough to continue inflaming concerns that China is keeping its currency artificially weak to gain an unfair advantage in global markets. China released the trade-surplus figure earlier than usual, ahead of Mr. Paulson's visit.

"The clock is ticking," said Sen. Charles Schumer (D., N.Y.), who has threatened to push Congress for a 27.5% tariff on Chinese goods if Beijing doesn't revalue its currency. "Paulson has a tremendous amount of goodwill, but no amount of talking is going to substitute for the Chinese doing something."

The pressure poses a challenge for the secretary, who is seeking to establish an economic dialogue between two countries, which historically have viewed one another with suspicion. While Mr. Paulson has said publicly that he wants China to move ahead "quickly" with its overhauls, many of the biggest tension points between the two countries will take more than a few conversations to resolve, such as opening China's markets to competition and moving it away from exports to promote more domestic consumption.

Expectations of Mr. Paulson's trip have been raised even higher by the makeup of the delegation accompanying him. When he heads to Beijing next week, he will be joined by Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke, a host of cabinet members, including U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab, Commerce Secretary Carlos Guitterez, dozens of aides, staffers and a phalanx of security. The U.S. delegation will meet with Chinese President Hu Jintao and Premier Wen Jiabao, in addition to Vice Premier Wu Yi, who was chosen by Mr. Hu to lead China's side of the talks.

Daniel Tarullo, a former adviser to President Clinton on international economic policy, said that while the U.S. has long been in discussions with Beijing about economic issues, the senior-level participation of the Paulson talks and their timing definitely raise the bar. "Secretary Paulson has framed expectations that this dialogue will produce positive results. He's been careful not to promise there will be a change in the exchange rate, but he cannot help but have expectations out there now," said Mr. Tarullo, a law professor at Georgetown University.

But even reaching accord on what will be discussed in next week's meetings took delicate negotiation. Treasury officials have been working with their Chinese counterparts to reach consensus on the topics and format of the talks, which will focus on such issues as China's economic overhauls, energy policies, health and access to China's markets.

And while Mr. Paulson has had extensive dealings with China as head of Goldman Sachs and in his environmental work there, policy experts say what happens in China is largely out of his control, particularly with regard to the country's currency.

"At the margin, he can contribute to the debate and the discussion in China, but it's primarily a domestic argument," said Nicholas Lardy of the Institute for International Economics, a Washington think tank. "The Chinese are deadlocked. They can't agree on a strategy so they're doing nothing."

That could further complicate Mr. Paulson's efforts, given that many in Congress say something needs to happen soon. Many new members elected in last month's midterm elections that brought Democratic control of the next Congress campaigned against free trade. And they seized on China in particular, floating such ideas as restricting imports or imposing restrictions or punishments for intellectual-property violations.

British Elevate Spy Death Case To Murder Investigation (LAT)

By David Holley And Kim Murphy

The Los Angeles Times, December 7, 2006

LONDON — British authorities Wednesday formally classified the recent poisoning death of a dissident former Russian spy as a murder case, changing it from the category of a suspicious death.

Alexander Litvinenko is believed to have been poisoned with radioactive polonium-210, probably on Nov. 1, a day when he met with several people in London.

British and Russian investigators questioned one of those people, Russian businessman Dmitry Kovtun, at a Moscow hospital Wednesday, where he was apparently undergoing checks for radiation. Questioning of a second businessman, Andrei Lugovoy, who attended the same meeting and is also now hospitalized, was put off at least to Thursday.

Both men have been viewed as key witnesses and potential suspects.

Police are pursuing "many lines of inquiry" in both Britain and Russia and have interviewed a number of witnesses, a statement from the Metropolitan Police said.

"Detectives investigating the death of Alexander Litvinenko have reached the stage where it is felt appropriate to treat it as an allegation of murder," said the statement.

"Detectives in this case are keeping an open mind, and methodically following the evidence," it added. "It is important to stress that we have reached no conclusions as to the means employed, the motive or the identity of those who might be responsible for Mr. Litvinenko's death."

Among Litvinenko's close friends in London was Akhmed Zakayev, foreign minister in Chechnya's self-declared separatist government, whom the Kremlin calls a terrorist. Zakayev said Wednesday that Litvinenko converted to Islam as he lay dying, and that a Muslim funeral service would be held for him Thursday in a London mosque.

Litvinenko's body will not be brought to the funeral, due to safety concerns because of the polonium-210, but instead will be taken directly to a cemetery for burial after the service, Zakayev said.

Doctors have found that Mario Scaramella, an Italian security consultant who met Litvinenko at a London sushi restaurant on Nov. 1, also has significant quantities of polonium-210 in his body. Scaramella was released from a London hospital Wednesday in apparent general good health.

The British Foreign Office announced Wednesday that small traces of radiation have been found at the British embassy in Moscow.

Businessman Lugovoy visited the British embassy early in the investigation to offer cooperation and deny any involvement in Litvinenko's poisoning. That visit triggered the examination.

British officials said an expert team had conducted precautionary checks on the embassy, detecting small traces of radiation, but below levels at which there would be a risk to health.

While investigators were speaking with Kovtun, Lugovoy spoke with the Russian news agency Interfax and expressed willingness to be questioned.

"Currently they are talking to my business partner Dmitry Kovtun, who is undergoing a medical examination at the same hospital as myself," Lugovoy said. "I cannot exclude the possibility that, after talking to my partner, the investigators will decide to talk to me as well. I want to repeat again that I have never refused to meet with British investigators.

Lugovoy also expressed anger at becoming a target of speculation in media reports.

"As for the hullabaloo about me that has been stirred by Western media, in my view good theatrical directing is traceable here," he said. "I've stopped watching television and reading papers. I'm fed up with all this."

Lugovoy's lawyer, Andrei Romashov, told Interfax that British investigators had said they wished to question his client as a witness, not a suspect, in the case.

In Britain, health officials have also found traces of radiation at about 14 locations in London, including Emirates Stadium in North London, where Lugovoy and a large number of other Russians attended a soccer match between Moscow's CSKA team and London's Arsenal on Nov. 1.

Health Protection Agency spokeswoman Alex Baker said tests on a certain area of the stadium were conducted at the request of Scotland Yard and confirmed "barely detectable" levels of a radioactive substance. "We determined there was no risk to public health, and we made that clear," she said.

Holley reported from Moscow and Murphy from London. Times staff writer Sergei L. Loiko in Moscow contributed to this report.

Ex-spy's Death To Be Treated As Murder (AP)

By Jill Lawless

AP, December 7, 2006

Scotland Yard said Wednesday it is treating the death of former Russian spy Alexander Litvinenko as murder.

The announcement came nearly two weeks after Litvinenko died in a London hospital; the rare radioactive substance polonium-210 was found in his body. Scotland Yard detectives are in Moscow as part of the widening investigation into his death.

"Detectives ... have reached the stage where it is felt appropriate to treat it as an allegation of murder," the Metropolitan Police said. "It is important to stress that we have reached no conclusions as to the means employed, the motive or the identity of those who might be responsible for Mr. Litvinenko's death."

Earlier Wednesday, Mario Scaramella, the Italian security expert who met with Litvinenko on Nov. 1, the day the former agent fell ill, was released from a London hospital after showing no signs of radiation poisoning.

Scaramella was in good health, University College Hospital spokesman Ian Lloyd said. He was hospitalized after testing positive for polonium-210.

A British official also said faint levels of the same element had been found at two locations at London's Emirates Stadium, where a key figure in the investigation, former Russian agent Andrei Lugovoi, attended a soccer match Nov. 1.

DOJ_NMG_0103432

The radiation was "barely detectable" and posed no public health risk, said Katherine Lewis, spokeswoman for the Health Protection Agency.

Traces also were found at the British Embassy in Moscow, the Foreign Office said. Officials said the level was low and posed no risk to health.

The health agency has been tracking a number of sites found to be contaminated with polonium-210, including a sushi bar and a hotel Litvinenko visited Nov. 1. He died in a London hospital on Nov. 23.

The restaurant, Itsu Sushi, said Wednesday that it would reopen in the new year. It said all its staff had been given a clean bill of health.

Lugovoi, who is hospitalized in Moscow for tests for possible radiation contamination, attended a match at Emirates Stadium between CSKA Moscow and Arsenal on Nov. 1, the same day he met Litvinenko.

A former KGB officer, Lugovoi told Ekho Moskvy radio in Moscow that he had known Litvinenko for a decade, dating back to Lugovoi's tenure as head of security for ORT television, which was controlled at the time by tycoon Boris Berezovsky, who now lives in London.

He said Litvinenko had contacted him from London about a year ago with some business-related proposals, and that they had met intermittently in London since then.

One of Lugovoi's business associates, Vyacheslav Sokolenko, said British investigators were due to meet with Lugovoi on Wednesday. But ITAR-Tass quoted a lawyer for Lugovoi, Andrei Romashov, as saying the meeting with Scotland Yard detectives would take place Thursday or Friday.

"Representatives of law enforcement agencies have not notified us of a date or time," Romashov was quoted as saying.

ABC News reported that British detectives had identified Lugovoi as a prime suspect in Litvinenko's poisoning. The report cited an unidentified senior British official.

British police have publicly named Lugovoi only as a witness. A British government official, who requested anonymity because he is not authorized to speak to the press, said Lugovoi was "one of many people investigators are looking to question, but I wouldn't call him a suspect at this point."

"We're also looking at the possibility there were criminal gangs involved," he said. "I think the investigation will take a very long time but I doubt any one person will be named or implicated in the end."

Lugovoi told the ITAR-Tass news agency that he was undergoing tests for possible radiation contamination, and that the results would be ready in a few days. He said he was prepared to answer all the British investigators' questions.

"I intend to fully satisfy their interest and am waiting for an invitation from the law enforcement organs," he was quoted as saying.

"Once I give all the necessary testimony to the law enforcement organs, I intend to publicly put an end to (speculation) about my supposed involvement in this story that has caused such a stir," he said.

Lugovoi traveled to London three times in the month before Litvinenko's death and met with Litvinenko four times, according to Russian media.

Litvinenko's funeral is expected to take place this week.

His father, Walter, told Radio Liberty that his son had converted and wished to receive a Muslim burial. "He told me about his decision two days before he died. He said, 'Papa, I have to talk to you about something serious. I've become a Muslim.'"

An ally of Litvinenko said the ex-spy converted to Islam on his deathbed.

"He told me that he wanted to convert to Islam literally in his first days in the hospital," said Chechen rebel envoy Akhmed Zakayev.

"I did not pay a lot of attention to this," Zakayev told Radio Liberty, "but he returned to the theme again and again."

Zakayev said that on Nov. 22, Litvinenko was visited in hospital by an imam, who read a Quranic verse traditionally said over the dying.

Litvinenko's friend Alex Goldfarb confirmed an imam visited the hospital, "when he was heavily sedated and on the verge of death."

He said he did not know whether his friend had converted.

DOJ_NMG_0103433

"He was basically a nonreligious person as long as I knew him," Goldfarb said.

Witness Questioned In Spy Death Case (AP)

By Judith Ingram

AP, December 7, 2006

Scotland Yard called the radiation poisoning of former Russian intelligence agent Alexander Litvinenko a murder Wednesday, as Russian and British investigators questioned a witness in the case in Moscow.

Two weeks after Litvinenko's death, the trail of trace amounts of the radioactive substance polonium-210 continued to expand Wednesday, as authorities said they discovered tiny amounts at a London soccer stadium and the British Embassy in Moscow.

Litvinenko's family, meanwhile, prepared for his funeral, as friends described his deathbed conversion to Islam.

The 43-year-old Litvinenko, a critic of Russian President Vladimir Putin, died Nov. 23 in London, where he lived in self-imposed exile.

After his death, a friend read a statement in which Litvinenko called Putin "the person responsible" for his death. The Kremlin denied the allegation.

The investigation began even before the radioactive poison killed Litvinenko, but until Wednesday police had not formally declared the case a homicide.

"Detectives ... have reached the stage where it is felt appropriate to treat it as an allegation of murder," London's Metropolitan Police said in a statement. "It is important to stress that we have reached no conclusions as to the means employed, the motive or the identity of those who might be responsible for Mr. Litvinenko's death."

Interfax news agency reported that British and Russian investigators on Tuesday and Wednesday interrogated Dmitry Kovtun, one of at least two Russian businessmen who met Litvinenko in London's Millennium Hotel on Nov. 1, hours before he fell ill.

Kovtun and an associate, Andrei Lugovoi, have told the Russian media they went to London as part of a group of Moscow soccer fans, and met briefly with their exiled countryman to discuss business matters. Later, they attended a match between CSKA Moscow and Arsenal at the Emirates Stadium in north London.

Both men have told reporters in Moscow that someone is trying to frame them in Litvinenko's death.

Boris Berezovsky, a flamboyant Russian tycoon and political foe of Putin, routinely entertains friends and associates in a private box at the stadium. Litvinenko joined Berezovsky's emigre circle after fleeing Russia in 2000.

Lugovoi is thought to have asked Berezovsky for tickets, but the tycoon's box was full and Lugovoi's party of eight received tickets to seats elsewhere in the stadium.

Authorities on Wednesday added the stadium to a list of more than a dozen sites in London where traces of polonium-210 have been found.

Katherine Lewis, spokeswoman for Britain's Health Protection Agency, said substance was found in two sites in the stadium, but did not specify where. She said radiation levels were "barely detectable" and posed no public health risk.

British officials also said Wednesday that a room in the British Embassy in Moscow showed traces of a radioactive substance, although there was no threat to public health.

Kovtun and Lugovoi visited the embassy last month to discuss the Litvinenko case with embassy officials. Lugovoi recently told the ITAR-Tass news agency that he is undergoing tests for radiation contamination, and that the results would be available in a few days.

ITAR-Tass said Lugovoi expected to be interviewed by investigators Thursday. He said he is ready to answer all questions.

In London, traces of polonium-210 were also found at a private security firm, a sushi bar and in Berezovsky's offices.

Minute amounts of the radioactive substance were also discovered on British Airways planes that flew from Moscow to London on Oct. 31 and from London to Moscow on Nov. 3, the day Lugovoi says he returned to Russia.

DOJ_NMG_0103434

Interfax reported Tuesday that Lugovoi had not yet been questioned, quoting his lawyer, Andrei Romashov. The Russian Prosecutor-General's Office confirmed in a brief statement that it had started questioning potential witnesses in the Litvinenko case.

ABC News quoted an unidentified British official as saying Lugovoi, a security expert whose business interests include a share of a beverage and wine plant in Russia, was the "prime suspect" in the investigation.

However, a British official told The Associated Press on Wednesday that "Lugovoi is one of many people investigators are looking to question, but I wouldn't call him a suspect at this point."

The official, who requested anonymity because he is not authorized to speak to the media, added: "We're also looking at the possibility there were criminal gangs involved."

A former KGB officer, Lugovoi told Ekho Moskvy radio that he had known Litvinenko for a decade. Their acquaintance dated to Lugovoi's tenure as chief of the security detail at ORT, the Russian television network that Berezovsky controlled before the tycoon fell out with Putin.

Berezovsky fled to London to avoid what he claims are politically motivated money-laundering charges. He was granted political asylum in 2003.

Lugovoi, meanwhile, served a brief jail term in 2002 for allegedly helping an executive of Aeroflot airlines — then partly controlled by Berezovsky — escape from pretrial detention.

Lugovoi has told the Russian media that Litvinenko contacted him about a year ago with business-related proposals. He said they had met intermittently in London since then.

Litvinenko was a counterintelligence officer with the Federal Security Service, or FSB, the main successor agency to the KGB, when he broke with the agency in 1998. At a press conference, he accused his bosses of ordering him to kill Berezovsky.

In 2004, Litvinenko wrote a book accusing the FSB of orchestrating the bombing of Russian apartment buildings in 1999, allegedly to stir up support for Russia's second war against Chechen separatists.

After journalist Anna Politkovskaya, a critic of Putin and Russia's war in Chechnya, was shot to death in Moscow in October, Litvinenko began an independent investigation.

Meanwhile, Lugovoi traveled to London three times in the month before Litvinenko's death, and met with him four times, according to the Russian media.

Romashov, Lugovoi's lawyer, denied Wednesday that his client was a suspect.

In London, Alexander Goldfarb, a friend of Litvinenko's who helped him escape Russia, said he doubted Lugovoi was the killer.

"I frankly doubt that he was the hit man because hit men are usually people hiding in the dark," Goldfarb told the AP. "I think it's one of his associates, I think he was used unawares. ... Now his life is in danger because he knows a lot."

Kovtun, the man reportedly questioned Tuesday and Wednesday, told Ekho Moskvy radio last month that Lugovoi had introduced him to Litvinenko in October in London, where Kovtun had business interests.

Kovtun and Lugovoi have known each other since their days together at a military academy. Kovtun said he was helping Western companies enter the Russian market, and that Litvinenko had introduced him to officials with two British companies.

Kovtun said he, Lugovoi and Litvinenko had dinner in London's Chinatown on Oct. 16 or 17. The only other time he saw Litvinenko, Kovtun said, was Nov. 1, before the soccer match.

Litvinenko's father, Walter, told Radio Liberty his son had converted to Islam and wanted a Muslim burial. "He told me about his decision two days before he died. He said, 'Papa, I have to talk to you about something serious. I've become a Muslim.'"

An ally of Litvinenko said the ex-spy converted on his deathbed.

"He told me that he wanted to convert to Islam literally in his first days in the hospital," said Chechen rebel envoy Akhmed Zakayev. "I did not pay a lot of attention to this," Zakayev told Radio Liberty, "but he returned to the theme again and again."

Litvinenko Death Now Treated As Murder (FT)

By Neil Buckley

Financial Times, December 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0103435

British detectives on Wednesday night said they were treating the death of Alexander Litvinenko, the former KGB officer, as murder, at the same time as small traces of radiation were found at the British Embassy in Moscow.

Scotland Yard had previously been treating Litvinenko's death from apparent poisoning with radioactive polonium-210 as a suspicious death, but said the investigation had reached the stage "where it is felt appropriate to treat it as an allegation of murder".

Police added, however, that they had "reached no conclusions as to the means employed, the motive or the identity of those who might be responsible for Mr Litvinenko's death".

The upgrading of the inquiry came as British detectives in Moscow began interviewing contacts of Litvinenko – who claimed in a statement shortly before he died on November 23 that Russian secret services had been ordered to kill him by the Kremlin.

The Kremlin has described the claims of its involvement as "nonsense". But the tangled case is threatening to create a significant rift in Russia's relations with the UK and other western partners.

British embassy officials in Moscow said on Wednesday night that experts had found tiny amounts of radiation, though they said they were too small to pose a danger to public health, and declined to confirm that the radiation was polonium-210.

The discovery is likely to intensify the focus on Andrei Lugovoi, a businessman and fellow former KGB officer who met Litvinenko on November 1, the day he fell ill. Mr Lugovoi visited the embassy on November 24 to affirm his readiness to answer questions connected with the case.

Mr Lugovoi has denied responsibility for Litvin-enko's death, and suggested that he may be being framed.

He is now in a Moscow hospital, apparently under observation or treatment for radiation poisoning himself. British detectives and Russian investigators had hoped to question Mr Lugovoi on Wednesday, but are now expected to meet him on Thursday, provided doctors give their consent.

British investigators on Wednesday did interview another man who met Litvinenko on November 1 – Dmitry Kovtun, another Russian businessman.

Mr Kovtun, Mr Lugovoi and a third man met Litvinenko before leaving for a football match at London's Emirates Stadium, where Britain's Health Protection Agency said barely detectable traces of polonium-210 had also been found on Wednesday.

The agency said there was no risk to health.

Businessman Questioned In Ex-Spy's Poisoning (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers And Alan Cowell

The New York Times, December 7, 2006

MOSCOW, Dec. 6 — Russian and British investigators jointly questioned at least one of two Russian businessmen who met Alexander V. Litvinenko on the day he became ill, officials said Wednesday, while in London the police said they were treating the death as a case of murder.

British officials also said traces of radioactivity were found Wednesday at the British Embassy in Moscow, though they would not say whether the radiation had come from the isotope that poisoned Mr. Litvinenko.

The Prosecutor General's Office in Moscow announced that investigators from both countries interviewed a Russian citizen, whom it did not identify, on Tuesday night. A lawyer later said the man was Dmitri V. Kovtun, a security consultant who met with Mr. Litvinenko at the Millennium Mayflower Hotel in London on Nov. 1, along with another former K.G.B. agent, Andrei K. Lugovoi.

In remarks reported by the Interfax news agency here, Mr. Lugovoi's lawyer said his client had agreed to be interviewed and was being treated as a witness. He suggested that Mr. Lugovoi could be questioned on Thursday or Friday.

The Nov. 1 meeting has become a primary focus of the investigation into the death of Mr. Litvinenko, a former K.G.B. agent who turned into a vehement Kremlin critic in exile. He became violently sick that night and died 22 days later from the effects of a high dose of radiation. In a deathbed statement, he blamed President Vladimir V. Putin.

The isotope, polonium 210, has left a tantalizing though inconclusive trail that investigators have traced throughout London and, through two British Airways planes, into Moscow.

DOJ_NMG_0103436

Until Wednesday the British police adopted a circumspect approach to Mr. Litvinenko's death, calling it "unusual" or "suspicious" even as evidence mounted that he had died of radiation poisoning as a result of ingesting polonium 210.

But in a statement on Wednesday night, Scotland Yard said: "Detectives investigating the death of Alexander Litvinenko have reached the stage where it is felt appropriate to treat it as an allegation of murder.

"It is important to stress that we have reached no conclusions as to the means employed, the motive or the identity of those who might be responsible for Mr. Litvinenko's death. The inquiry is still in its early stages, and we are not prepared to comment on speculative reports in the media."

The timing of the announcement suggested that the British police were seeking to reinforce demands for cooperation from the Kremlin by stressing the gravity and reach of the case.

Britain's Health Protection Agency confirmed that minute traces of radiation had been found at Emirates Stadium in London, the newly built home of the Arsenal soccer team, where Mr. Kovtun and Mr. Lugovoi say they attended a soccer match on the night of Nov. 1.

Mr. Lugovoi, at his own initiative, met with Britain's deputy ambassador, Sian MacLeod, on the day Mr. Litvinenko died. An embassy spokesman, speaking on condition of anonymity, according to British policy, said there were minute traces of a radioactive element, which he declined to identify as polonium. He said there was no public health threat.

The new discoveries — especially in the Moscow embassy — appeared to suggest the possibility that Mr. Lugovoi had been exposed to polonium, though how and exactly when remain inconclusive. He is now hospitalized in Moscow, as is Mr. Kovtun.

Whether tests have found traces of polonium on Mr. Lugovoi and Mr. Kovtun remains unclear; Mr. Lugovoi has said in published remarks that checks so far have found nothing.

The joint British-Russian questioning of the Russian businessman appeared to signal Russia's willingness to cooperate, outwardly at least, with an investigation that has sorely strained relations between the countries.

A day before, the prosecutor general, Yuri Y. Chaika, pointedly outlined the limits of any British investigatory authority here. He said that Russian investigators would take the lead and that Russia would refuse to extradite anyone charged with involvement in Mr. Litvinenko's death, trying them instead in a Russian court.

Mr. Kovtun was questioned on Tuesday evening and again on Wednesday in a Moscow hospital, where doctors were examining him and Mr. Lugovoi for exposure to polonium 210, according to Mr. Lugovoi's lawyer.

By Wednesday evening, investigators had not yet questioned Mr. Lugovoi, who checked into the hospital as the British arrived in Moscow this week, said the lawyer, Andrei M. Romashov, according to a report on Interfax.

A third businessman who traveled with the two men to London, Vyacheslav G. Sokolenko, said in a telephone interview that Mr. Lugovoi and Mr. Kovtun had willingly agreed to meet with the British detectives, adding that all three had nothing to hide. "We never concealed the truth," he said, speaking of their visit to London.

Mr. Sokolenko said he did not attend the meeting with Mr. Litvinenko on Nov. 1. He said he had traveled with Mr. Lugovoi and his family, along with Mr. Kovtun, to attend the Nov. 1 soccer match, between CSKA Moscow and Arsenal.

Mr. Lugovoi, who has declined repeated requests for an interview, said in a radio interview shortly after Mr. Litvinenko's death that he and Mr. Kovtun had met him to discuss establishing contacts for British companies seeking to invest or locate in Russia.

Mario Scaramella, who met Mr. Litvinenko at a sushi restaurant that day, left a hospital in London on Wednesday after checking in last Friday for tests after the discovery of traces of polonium in his body. Doctors found no signs of radiation illness.

In an interview with CNN on Wednesday, Mr. Scaramella said he had met Mr. Litvinenko to discuss threats he had received. "Once here, I received more details about this risk, this danger," he said from his hospital room. "So we met up as scheduled just to update each other about security issues, our personal security."

Mr. Scaramella, an academic who worked on an Italian commission investigating Soviet and Russian espionage and secret service activity in Italy, said he had received e-mail from an unidentified source suggesting that he and Mr. Litvinenko were in danger from "people linked with some clandestine organizations not directly under control of Russian establishment but from Russia."

DOJ_NMG_0103437

At the same time, he discounted the threats, saying the messages had been so full of detail that they "didn't seem genuine," a view he said Mr. Litvinenko shared.

In London, Alex Goldfarb, an associate of the billionaire Russian émigré Boris A. Berezovsky and a spokesman for the Litvinenko family, said he believed that Mr. Lugovoi was central to the investigation, because he had flown into London on the British Airways flights that later showed traces of radiation, including at least one flight that occurred before Nov. 1.

Mr. Goldfarb said that sequence of events suggested that Mr. Lugovoi "was showing radiation before Alexander was contaminated." At the same time, he suggested that Mr. Lugovoi might have been an unwilling participant in the poisoning.

"He is the one who Alex trusted, so he may have been involved himself," Mr. Goldfarb said, "or he was used to bring somebody else close to him."

Poisoning Case Will Be Treated As Murder (WP)

By Mary Jordan And Peter Finn

The Washington Post, December 7, 2006

LONDON, Dec. 6 -- British authorities announced Wednesday that they are officially treating the fatal poisoning of former Russian spy Alexander Litvinenko as murder and have found traces of a radioactive substance at the British Embassy in Moscow.

Scotland Yard had been calling Litvinenko's poisoning "a suspicious death." Failure to immediately call his Nov. 23 death a homicide had fueled speculation that he might have committed suicide; family and friends, upset over that suggestion, said no one would choose such a frightening, agonizing death.

"It is important to stress that we have reached no conclusions as to the means employed, the motive or the identity of those who might be responsible for Mr. Litvinenko's death," British police said in a statement.

In Moscow, British detectives found small traces of a radioactive substance at the British Embassy, but said it posed no risk to public health. They offered no explanation for the radiation, but the embassy was where officials had recently questioned Andrei Lugovoy, a former KGB agent who met with Litvinenko in London on Nov. 1, the day he fell ill.

Lugovoy is in a Moscow hospital undergoing tests and is expected to talk to British investigators Thursday, according to Russian news reports. His attorney, Andrei Romashov, told reporters that his client would be questioned as a witness, not a suspect.

The Interfax news agency quoted Lugovoy as saying: "As for the hullabaloo about me that has been stirred by Western media, in my view good theatrical directing is traceable here. I've stopped watching television and reading papers. I'm fed up with all this."

Dmitry Kovtun, a Russian businessman who also met Litvinenko on Nov. 1, was questioned Wednesday by investigators from the Russian prosecutor general's office with detectives from Scotland Yard present. There has been tension between London and Moscow over strict controls Russia has imposed on the visitors' rights of inquiry.

So far, only two other people have been found to have polonium-210, the radioactive substance that killed Litvinenko, in their systems: Litvinenko's widow Marina and Mario Scaramella, an Italian who also met with Litvinenko on Nov. 1 in London.

Doctors said Marina Litvinenko has such a tiny amount that her risk is low, but more significant quantities were found in Scaramella. But health officials, while concerned for Scaramella's long-term health, said he was not showing any symptoms and discharged him Wednesday from a London hospital.

Finn reported from Moscow.

Commentary: I Was Poisoned And Russia's Political Enemies Were Surely Behind It (FT)

By Yegor Gaidar

Financial Times, December 7, 2006

On November 24, I found myself involved in a succession of events that resembled a political thriller. A lot has been written about what happened. International television provided detailed coverage of these events. I had not thought that global fame would find me in such an unusual way. I deliberately refused to give interviews. Nevertheless, I am compelled to tell what happened.

DOJ_NMG_0103438

Public opinion reserves a degree of humour for those who have survived attempted murder. The nature of this phenomenon is not clear to me. Having been in this situation myself, I found nothing funny about it. But the logic of public consciousness is a fact of life. One has to reckon with it. I will try to keep my sense of humour while telling what happened.

On November 21, I felt exhausted. Over the previous three weeks, several difficult business trips added to my usual workload. I considered cancelling my trip to Ireland and resting. However, Ireland is a wonderful country, which I love. And the trip was easy: a university research conference and presentation of my book Death of the Empire: Lessons for Modern Russia was one of its subjects. I decided I would not cancel the trip.

Next morning, after my arrival in Dublin, I was walking with a conference organiser, foreign literature library director Yekaterina Geniyeva, when I decided that I had made the right decision. Spending two days with smart and nice people in a lovely old Irish university is both a rest and a pleasure.

Before the conference opening, I had breakfast in the university canteen. I had a fruit salad and asked for a cup of tea. Then I went to the conference hall. About 10 minutes after the session started I realised that I was unable to hear anything. My only thought was how to get back to my hotel room and lie down. I apologised to my colleagues who were presenting the next session, said I felt unwell and had to go back upstairs. Ms Geniyeva looked at me perplexed; 40 minutes earlier we had been having a cheerful chat while walking along university lawns. She probably decided that I was not interested in the subject.

After I got back to my room, I had to close my eyes immediately. The sensation was similar to being under general anaesthesia. You can see and understand things, but it is hard to open your eyes. Reaching for a ringing telephone takes too much effort. I assumed this dusky state was a result of fatigue. I decided that I needed to deliver my lectures and return to Moscow immediately.

I forced myself to deliver my presentation on Russian migration policy at 2.30pm. As soon as I finished my speech, my eyes began to close, fatigue took over and I returned to my room as quickly as I could.

The phone call that apparently saved my life came at 5.10pm. A representative of the organisers reminded me that my book presentation was in five minutes. Would I be taking part? I considered saying no. Had I done so, and had I been alone in my room 15 minutes later, my chances of survival would have been zero. But I had come to Ireland to make a presentation on my book; I would not let some minor ailment get in the way. I stood up, went downstairs and began to speak.

Ten minutes into my speech, I realised I could not continue talking. I apologised to the audience and walked towards the exit. After I crossed the threshold of the conference hall, I collapsed in the university hallway.

I can remember very little about the events of the following several hours. Those who tended to me as I lay on the floor found me bleeding from the nose, with blood and vomit flowing from my mouth. I was pale, unconscious. It appeared as though I was dying.

Within 30 minutes, I started to come around. I tried unsuccessfully to raise my head. An ambulance arrived and I was loaded in to it. All I could do was open and close my eyes and I watched with intense interest the recording of my own cardiogram. The cardiogram is a chart and charts are what I work with. Apparently, professional interest prevails even when the nervous system is damaged.

Once in the hospital, as soon as I regained the ability to think, my own hypothesis was simple: fatigue, combined with maladies often found with men in their 50s: increased sugar level, blood pressure. But my test results bemused the doctors. My heart was working like a clock; blood pressure was high, but only slightly higher than the norm; the same for sugar levels. Meanwhile, the patient was clearly in an extremely grave condition. A stroke was a possibility. I could still not move my hands or feet. But the ability to control my body came back quickly in the following hours. By 7 o'clock the next morning, not only could I stand up from my bed, but I could take a shower and shave. I am not a doctor, but I knew that stroke states are different. It must have been something else.

At 8am, a few hours after I stopped feeling like an inanimate object, I could move, think, make decisions and implement them just as I could 24 hours before. Despite the protests of the Irish doctors, I said that I wanted to leave the hospital immediately. They told me that they had no right to forbid me. But they explained that my case puzzled them. A comparison of test results and my state of health during the late hours of November 24 and early the next day did not tally in any way. They told me that I needed a thorough examination and in-depth analysis. I thanked them for their help and explained that it was easier to take this analysis in Russia, where the doctors had been supervising me for many years and knew my medical history. I arranged a transfer to the Russian embassy, then took a flight to Moscow.

I am not a doctor and realise the limits of unprofessional judgments. Nevertheless, when your life is at stake, it is hard to avoid attempting to understand what happened. My heart, brain, blood pressure, sugar level were either good or without abnormalities. Despite this, I suffered several hours of unconsciousness or semiconsciousness, an inability to control my body, and heavy bleeding from my nose and throat. One of the possible explanations that an unprofessional mind inevitably comes up with in such a situation is poisoning. I remember my state before breakfast very well. It was excellent. Half an hour later it was awful. However, this is an unprofessional view. I suppose that there are pathologies known to medicine that can cause such developments.

Straight from Moscow's Sheremetyevo airport, I headed for the clinic where they have known me for many years. Despite the fact that I landed late at night on a Sunday, the chief doctor convened specialists. I told them what happened and asked them to consider all scenarios that could explain these phenomena. By Monday morning, he had the results of the tests on his desk. One month before the Irish incident I had had a thorough medical check-up. Now we could compare the old and the current pictures. The doctor was unable to explain such large-scale and systemic changes in the body in terms of anything related to intoxication, within the possible range of illnesses known to medicine, nor any of their most exotic combinations. For reasons of professional ethics he could not use the word "poisoning". A particular poisonous substance should be determined in order to do that. This is impossible 60 hours after the accident, especially if we are talking about secret toxic substances, the information on which is unavailable to open medical science. But we understand each other well. One may blame anybody, even the aliens. If we stay within the framework of common sense, it is poisoning we think of.

When the thought that this could be a result of somebody's wilful actions crossed my mind for the first time on the afternoon of November 25, I started thinking about who could have orchestrated it. Who would gain from it? I do not have any property to speak of. Neither do I have a profitable metal or oil company, so there is nothing to take away. So, if this was attempted murder, politics was behind it. I have participated in Russian politics for many years now and I know quite a bit about it. I know its main figures well. By then I realised that my survival was a miracle. The fast rate of recuperation showed that the attempt did not aim at mutilation or injury, but murder. Who of the Russian political circle needed my death on the 24th of November 2006, in Dublin? I rejected the idea of complicity of the Russian leadership almost immediately. After the death of Alexander Litvinenko on November 23 in London, another violent death of a famous Russian on the following day is the last thing that the Russian authorities would want. In case of an explosion or skirmish in Moscow, one would think about radical nationalistic thugs first of all. But Dublin? Poisoning? This is obviously not their style.

Most likely that means that some obvious or hidden adversaries of the Russian authorities stand behind the scenes of this event, those who are interested in further radical deterioration of relations between Russia and the west. Within several hours, comparing the dates of events that took place during the past six weeks, I formulated a rather logical and consistent hypothesis on the reasons behind this. The world view regains its intrinsic logic and ceases resembling a Kafkaesque nightmare. Still, it does not look any more enjoyable. Well, as they say in Russia, as long as we are alive, we might even be happy some day, but that is a different story.

Peacekeepers For Somalia (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, December 7, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Dec. 6 — The Security Council unanimously passed a resolution on Wednesday backing the formation of a peacekeeping force to monitor the Somali government's struggle with Islamist foes, partly lifting an arms embargo and calling for peace talks.

"It may not be a complete solution to the problem, and that's one reason why we've encouraged the mediation of various parties and to have all the Somalia factions talk with one another," said John R. Bolton, the United States ambassador.

Peacekeeping Force For Somalia Approved (WP)

By Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, December 7, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Dec. 6 -- The U.N. Security Council unanimously approved a resolution authorizing an East African peacekeeping force to prevent an alliance of Islamic militias from overthrowing Somalia's fragile interim government.

The decision marked the first time the 15-nation council has backed a foreign intervention in Somalia since U.S. and U.N. troops withdrew from the country in the 1990s. It reflected fears that Islamic militias, known as the Islamic Courts Union, may be poised to topple the country's internationally recognized government.

The Islamic movement seized control of Mogadishu, Somalia's capital, over the summer and it has been extending its control throughout the country. It threatens the government's stronghold in Baidoa.

The Islamic militias have imposed a strict version of Islamic law in communities they control. A local Islamic religious leader, Sheik Hussein Barre Rage, told the Associated Press on Wednesday that residents in Bulo Burto will be beheaded if they refuse to pray five times a day.

Those who do not follow the law "will definitely be beheaded according to Islamic law," the news agency reported. "As Muslims, we should practice Islam fully, not in part, and that is what our religion enjoins us to do."

Ethiopia has sent thousands of troops to help prop up the government while its rival, Eritrea, has deployed thousands of troops to fight alongside the militias, a recent U.N. report said. Their presence has fueled concern that the conflict could spread into a bigger regional war.

Somali Prime Minister Ali Mohamed Gedi warned in a recent AP interview that war in Somalia could begin as soon as the rainy season ends later this month.

The resolution was passed after the United States accommodated a European request to exclude participation by Somalia's neighbors, Ethiopia, Kenya and Djibouti, in the new force. It empowers a new force, which is expected to be led by Uganda, to protect the country's transitional leaders and to train a local security force.

Resolution 1725 partly lifts a 14-year arms embargo so the East African force, which will be formed by the Intergovernmental Authority on Development, can equip and arm its peacekeepers. And it calls on the Islamic militias to halt any "further military expansion" and negotiate a power-sharing agreement with the Transitional Federal Government.

Critics said the decision to authorize foreign intervention without the approval of the Islamic militias may provoke even greater violence in Somalia. "The United States is leading the authorization of another intervention force in another Muslim country against the will of a large percentage of the people," said John Prendergast, an Africa specialist for the Brussels-based International Crisis Group. "The use of force as a substitute for diplomacy will have disastrous results in Somalia.

"You've got to get a negotiated power-sharing deal" before sending in a peacekeeping force, he added. "Doing the reverse simply alienates the courts and potentially will drive them to preemptive military action."

The United States and the resolution's other sponsors insisted that it was not intended to challenge the Islamic militias militarily and that they support a political settlement between the two sides. "The primary purpose of this deployment is to help stabilize Somalia by providing security in Baidoa, and protection and training" for the interim government, John R. Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, told the council. It is "not to engage in offensive actions against the Union of Islamic Courts."

U.N. Approves Troops For Somalia (LAT)

By Maggie Farley

The Los Angeles Times, December 7, 2006

NEW YORK — The United Nations Security Council on Wednesday authorized a regional force to protect Somalia's faltering interim government against Islamic militants, despite warnings that such intervention could spark a regional conflict.

The measure, passed unanimously, also partially lifts a 1992 weapons embargo to allow the regional force to arm itself. It urges Islamic militants to join talks with the transitional government, and threatens unspecified penalties for those who block peace efforts or try to overthrow the government.

DOJ_NMG_0103441

Since June, the Islamic Courts Union, as the militants are known, have taken control of the capital, Mogadishu, and most of southern Somalia and have begun to impose rigid Islamic law on areas under its rule. An Islamic courts official announced Wednesday that residents of a southern Somalian town, Bulo Burti, who did not pray five times a day would be beheaded.

Last week, the International Crisis Group think tank warned that a regional force probably would backfire and trigger a regional war by escalating a proxy conflict between Ethiopia, which supports the interim government, and Eritrea, which supports the Islamists.

"The Islamists … would likely perceive the resolution as tantamount to a declaration of war," the group said.

The United States and Ethiopia assert that the militants have links to the Al Qaeda terrorist network. U.S. Ambassador to the U.N. John R. Bolton said the Security Council agreed that intervening was the only way to prevent further conflict.

"The whole point of the deployment of the … peacekeeping force is as a preventive measure so that the situation doesn't deteriorate any further," he said before the vote. "If we don't take any steps at all, that is the far more likely outcome."

Idd Beddel Mohamed, Somalia's deputy U.N. ambassador, told the council that his government would talk with the Islamists if they halted their military advances and helped ensure that Somalia "shall not become a haven for international terrorism."

Neighboring Ethiopia, which is largely Christian, fears the spread of Islamic extremism and has sent as many as 8,000 troops to Somalia to protect the tottering government, according to a recent internal U.N. report.

Eritrea, in turn, has sent about 2,000 fighters to back the Islamists. Djibouti, Egypt, Iran, Libya, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Uganda and Yemen have been providing military support either to the government or the Islamists, the report said.

The resolution authorizes a seven-nation regional group, the Intergovernmental Authority on Development, and the African Union to establish a protection force in Somalia for six months. It allows troops from neighboring countries to join the peacekeeping force, but excludes nations thought to have a stake in the outcome: Ethiopia, Djibouti and Kenya.

It is up to participating nations and the African Union to fund the mission and find troops; diplomats said they aimed for eight battalions of about 700 troops, but would deploy only two during the first phase.

On Tuesday, Somalia's prime minister, Ali Mohammed Gedi, said he thought that all-out war in his country was inevitable, but that his government's troops were ready.

"Those who believe that the situation in Somalia will be solved through dialogue and talks are wrong," he told the Associated Press.
